Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] began his statement with the assertion that we are not bimetallists, and he proved it by the statement that his opinion is that no one nation can maintain bimetallism unaided by other nations. The opinion of the Senator from Iowa perhaps is entitled to very great respect; but I for one believe there are men living who know more about financial questions than does even the Senator from Iowa, with his great learning and wide and extensive information.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was before a committee of one of the Houses of Parliament in England only a few months ago a man who has been president of the Bank of England, who is a director of the Bank of England now, if I am not mistaken, and has been for thirty years, who is a member of one of the largest business establishments in London doing an immense exchange business, who has all his life been connected with large business affairs, and whose firm has business connections in all parts of the world, who understands finance as a science, and he stated in answer to a direct question put to him that the United States alone could, in his opinion, maintain a ratio between gold and silver. Some of us believe that Lord Aldenham's opinions on these questions are entitled to as much respect and weight as the opinion of the Senator from Iowa, and we believe with him that this country can maintain the parity between gold and silver, notwithstanding the assertions of the Senator from Iowa.

It is rather remarkable, Mr. President, that this proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island, which is so earnestly supported by the Senator from Iowa, should have come to the Senate as an afterthought; that it should have found its way here long after the bill was reported. If you were so earnestly anxious about establishing international bimetallism, why was it that after you had this bill in the committee for the length of time you had it there you brought it in here without one suggestion of that sort in it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Arkansas want an answer now?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. We could not conceive it possible for anybody to rise in the Senate and state that any other result could possibly happen.

Mr. STEWART. Why did you not read your own bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What changed your minds?

Mr. ALDRICH. The statements made by Senators on the other side that we had disowned bimetallism, international or national; that we were opposed to silver. That is what changed our minds.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is a notorious fact that there was a committee selected by a Republican caucus months and months ago charged with the responsibility of framing a finance bill which should express the intentions of that party in regard to this great question. They framed a bill and it was reported to a Republican caucus, and it went through that caucus by a unanimous vote—went through without one solitary dissent. Every man agreed to it and pledged himself to it. That bill went into another branch of Congress. Everybody knows what happened there. Everybody understands the discussions that were had there, the open declarations of many men that they had had their very last turn with silver; that that was the end of the whole business. And not one single Republican was heard to the contrary.

I believe, Mr. President, that I understand the reason why this amendment was brought in. In the platform adopted by the Republican party in St. Louis you declared yourselves in favor of bimetallism, which leading members of the Republican party laugh at as never having been meant in earnest. It is well known that you were not then and are not now in favor of bimetallism in any way. After you came into power you asked for an appropriation to appoint a commission to go abroad. This was to make a show of an effort to carry out your pledge. That commission went abroad and might have been successful. I hoped it would be. I was anxious to see bimetallism accomplished by any means. I hoped it would succeed and I believed it might have succeeded but for the fact that it was constantly undermined and discredited on the other side by the Republican Administration.

Mr. President, when this bill passed the House it provided for the absolute single gold standard and for the payment of United States bonds in gold, and there were other provisions, which I regard as iniquitous. That bill when it became public made an impression, and the people were heard condemning it, and when Republican leaders found what the Senator from Iowa spoke of just now as "the trend of public opinion," which brought this amendment here, the danger of a revolt against the Republican party was felt. It was conceived, then, to be necessary that the same old fraudulent straddle that was in the platform of 1896 should be put forth again for the purpose of undertaking to hold the votes of some men who would clearly not stay with the Republican party in an open avowal that they intended to stand by the single gold standard.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Arkansas does not agree with the Senator from Colorado, that this conflicts with Republican sentiment throughout the country?

Mr. TELLER. I did not say it was against the sentiment of every Republican. It is not. It is against the leaders' sentiments.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator to say it was against the idea of the great Republican masses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to two Senators?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I will take my own time hereafter.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have a newspaper clipping which I took out of a Boston newspaper, an interview attributed to the present Presiding Officer of this body (Mr. FRYE in the chair). It was directly after the Senator from Colorado had brought up the Stanley Matthews resolution and reoffered it in the Senate when we had a vote. I have an idea that the Senator from Maine illustrated in this interview the feelings that moved the Finance Committee when it authorized the Senator from Rhode Island to offer this amendment. I will read the interview:

> If the amendment of Senator NELSON to the Teller resolution had not been voted down, the effect of the adoption of the resolution would have been nothing. The effect of the resolution will be to square the silver men for their fight in 1900. That is what it is for. They were spurred on to their present activity by the attitude of Gage in urging the acceptance of the single gold standard.
> If Gage had been a politician as well as a banker, he probably would not have insisted on a declaration in favor of a single gold standard. It was all right for him to submit his scheme of finance, but hardly politic to be so specific about the single gold standard.

The trouble, Mr. President, is that the House had been entirely too "specific" about the single gold standard—to use the language of the Senator from Maine—and it was necessary to dilute it somewhat. The bill as brought from the Finance Committee in my opinion carries out almost every iniquity that is in the House bill. But it is very much more adroitly worded. It is fixed up so that almost anything in it can be denied. While it will have the same result as the House bill, it can easily be said that it does not mean what it will be construed to mean and is intended to mean.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. For the purpose of quoting those words, so that he can put them right there to the spot.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In just one minute. I wish first to finish this interview with the Senator from Maine.

McKinley, in his New York speech, voiced the views of his party fully, but he was more guarded than Mr. Gage.

I think the Finance Committee thought the House committee were not sufficiently "guarded," and they propose to put this in afterwards to hoodwink the public again into casting votes for a party that intends to establish permanently the gold standard while pretending to favor bimetallism. Now I will hear the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. On page 4 of the House bill, which has been struck out by the Senate amendment, appear these words:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to use said reserve fund in maintaining at all times the parity and equal value of every dollar issued or coined by the Government; and if at any time the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary, in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States, he may, at his discretion, exchange gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States.

That is the House provision, which is open, bold, manly. Here is the Senate subterfuge or dodge in which they have veiled the purpose. They bring it down to about three lines:

And all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard.

You do not say how, but you leave it to your Secretary of the Treasury to redeem silver dollars in gold dollars, as I tried to get the Senator from Iowa to acknowledge yesterday; but he would not do it. Now, will the Senator from Rhode Island deny that that is the purpose and object of this bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not in the time of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator do it afterwards?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will consider that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My time is about exhausted, but I want to call attention, in connection with what has just been read by the Senator from South Carolina, to the adroit language of the first paragraph of this bill, which is practically the same as the House bill, in declaring that gold shall be the "standard unit of value." You assert that that is a continuation of the present law. That is not true. It is the continuation of the present practice, which is a lawless usurpation on the part of the executive department of the Government and it is not a continuation of the law.

The act of 1873 declared that the gold dollar should be the unit of value, and the word "standard" is not used in the act. The word "standard" means the particular dollar by which all other dollars are to be measured, and when you make the gold dollar the standard dollar, all others must be measured by it.

Now, when the act of 1873 was passed, declaring that the gold dollar should be the unit of value, greenbacks were a legal tender, and from then on until 1879 greenbacks, which were below par as measured in gold, were the standard of value and the only standard of value. All calculations were in greenbacks. Purchases and sales were made in greenbacks, and gold was at a premium. It was bought and sold as any other commodity was bought and sold. It was not current money and the legal tenders were the standard of value.

The implied assertion in this bill that gold has been the standard of value from 1873 until now is not true in point of fact. In 1878 we provided for the coinage of silver dollars and made them a legal tender to a limited amount. Now, any legal-tender money is a standard of value. This is true in the very nature of things and needs no proof. Any legal-tender money is a standard of value. But you undertake here to declare that the only standard, the sole standard, is the one legal tender which is coined in gold and gold alone. You do this by this bill when you, by law, provide that it alone shall be the standard, for you practically effect this by making other legal tenders only representatives of money and not money.

Mr. ALDRICH. Are United States notes the standard of value?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Of course they are a standard of value, one standard of value, as I have just undertaken to show, and which the Senator from Rhode Island must know to be the truth. From 1873, while the law that you pretend to copy here, and which you do not copy because you add the word "standard," was in full force, up to 1878, silver was demonetized and not current and greenbacks were actually the standard of value.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I rise to protest against the assumption that the United States has no right to legislate upon financial questions, but that we must depend upon Europe for that purpose. When did Europe ever pass a money law for us? Did we consult Europe in 1792 when the first coinage act was passed? Did we consult her in 1836 when the second act was passed? Did we consult her in 1873 when we struck down silver by an act? Did we consult her in 1878 when we restored silver? Have we ever consulted her as to that? Have we not passed these laws ourselves? Are we consulting Europe in regard to passing this proposed act, which is a radical departure from anything we have passed before, which takes away the legal-tender power of the silver dollar to pay public debts? When this is done there will be no legal-tender money in the country but gold. It takes away the legal-tender power of the silver dollar to pay public debts, and consequently there will be no full legal-tender money in the country but gold alone. Are we consulting Europe about that?

The idea that our financial legislation depends upon Europe and that we must go there for it is ridiculous. The idea seems to be to fix a platform on which to go before the people and say, We did the best we could, but we have not the consent of Europe, and consequently we will give you bimetallism whenever Europe tells us to do so. That is the position they propose to take in going before the country, and it is most absurd.

The Senator from Iowa also argued with an utter misapprehension of what money is, to keep some things equal to other things, and all that kind of thing. All there is of money is its legal-tender power, and this discussion that we should maintain the parity between two kinds of money is most ridiculous. Tell me when and where a full legal-tender dollar of the United States was not equal to every other legal-tender dollar? Such a case can not be cited. What keeps silver at par? The legal-tender power that it has. Take that away and it will fall at once. Take it from gold and it will fall at once. It is the legal-tender power, that stamp, and nothing else that keeps it at par.

The character of this amendment is so well described in an article in the New York Times and meets my views so exactly, I will take the liberty of having the Secretary read it at the desk. It is full and complete and states the whole thing.

The Secretary read as follows:

A WEAK AND NEEDLESS CONCESSION.

[From the New York Times.]

We should like to know to what element in our population Senator ALDRICH thought he was pandering when he reported from his committee this amendment to the currency bill:

"That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver."

The currency bill contains a specific declaration establishing the single gold standard. It is not simply inconsistent to graft upon the same bill a recognition of bimetallism; it is stupid, it is fatuous, it is a desecration of the graveyard, and an impudent interference with dissolution and the benignant course of nature.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I protest against the right of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to misrepresent the character of bimetallism represented on this side of the Chamber. He may speak his own sentiments on bimetallism, but he can not fairly represent ours. Bimetallism is that financial system which gives to gold and silver free and unlimited coinage into full legal-tender money at the ratio prescribed by law.

Mr. Muhleman, deputy assistant treasurer of the United States, in New York, in his Monetary Systems of the World, says:

By bimetallism, simply defined, is meant the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver into coins of full debt-paying power. Not the mere use of the double standard, but the actually opened mints on the terms above given.

The royal gold and silver commission of England in 1888 gave their definition of bimetallism. They said:

A bimetallic system of currency, to be completely effective, must, in the view of those who advocate it, include two essential features: (a) An open mint ready to coin any quantity of either gold or silver which may be brought to it; (b) the right on the part of a debtor to discharge his liabilities at his option in either of the two metals at a ratio fixed by law.

The Senator from Iowa says that we are not bimetallists. Why? Because in his opinion to open the mints to gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 in the United States by this great Government, independent of all the world, would not maintain the commercial value of silver bullion equal to its coining value. I have heard that before. I want to put a question now to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and ask him to answer it as an honest man and "good Indian." We have to-day upon the statute books of the United States a law duly enacted and signed giving to both silver and gold free and unlimited coinage into full legal-tender money at the ratio of 16 to 1, independent of every nation on earth, and the Senator from Rhode Island has 10,000 ounces of silver bullion over in London and wants to sell it. What is his price for it? What is your price for it?

Mr. ALDRICH. It depends upon what I could get for it.

Mr. COCKRELL. What would you ask for it? What would you take for it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I would take the most that I could get.

Mr. COCKRELL. How much would that be?

Mr. ALDRICH. If it was sent over here and coined into silver dollars, I would get at the rate of $1.29 an ounce, nominally; but what that coin would be worth at some future time is a question which neither the Senator from Missouri nor myself can answer.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not the question. I put it a direct question. The Senator knows that if he were in London when that law was enacted and had 10,000 ounces of silver bullion and wanted to sell it, he would ask the coining value in the United States, less interest and the charges of transportation and the delay in having it coined.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if there were only 10,000 ounces of silver outside of the United States to come here to be coined into silver dollars the condition which the Senator from Missouri alludes to would undoubtedly remain true; but if the silver of the world as well as the silver of the United States should be brought to the American mints to be coined, instead of being worth $1.29 an ounce at its coinage value it would be worth 59 cents or 60 cents an ounce, the commercial value of bullion; exactly what has taken place, as has been alluded to by the Senator from Iowa, in our neighboring country of Mexico. Mexico has her mints open to the free coinage of both gold and silver. A Mexican silver dollar is worth just as much as Mexican bullion, the silver that it contains.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope this interruption will not be taken out of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it will not be taken out of the time of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. That argument I have heard time and again. Now, I want to bring up as a witness in defense of the position I occupy to-day no less a person than the distinguished senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and I will read from what the distinguished Senator said in 1878 in regard to the precious metals. I say that whenever the United States, a great commercial nation that we are, with our unlimited and inexhaustible resources and commodities for sale, opens its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver equally with gold at the old ratio of 16 to 1, that very moment there is a fixed price for all the silver bullion of this world wherever it may be, and that is the coining price in the United States, and wherever that silver bullion is the holders of it will not accept less than its coining value in the United States, the expenses of transportation and coinage, insurance and delay, deducted.

Now, it is law and only law that fixes the commercial value of bullion. I want the Senator's attention. I will keep the eye of the Senator from Iowa, but I want the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island. I say it is the law and only the law that fixes the commercial value of gold and silver bullion. Gold bullion to-day is equal to its coining value, because England has an open mint to the gold of the world at a fixed price, and nobody will take less for it, and the United States has the same thing.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Is not gold and silver equal by law in Mexico at a ratio less than ours?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not the United States. Mexico is not a great commercial nation. It has not the products for sale that we have. It is law that gives value to the metals.

Mr. ALDRICH. But if it is law and not the size of the nation or any other circumstance that makes it, why not in Mexico?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will get to that point. I want to quote now from my friend from Iowa. Money exists not by measure, but by law, and without law there is no money on this earth. I challenge anyone of you to deny it. Without law there can be no legal tender. You know that; every one of you.

Mr. ALDRICH. The very term——

Mr. COCKRELL. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], who is now sitting behind the Senator from Rhode Island, knows that without law there is no legal tender on earth. It is law and only law that creates money; nothing else, nothing less, and nothing more; and without it it does not exist.

Now, then, it is law that gives to gold and silver their commercial value. I read from the speech of the Senator from Iowa, delivered on the 15th day of February, 1878, in which he says:

> What is it that fixes or establishes the commercial value of money? Gold and silver are commodities and, like other commodities, their value is regulated by supply and demand.
> The annual supply of the precious metals exerts very little influence over their value, because the annual supply is very small compared with the total quantity actually in use. It can not be truthfully said that the insignificant increase in the production of the mines of the Comstock lode exerts any material effect upon the value of silver. The annual production of silver or gold, or both, amounts to little or nothing compared with the great sum of gold and silver already in existence.
> Therefore the annual supply of the precious metals has little or nothing to do with their value. What is it, then, that affects their value chiefly? It is the demand. The commercial value is controlled by the demand. What constitutes the demand?
> "What constitutes the demand?" I see the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is about to be led into a blunder, but the Senator from Iowa shakes his finger and leads him away from it. [Laughter.]
> What constitutes the demand? Why is it that we have silver quoted every day in the London market? Is it sold to be worked up into plate by the silversmith? Not at all. Its present demand in the London market is for shipment to India or China.
> What is it that constitutes the demand for gold? Is it for use in the arts? Very little of it can be so used. Therefore it is its use as money by so many civilized states that creates a demand for it and gives it its value. If all the European states and our country were to-day simultaneously to demonetize gold and remonetize silver, would not these two metals immediately change places, and would not gold depreciate vastly—
> "Vastly!"—
> below the fall of silver in 1873? Silver is used by six or seven hundred millions of people living in oriental countries, while gold is not used by them at all, or scarcely at all. Therefore, if gold were demonetized, if the laws of legal tender—
> "If the laws of legal tender!"—
> were taken away from it, it would be the metal to depreciate instead of silver. Now, if that be true, what is it that creates—> the commercial value of the precious metals? It is legislation. Legislation gives value to the precious metals, and the commercial value simply records the condition of legislation with reference to the precious metals.
> "Creates!"—

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator from Missouri does not expect the Senator from Iowa to deny that he thought that when he was a bimetallist. But since he has got to be a Goldbug, he has changed his opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Missouri for reading a brief extract from the somewhat extended speech I made in 1878. If the Senator would put the whole of it in the RECORD I should be very glad, because then I maintained, as I maintain now, that legislation gives additional value to the precious metals; but I argued then, as I argue now, that in order that this value and that ratio of equivalence should be maintained between them, there should be universal law—not the law of the city of Washington or the law of a small community—but that it should, as it had been for seventy-three years before, almost the universal law of the nations which kept the equivalence of these metals up to that time.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But it had not been.

Mr. ALLISON. What had not been?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The ratio of 15½ to 1 had not been the universal law.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not speaking of universal law——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. You stated a while ago it was because there had been.

Mr. ALLISON. I am speaking of that concurrence of the legislation of nations which maintained that or nearly that equivalence for a long time. The difficulty is now that the great nations of the world that then used silver no longer use it, and that it is not possible for one nation or one community by establishing a monetary ratio between these two metals to keep that ratio of equivalence. The Senator from Missouri need not read the speech which I made there; everybody knows that the principal use of precious metals is as money, and they are used now as money; but the ratio of equivalence has so changed as that it is impossible to maintain them at the old ratio, and yet my friend from Missouri has as much faith as is not to be found in all Israel, that although the situations have changed in every respect throughout the nations, we can stand now as we stood back in 1873, or before 1873, when all Germany and all Europe was practically using silver, except Great Britain.

So the Senator's quotation from me is simply a statement of the conditions at that time, whereby the laws of so many nations could unite and give value to silver, which is given by the demand for silver and not for its use in the arts, either for silver or for gold.

So, Mr. President, I have not changed my opinions.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am not going to vote for this amendment, but my refusal is not because I am opposed to international bimetallism. I have been an international bimetallist ever since I have had anything to do with the question. There is no man who has made more efforts for it than I, unless it may be the Senator from Iowa, who has moved several times in that direction.

I have watched with interest every bimetallic conference that has ever been held, and I must say I have watched every one of them with more or less hope. We have been disappointed. I am not one of those who declare yet that it is not possible to have international bimetallism, and if the committee had proposed to put in the bill a live, aggressive proposition that they are in favor of international bimetallism I would be willing to vote for it.

But, Mr. President, let us see what this remarkable provision is:

That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

Mr. President, there is nothing in that to commit the Republican party to bimetallism, as I said before; nothing that can touch the most acute conscience of the party politician who may come after us. It is absolutely worthless and is intended to be so. I think I can say that; and I think I am justified when the Senator rises here and charges that every one of us who votes against this bill is for silver monometallism. I am as much in favor of bimetallism now as I have ever been. I never wanted to see this country put upon a monometallic basis either of silver or of gold; but I am of the opinion to-day, even with the great output of gold, that we would be infinitely better off on a silver basis than we should be on a solitary gold basis.

What will be the result of this act depends upon conditions we can not foresee. If there should be a great output of gold for the next twenty years, as there is now, we may not feel the strangulation, the trouble which every nation on the face of the earth to this hour has felt when she tried to go to the gold standard. But if we went to the silver standard, we should have a money that would enable us to trade with thirteen hundred million people, instead of with two hundred and fifty or three hundred million.

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal in the Senate about the extension of trade and commerce. You have got to look for your commerce to the Asiatic world; you have got to look for it amongst the thirteen hundred million men who are not yet so far advanced in civilization as our competitors across the Atlantic.

The Europeans are manufacturing most of their own goods. If we now send them a little iron and other manufactured articles, the time is not far distant when, in defense of their own conditions and to save their own laborers from want and destitution, they will put up a barrier against our trade. Everybody can see that who has studied the history of the world. You can see it in every movement that has been made. Germany is competing now with England, and England is alarmed at the competition. Do you suppose that any theory of free trade will stand in the way of Great Britain saying to us, "If you send goods here under certain conditions, there is a chance of destroying the laborers of this country?" If we do, of course they will endeavor to prevent it. Self-defense, humanity, and decency require them to do so, and they are going to do so.

If we would trade with the world, we can trade with silver better than with gold. As a great commercial nation, we will get gold enough if we have enough of other money, if we have enough of silver.

The dislocation of the parity is the most frightful thing which has occurred in financial affairs. That will not be settled when you go to a gold standard; that will not be settled if three hundred and fifty or five hundred millions of gold is put out in the world every year. You can not make thirteen hundred millions of people use gold; the financial and commercial conditions are such that they can not do it. The people who work for two annas a day, or for less than 5 cents, or who receive at the utmost not to exceed 15 cents a day, can not handle gold. They have never handled it. Those people have been using silver from time immemorial. They have not been using gold except as merchandise—not using it as money; and in the whole history of their race they have never used it except for the purposes of adornment or of barter. Everywhere through the Asiatic countries, as I said to-day, from more than fifteen hundred years before the Christian era, the people were using silver as money, and those people have been using it ever since. While gold was used in some parts of Asia, silver was the real money in that country during all that time.

I agree with the Senator from Missouri that the relation between gold and silver is one to be created by law. I say now that the Roman law, made in the days of Augustus, or before that time, maintained the relation of gold and silver practically uniform throughout a great portion of Europe for one thousand two hundred years; it did not vary.

When France, which has been on a bimetallic standard ever since anybody has known anything about it, raised the ratio from 14.78, or something in that neighborhood, to 15½, the whole civilized world that traded with her accepted that ratio.

It is not true that you must have the same ratio in every nation. I can show you that for years Great Britain had an established ratio 3 or 4 per cent different from that of France; Portugal had a different ratio; Spain had a different ratio; Russia and Germany had a different ratio; and yet they maintained a concurrent circulation where the circulation was bimetallic; and where it was not bimetallic they kept the purchasing power of their silver just as it had been and as it was everywhere else.

Mr. President, there have been more falsehoods and misstatements about the history of money in this country in the last twenty years than ever before. There has been a great deal of misrepresentation with reference to those of us who stand for the ancient methods, who stand for a system which has back of it the experience of the world. I repeat what I said the other day, that Dr. Johnson said the test of truth is experience. We have had the experience of the world; and when the Senator comes here and says, "You want bimetallism, and because you advocate it you are for monometallism," I resent it.

The best scientists of the world to-day are for bimetallism; and the Senator sat in conference with some of the brightest men of Europe who advocated bimetallism—Mr. Tirard, Mr. Molesworth, and various others I might mention if I were not afraid of my time running out. Lord Aldenham, when he was a private man, plain Mr. Gibbs, said years and years ago what he has said lately. When asked if England could maintain the relation of silver to gold at a parity, he said, "Any great nation in the world can do it"—not a little nation, but any great nation with great commercial transactions can do it.

Then the Senator called our attention to Mexico, as if there was a parallel between Mexico and this country. Mexico with a limited commerce, Mexico with a population unlike ours, Mexico with a population which has never known progress—to compare Mexico to the United States is a most remarkable thing in the Senate of the United States.

But I see the Presiding Officer has his gavel raised, and I shall have to close.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the great principle which governs in the coinage of metals into money is this: Any nation—and I challenge any Senator upon the other side to dispute the proposition—any nation can give to any two metals free, unlimited, and unrestricted coinage into full legal-tender money at the ratio prescribed by that nation, provided those two metals can not be brought to the mints of that nation in greater quantities than its people can use for monetary purposes. If anyone can dispute that proposition, I should like to hear him.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I think there is no one on this side of the Chamber who would not dispute it as a general proposition.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, that a nation can not give to two metals free and unlimited coinage into full legal-tender money at the ratio fixed by the nation if those two metals can not be brought to its mints in greater quantities than its people can use for monetary purposes?

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand the condition.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, that is it. There is the principle; you all admit it, and you must admit it. It resolves itself into this simple proposition: Open the mints of the United States to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, equal with gold on the old ratio, independently of any other nation on earth; then can silver and gold be brought to the United States in greater quantities than the people of the United States can use for monetary purposes?

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say no. I say, further, the question of the value of the metals to be coined into money is immaterial. It is not a question of the commercial value of the metal, not a question of the cost of the metal. The metal itself may be of no utility for any other purpose than for money.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Missouri pretend to say that the people of the world, who have five or six thousand millions of silver, would stop to inquire what was the purpose of the United States or how much currency they required when they could get twice the price for their silver in the United States that they could get anywhere else?

Mr. COCKRELL. Does anyone suppose they could get twice the price by Mr. Carlisle's method of taking $100,000,000 of gold and going and buying $200,000,000 of silver, then bringing it back to the mints and having it coined, just as if the people of the world were so infernally ignorant that when free coinage was given to silver and its commercial value was equal to its coinage value they would sell it at 50 cents on the dollar? That is a ridiculous proposition.

I say whenever the United States opens its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver equally with gold at the ratio of 16 to 1 there would be an unlimited demand for the silver of the world; and wherever that silver may be, the demand here at the ratio of 16 to 1 fixes its commercial value. There is no power on this earth that could prevent it, because every man, woman, and child knows that that silver bullion can be brought to our mints and can be coined into standard silver dollars at the ratio of 16 to 1, and that it would then buy all that we produce by the million, the hundreds of millions, and by the tens of billions of dollars every year just at the same prices they could be bought for with gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Missouri admit that if we could, under the conditions he has named, maintain gold and silver at a parity of 16 to 1, the price of silver in the United States would be greater than it would be anywhere else?

Mr. COCKRELL. It would be the same the world over, with only the difference of transportation; that is all.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why would it be?

Mr. COCKRELL. Why has gold in India always been worth so much? It is because they can ship it to England and get the products of England at the fixed ratio.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the mints of all the commercial nations of the world are open to gold, and not one of them is open to silver.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can not stop to argue that proposition. I will argue that before we get through. I will show you, and I can show you, that every nation on earth to-day is using silver. There is not a nation on earth to-day that uses only gold. Every gold-standard nation on earth must have silver; the money of the nations is in silver; the money the people want, though it is a limited legal tender; and that is the kind of bimetallism the Republican party now favors; that is the kind of bimetallism which the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] lead to—a minor, subsidiary, redeemable coin, and then to keep it on an equality with gold by redeeming it in gold. That is not bimetallism. That is gold monometallism.

The object of the Republican party is to make silver a limited legal tender, with restricted coinage, so that it can not be used in large transactions; and yet you say that is maintaining it, and that that is bimetallism. That is not the kind of bimetallism I favor. The kind of bimetallism I favor is the free and unlimited coinage of silver, equally with gold, at the ratio of 16 to 1, independently of every nation, kindred, and tongue on earth.

I do not want any international agreement. I do not believe in entangling alliances with any other nation. I believe in peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, but entangling alliances with none. I would not bind the United States in any agreement of a financial character in any shape, manner, or form.

We established our system in 1792 independently of every other nation when we had but 4,000,000 of population, and now, with 75,000,000 of population and resources and products for sale beyond the power of figures to enumerate, you talk about our not being able enough and strong enough to establish our own financial system. We can establish it; we can maintain it; we can bring every nation on this earth in subjection to it, either to adopt it or to assist in maintaining it. There is no danger. There will never be a deluge of silver in this world—never, never. It will never come; it can not come to this country.

The silver of the world is in money to-day, nearly all of it in full legal-tender money, and yet the Senator from Rhode Island asked me if the four and one-half billions of dollars of silver money in the world, worth only 50 cents on the dollar, would not all come here to our mints. He knows that all of that except six hundred millions is full legal tender and equal to gold in the countries where it is to-day. You know that. The records show it; your gold-standard records show it. I have it here directly from the mint, and you can not dispute it.

It is so in Germany, with a ratio of 15½ to 1, with 3 cents less silver in it than we have in our coin, and it is equal to gold and full legal-tender money. The silver in London, in England, is a limited legal tender for £10—40 shillings. It is the equal of gold there. So it is the world over. It is so in France, with a ratio of 15½ to 1. And yet the Senator talks to us as if we were idiots, and says the silver of Germany and of France, full legal-tender money equal to gold, would be sold at 50 cents on the dollar in order to be brought to our mints and coined here if we had free coinage—in other words, those people would sell it for 50 cents on the dollar when it is the equal of gold and is full legal tender with gold.

Ought not the Senator from Rhode Island to feel a little ashamed of himself for putting such a proposition as that in this intelligent Senate? I submit that is not the way to meet great questions. Let us meet them upon facts, upon principles, and upon the truth as it is recorded in the annals of all the nations.

Mr. President, this country, with the people inhabiting it, can make any laws on the financial question it desires, and it can maintain them. It is a disgrace to our people and our race to say we can not maintain a financial system at the ratio of 16 to 1 or 15½ to 1.

I do not want any alliance with any other nation. I do not want any assistance from any other nation. I believe we are great enough and powerful enough, with resources inexhaustible, with manufactures increasing year by year, and with the doors open to the transportation of these products to oriental countries, we can absorb all the silver that will ever come to our mints and then not have enough, and yet have sufficient gold in our country to meet every obligation and at no premium.

France and the Latin Union, unaided, maintained bimetallism from 1785 down to 1873, for our ratio of 16 to 1 was no aid to them. They maintained it, and their resources combined are not one-half, not one-fourth of the resources and power of the United States to-day. We can maintain it. France did it. We can maintain it without any aid from any other nation. Other nations can not do without silver.

What has become of the silver that has been produced since 1873? You can not find 20,000,000 ounces of it on earth, except in coin money and ornaments. I challenge any man to deny this. You can not do it. It has all been absorbed; it has all been consumed, because every nation has to use it as money and will have to do it for all time to come. You can not use gold as small money, as dollars, half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, nickels, and pennies, but you have to use silver.

Every nation is using it, and you can not take it away from them. Even their own governments can not do that. Germany can not take the thalers away from the German people. They are maintained there to-day. So it is with England; England can not take her silver away from her people, because 95 per cent of all the transactions of the people of London to-day are carried on in silver. There is no danger. Lay aside your fears. They are only nightmare dreams. There is no real danger. You will have no flood of silver; you will have no great inflation.

When we shall have passed a free-coinage law independent of any other nation on earth, then we shall see the commercial value of silver bullion in every nation that has intelligence enough to know of the existence of that law—we shall see the commercial value of silver bullion there equal to its coinage value less the cost of transportation. Then, please tell me who is hurt? What damage has been done? Who has been injured? When the commercial value of silver bullion is brought by our mints to an equality with its coinage value, who is harmed? Who has been robbed? Who has been despoiled? Who has been deprived of any rights or of any property or of anything that belongs to the true American citizen?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when my time expired and I sat down I was speaking about Mexico. I now desire to call further attention very briefly to that, so as to see whether there is any analogy between Mexico and the United States.

According to the mint report, which I have before me, Mexico has $3.71 of gold, silver, and paper money—less than $4 per capita. I have some doubt whether that is a correct statement, but it is near enough to show that Mexico is not a great commercial nation; that its commerce is very limited. There is just as much difference between that country and the United States as there is between one of our small States and the whole of the United States. We have States with one-fourth or one-fifth of the population of Mexico which have infinitely more commerce than has Mexico.

A Mexican gentleman of high character said to me that six-tenths of the people of Mexico had never slept in a bed and did not know what a bed was. There is as much intelligence in the higher circles in Mexico as there is here, but the remnant of the Indians and the intermixture of the races there have left a population which is unlike ours. Those people have neither the wants nor the aspirations that we have.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word about this fearo fa surplus of silver in this country if you open your mints. The silver of the world, it has been repeatedly stated (there was some examination made as to that by the commission in Europe), is practically all in money, and I recall hearing the distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. Evarts, say that there can be no question about the silver money; the only question is, Can we absorb the new money? And the reply was that if those people were using money they had to continue to use it. Every year now, although many of the mints are closed to silver, they are compelled to add to their stock of silver.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I interrupt the Senator? Does he say that the greater portion of the silver of the world is in the form of four or four and a half billions of coin silver?

Mr. TELLER. Of course I do not include in that silverware and articles of that kind which are held at such prices that they never would come in.

Mr. CHANDLER. My own belief is that there are eleven or twelve billions of silver in the world, coined and uncoined.

Mr. TELLER. Outside of India there is not any uncoined silver to speak of. What is five or ten millions?

Mr. CHANDLER. This city is full of silver plate.

Mr. TELLER. The silver plate will never come unless silver goes to $2 or $2.50.

Mr. CHANDLER. It may not come into coinage, but it is in existence.

Mr. TELLER. I am talking about the silver that is in danger. I do not like to be interrupted, because ten minutes is not very long.

Mr. CHANDLER. This does not come out of the Senator's time.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes, it does. At least it did before.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg pardon; but when the Senator says there is but four thousand millions, substantially, of silver in the world, he wants me to correct him.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to be corrected, because I think I stated it properly. That is the silver money of the world, and that is what these gentlemen are afraid of. I was diverted by what the Senator from New Hampshire said. I went to New York once, and I went through the great establishments that furnish silver, and there is not a kind of goods in what they call plain goods or flat goods that can come to the mint unless silver gets above 1.25. It would not come here except as it was worn out, and the older silver gets in the present day the more desirable it is for the people who have it to keep it and transmit it to their heirs.

We are dealing and we ought to deal only with the silver money. Seven hundred millions of it and more is limited tender. That is a low grade. England circulates one hundred and eleven millions at 14.28. She can not send it here. Germany's limited legal-tender money is all about the same. The best of them are at 15½, and none of them above it. You can not ship it here from one country in Europe and not lose from 4 to 5 cents.

Three cents and a fraction is the difference between our ratio here and theirs, and when you consider that much of the silver is worn, when you consider that they must lose interest and the cost of transportation, I say there is a difference of 5 per cent between theirs and ours. Why send it? Every dollar of it is doing money duty. France, with her great stock of silver, issues upon it paper and makes it do money duty; and I challenge any man to show me that the paper money of France, based upon silver and payable in silver or gold at the option of the bank, is worth any less than paper based on gold.

It has been shown before every commission that France has maintained absolutely the relation between her silver and gold at 15½ to 1. That is a bugbear which is put up to frighten somebody, and it either indicates a lack of sincerity and fairness or great ignorance on the part of those who contend for it here. I have tried to be rather temperate in debate, but I think when I am challenged and am told that my efforts here are to get this country on a silver basis, I have a right to speak as Senators speak their honest convictions, I have no doubt, as to myself.

Mr. President, take those countries. There is not one of them which can spare this money. You can not take $50,000,000 of silver out of Europe without creating a panic. We could absorb it in a night, for we have sent thirty millions of gold in a month and forty-five millions of gold in a month to Europe, and we have got back from Europe sometimes half of it in a month or pretty nearly that—twenty-five or thirty million dollars a month. You can not take any money out of Europe to-day without creating a panic. All Europe is in distress for fear we are going to call for gold to settle the balances of trade between us and them.

I know how useless it is to present these facts. I have been here twenty years and more, and I have heard the same old things repeated over and over again. When I followed the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in 1878, when he made the speech which I remember and which was read here by the Senator from Missouri, I recall that on this floor there were the same croakings, the same claim: "You can not circulate the two metals together, and you do not want to. You are after cheap money. That is what you are after."

Mr. President, I am for an honest money, and that is the money the contract calls for, whether it be gold or whether it be silver; and if the option is that the debtor may pay either, that is an honest money that he pays in. I deny that in the interest of so-called honesty the Government of the United States has a right to get rid of that great valuable privilege and give it to the bondholders, even if they are disposed to give now ninety-odd millions to them as a premium to refund their bonds not yet due.

Mr. President, I have heard a great many foolish things. I have heard a great many prophecies. I have seen this country absorbing and using ten times as much silver as the Secretary of the Treasury declared it was possible to circulate, and I have seen it circulating it without any pledge on the part of the Government that it would maintain the parity. No such pledge existed until 1893, and that had not the slightest influence upon the value of the silver dollar or the silver certificate.

The silver money of the country circulates at par because there is a necessity for it, because it is wanted, because it is needed, and any country, as was stated yesterday, that has a commerce and will keep her money within her commercial demands, may just as well circulate iron or copper or paper as to circulate gold. It is only a question whether she will have the courage and the wisdom to stop at the right point.

Every indication is that we have not yet reached a point where there could be any danger with silver; and if you open your mints, every dollar of it would be worth its face value as bullion, pounded up. It would stand the test in a fire, because it could be reconverted into money, and there is not a bit of bullion in the world that would not be, as the Senator from Missouri says, worth its face value at our mints, less what it would cost to get it here. It would not come. It would be needed there; but when they wanted it for mintage in India or England or anywhere else, the holder would say, "I know a place where I can put it into money, where I can buy everything that a human being wants—luxuries and necessaries of life and everything else. I know where it will discharge as much money duty as gold; and if you do not give me the price that I want for it, I will take it there." The man who holds any kind of commodity, with a known and a reachable market, makes the price of it. When a man knows the price in London for flour, he never sells it at New York at the bidder's wish. He sells it at the London price less the money that it requires him to get it there.

Will some one show me where there is a plethora of silver—where there is a superabundance of it—where the people are willing to get rid of it? Germany went to the gold basis in 1871, and she has got more than a hundred millions of full legal-tender silver that she can not get rid of. A few days since the Parliament of Germany determined to issue a large amount of subsidiary silver money because of the demands the agriculturists were making upon them to so do, and the statement was made there that the country was suffering for a lack of silver money.

Mr. COCKRELL. She has now one hundred and nineteen millions of limited legal-tender silver coin.

Mr. TELLER. Besides?

Mr. COCKRELL. Besides her eighty-eight millions of full legal tender.

Mr. TELLER. That makes somewhere over two hundred millions. As I said, Mr. President, England has one hundred and eleven millions circulating, so that if she were to send it here she would lose practically 10 per cent on it. Does anybody then think she is going to get rid of it? Will anybody take this table which the Director of the Mint has put here and show me a dollar that any nation wants to get rid of? You can not do it.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the question is put, I should like to give notice that I shall try to secure a vote upon the passage of the bill at as early an hour to-morrow as possible.

Mr. COCKRELL. Take it up after the morning business.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will ask to have it taken up after the morning business, and I will try to get a vote as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 15, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 14, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ELECTION CONTEST—WISE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the views of the minority in the contested-election case of Wise vs. Young. In doing this, I wish to state that the extension of time so kindly granted to me last week expired yesterday; but the House yesterday adjourned unexpectedly early, and this report was handed to the Clerk at 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority of the committee as just presented will be referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment in order that I may submit a privileged report?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for that purpose.

ELECTION CONTEST—ALDRICH VS. ROBBINS.

Mr. MANN. I present from the Committee on Elections No. 1 a report in the contested-election case of Aldrich vs. Robbins, which I ask may be printed and referred to the Calendar. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] wishes to present the views of a minority of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not distinctly hear what the gentleman from Illinois said; but, as I understand, he presents the report of a majority of the committee in the contested-election case of Aldrich vs. Robbins from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, a copy of which he has furnished to me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to submit now the views of the minority?

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to submit now the views of the minority and to ask that they be printed with the report of the committee. In submitting these views, I beg to state that one of my colleagues on the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FOX], was present at the time the case was heard and determined, but is now absent by reason of the serious illness of his wife. He has authorized me in writing to sign his name to the views of the minority, which I have done.

The SPEAKER. The report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, will be referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on the motion which I now renew, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills, I trust we may reach some understanding as to the time at which general debate shall terminate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest that the general debate run for two days.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I can not agree to that. In view of the fact that we shall have a week's discussion on the Puerto Rican bill, giving members ample opportunity to be heard, I think that the time for general debate on the legislative appropriation bill ought to be limited to, say, 4 o'clock to-day. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that all general debate on the bill just named be closed at 4 o'clock to-day and that then the bill be taken up under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider general appropriation bills, he asks unanimous consent that general debate on the legislative appropriation bill be limited to 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I can not consent to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Georgia. The question is, Will the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose stated?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will not the gentleman from Georgia consent that the general debate close at 5 o'clock this afternoon?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am willing that the general debate run until half past 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, and that then we take up the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I can not consent to that.

Mr. CANNON. May I be allowed just a moment? We are all aware that on Friday the bill from the Ways and Means Committee is to be called up, on which general discussion will be allowed for a week or longer. Now, it is very desirable that this bill should pass before the expiration of the week. If we can close general debate to-day, we can pass the bill under the five-minute rule to-morrow.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to interpolate a remark or ask a question right there? I suppose that the committee in considering the revenue bill expects to have a debate of a week or more. Now, if we can get a statement that we would have, say, ten days of debate on that subject, I have no doubt that the gentleman from Georgia would agree to the proposition which the gentleman from Indiana now makes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas will suspend a moment. The Chair must again invite the House to come to order and to cease conversation. We are here to transact public business intelligently, and it can not be done unless the House is in order. All gentlemen will please cease conversation.

Mr. McRAE. You will appreciate the importance of this question when you understand that we have only six days in the week, and we get out of that but fourteen hours. There are fourteen members of the committee, and those who are not members of the committee will have no opportunity to discuss that measure. For that reason there is a desire to discuss it upon this bill. It would be more pertinent upon the other bill, and if we can get an arrangement which would allow discussion on the Philippine and Puerto Rico questions, it should be upon the other bill rather than this.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that his arithmetic is a little off. Six days a week would give us thirty hours.

Mr. McRAE. Fourteen to a side. The gentleman from Tennessee informs me that there would be only fourteen; he meant fourteen on a side.

Mr. PAYNE. There are seventeen members of the committee. If they all desired to speak, why they would use half of that time.

Mr. McRAE. If we could get an understanding that there would be plenty of time for general debate on that measure, I have no doubt that the gentleman from Georgia would agree to the request that is now made by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why not have an agreement made now on the Puerto Rican bill, that we have after the completion of this bill and all the following week until Monday, and that the bill be then considered under the five-minute rule on the following Monday. I do not suppose it would take long to dispose of it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, so far as I am concerned——

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would give us two more days for general debate.

Mr. PAYNE. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that a vote be taken on the Puerto Rican bill a week from Monday next.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And it then be discussed under the five-minute rule?

Mr. PAYNE. But the final disposition of it be made on that day. I desire to have that done, because one of the members of the committee on this side expects to be away the following day on some peremptory business; and if we can have an agreement, we can have that arrangement made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman agree that after the reading of the Journal on that day it be taken up for discussion under the five-minute rule? I presume it will not take more than an hour and a half, and there will probably be no amendments offered.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; if the vote be taken on that day.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That will do.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. With that understanding, I am willing.

Mr. CANNON. Let me submit to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Indiana again state his request?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Illinois wants to make a suggestion.

Mr. CANNON. To the gentleman from Georgia as well as the gentleman from Indiana. It seems to me we would get more debate about a thing not about this bill if we would pass this bill through in an orderly way, so that we can take the bill up at once and confine ourselves to this bill, and pass it, with the agreement that whatever is left of to-day or to-morrow should be devoted to general debate. It seems to me that would give more time for general debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How much does this bill carry?

Mr. CANNON. About $25,000,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It ought to be discussed a day itself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will agree that general debate run to-day and that we take the bill up for consideration under the five-minute rule to-morrow.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. PAYNE. If this bill should consume Friday, we do not want to take up the revenue bill on Saturday, but want to take it up on Monday of the following week.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We are willing to make that agreement with you.

Mr. PAYNE. I am perfectly willing to make an agreement to take up the revenue bill next week, with the understanding that the final vote be taken on that day week; that the committee rise and report the bill to the House on Monday week at 4 o'clock.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would not give us sufficient time. If you will make it Wednesday of next week——

Mr. CANNON. The white-buttoned mandarins of the largest committee of the House had better let us pass our little appropriation bills and take such time as they see proper on important universal questions.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed on this bill to-day and that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, it be taken up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With the understanding, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that general debate on the legislative appropriation bill be closed with to-day's session and that after the approval of the Journal on to-morrow it be taken up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is agreed to with the understanding that the revenue bill is to be taken up on Saturday and voted on a week from the Monday following.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better agree now that the revenue bill be taken up next Monday, and then we will agree to close it in some way at that time.

Mr. MAHON. I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. MAHON. I think we had better take up the administrative bill and pass that, and then consider the other when it comes up. Let us dispose of one at a time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to my request?

Mr. MAHON. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; we object to that unless we make the other arrangement. I mean the agreement as to debate on the Puerto Rico bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SMITH of Illinois, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. GRIFFITH, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BAILEY of Kansas, indefinitely, on account of important business.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair, for the consideration of appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of an appropriation bill the title to which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 8317, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DALZELL, having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2356. An act extending the powers and functions of the Court of Private Land Claims to June 30, 1902;

S. 79. An act to construct a road to the national cemetery at Dover, Tenn.;

S. R. 36. Joint resolution to carry into effect two resolutions of the Continental Congress, directing monuments to be erected to the memory of Gens. Francis Nash and William Lee Davidson, of North Carolina;

S. 1356. An act for the relief of Edwin L. Field;

S. 1631. An act to encourage enlistment in the United States Navy;

S. 1535. An act to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Navy and to regulate promotion therein;

S. 1632. An act to amend "An act authorizing certain officers of the Navy and Marine Corps to administer oaths," approved January 25, 1895;

S. 2447. An act to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army;

S. 726. An act for the relief of Alice Walsh;

S. 2334. An act to authorize Hon. Arthur S. Hardy, at present envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Greece, Roumania, and Servia, to accept the decoration tendered to him by the Shah of Persia while he was minister of the United States to that country;

S. 2022. An act to authorize Rear-Admiral William T. Sampson, United States Navy; Capt. Henry C. Taylor, United States Navy; Capt. Francis A. Cook, United States Navy; Capt. Charles D. Sigsbee, United States Navy; Capt. French E. Chadwick, United States Navy; Capt. Caspar F. Goodrich, United States Navy; Commander William W. Mead, United States Navy; Commander James H. Dayton, United States Navy; Commander Frederick M. Symonds, United States Navy, and Commander Chapman C. Todd, United States Navy, to accept orders and decorations tendered to them by the Government of Venezuela;

S. 630. An act for the relief of Mrs. Harriet D. Newson;

S. R. 60. Joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of Gen. Francis E. Spinner, late Treasurer of the United States;

S. 2681. An act for the establishment of a joint light-house and fog-signal station on the coast of Alaska;

S. 1289. An act to provide for the construction of an additional light-ship for use on the coast of California, Oregon, Washington, or Alaska, as exigencies may determine;

S. 983. An act for the relief of Lindley C. Kent and Joseph Jenkins, as the sureties of Frank A. Webb;

S. 165. An act for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased;

S. 945. An act for the purchase and construction of a launch for the customs service at and in the vicinity of Astoria, Oreg.;

S. 2708. An act to amend an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899;

Senate concurrent resolution 26.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to have a survey made, and submit a report and an estimate for deepening and properly improving the channel through the outer bar in the Gulf of Mexico near the mouth of Mobile Bay.

S. 2840. An act for enlarging the public building at Portland, Oreg., situated between Morrison, Yamhill, Fifth, and Sixth streets, in said city;

S. 2366. An act to authorize the establishment at some point on Beaufort Harbor, North Carolina, of a station for the investigation of problems connected with marine-fishery interests of the middle and south Atlantic coast;

S. 557. An act for the relief of Thomas Rosbrugh;

S. 76. An act for the relief of the University of Kansas; and

S. 1749. An act for the payment to Joshua T. Roberts of balance due for surveying public lands.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 7739. An act to amend an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 5288. An act relating to lights on steam pilot vessels.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. CHARLES A. CHICKERING, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing the presiding officer had appointed as said committee Mr. PLATT of New York, Mr. MASON, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. TURNER, and Mr. SULLIVAN.

CUSTOMS AND INTERNAL REVENUE IN THE ISLAND OF PUERTO RICO.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice, in view of the action which has been taken, that I shall call up the Puerto Rico bill on Monday next immediately after the reading of the Journal.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a short explanation of this bill. I call the attention of members of the committee to House Report No. 289. They will notice by this report that the estimates amount to $25,000,000, and that the amount recommended by the committee is $23,874,000, or $1,147,000 less than the estimate.

Mr. Chairman, by a close examination of the report members can ascertain the number of new places created by this bill, and the number of salaries increased. They will see under the heads of the different departments—Library of Congress, Executive Office, Treasury Department, and so on—the number of salaries increased in each particular department. We create 168 new places. Of these places 77 are created in the Congressional Library. The committee find, on a careful examination of the conditions there, that it is absolutely necessary, if the Library is to be utilized and be a benefit to the members and the public in general, that there must be increased appropriations, so that a proper index can be made of the books and the proper work accomplished that shall make the Library a benefit. In that number are included 15 places in the copyright department. The business of the copyright department has increased very rapidly. It is self-sustaining; it pays a revenue to the Government above the expenses of maintaining it, and we feel it absolutely necessary to give the copyright department the force that it desires.

I desire now to call attention of the members to the fact that in all of our Departments a number of clerks are now being carried on the rolls who are incompetent. And but for this fact the legislative appropriation bill would not provide, in my opinion, for a single new place. The Committee on Appropriations, by a section in this bill and one carried in the bill for the current year, 1900, have sought to avoid this difficulty and inserted this provision: "That the appropriation herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the payment of any person permanently incapacitated." This provision was in the bill for the fiscal year 1900, but, notwithstanding that fact, we ascertain that in different Departments a great many clerks are carried who are wholly incompetent to perform their duties.

We find in the Auditor's Office of the War Department—and I want to say that the Auditor for the War Department is one of the most efficient officers that we have—we have 32 incompetent people, according to his statement; incompetent to perform a sufficient amount of services to warrant their being continued on the rolls. And yet they state that it is impossible to secure the dismissal of these persons; that the minute they propose to dismiss a clerk members of the House or Senators immediately come and insist that this particular clerk shall not be removed. We find there are 23 clerks in one office, where there are only 336 clerks employed, who are over 65 years of age; we find 9 clerks between 70 and 80 years of age, and we find 2 above 80 years of age; and we find all through the Departments of the Government that to-day they are carrying upon the rolls incompetent clerks, notwithstanding the provision of the bill last year, and this year they are continued to be carried on the rolls as clerks.

I simply call the attention of the House to that fact, for I believe there ought to be a remedy; and unless there is a remedy applied, the number of incompetent clerks will increase year by year until we shall have what will in fact be a great civil pension roll in the Departments of the Government.

We have continued for another year the temporary clerks provided for in previous sessions of Congress. It was recommended that a number of these clerks be taken up and placed on the permanent list; but the Committee on Appropriations, after giving this matter careful consideration, do not believe that at this time any number of these temporary clerks should be placed on the permanent list. The condition of work now in the Departments is such that we do not believe they can determine at this time as to the number of clerks that ought to be made permanent, so we have provided that the temporary force be carried for another year.

We find after careful investigation that it is absolutely necessary that this force be continued. Mr. Scofield, the chief clerk of the War Department, in reply to a question whether or not the whole temporary force would be needed, said that it was absolutely necessary that this force should be continued. The Auditor of the War Department makes a similar statement, and numerous other gentlemen state on this point that it is absolutely necessary that this temporary force be continued another year.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask my colleague a question, with his consent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to know whether the heads of these Departments make any recommendations with respect to the "dead wood," which the gentleman has spoken of as now being there?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no desire to involve this House in a discussion of the civil-service laws, but I will say that there are some recommendations from these officers of the Departments. Among others is one from the Auditor for the War Department, who gives his opinion in the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 7, 1900.

GENTLEMEN: Replying to your personal request that I furnish you with the ages and efficiency of the clerks in this department, I report as follows: I have 336 clerks and laborers on the roll. Of these, 15 are between 45 and 50; 33 between 50 and 55; 66 between 55 and 60; 40 between 60 and 65; 23 between 65 and 70; 9 between 70 and 80; 2 above 80; total, 188 over 45 years of age; 74 above 60 years of age. Of these, 32 are so low in their proficiency that they ought to be dropped from the service at once, but careful inquiry would lead me to believe that the opposition from Congressional and other important influence would be so great that there is not a single one that could be discharged upon the charge of inefficiency.

Also, replying to your inquiry as to my opinion regarding civil service as now applied to the Departments, the above figures would seem to me to indicate all that one could argue against the present rules, which will continue clerks of such ages indefinitely. The usual reply that is made to this—that it is upon the executive head to dismiss for cause—will not answer. The best evidence of this is the condition that exists. It is almost impossible to prefer such charges against elderly people as will make a cause for dismissal, in view of the fact that usually their experience makes them correct, even though the amount of work they turn off is not more than one-half or one-third the quantity that should be disposed of by a clerk drawing the compensation they do. The rules for promotion from one salary to another are such that a high-school scholar will stand better examinations for promotion than clerks with years of experience and who have proved themselves highly competent in the work they are doing, so that the question of efficiency in the work performed bears very little upon the right to increase of pay, and the theory advanced by civil service—that merit in the service is recognized by promotion—does not follow.

There are in the service to-day hundreds of clerks who make it a professional business of posting up on rudimental education, so as to be able to pass a high average on the examinations provided for, and who are not worth anything at all to the public service, as they are indolent, careless in their work, and a hindrance to others in their work, and the conditions cited are not exceptions. I believe that some amendments must be made to the civil-service laws to correct these evils, as well as to reduce the average age of employees in the service. You look at my roll and charge me with having 336 clerks, but I lack very much of having that many efficient clerks, as I believe you will readily admit.

Respectfully,
F. H. MORRIS,
Auditor.

The COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I believe it was stated by the Commissioner of Pensions that in the case of one incompetent clerk 14 Senators and a number of Representatives came there to insist that the incompetent ought not to be discharged.

So the only remedy I can see is to provide by law a tenure of office—to provide that clerks shall remain in office only a certain length of time; that if they remain longer they must be reappointed. Thus there would be placed upon the head of the Department, if he should undertake to reappoint an incompetent man, the responsibility of such action.

Mr. BROWN. Will not the gentleman put into the RECORD the letter from which I understand he has just read a sentence?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not read anything from the letter; I simply gave my conclusions.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the gentleman whether he will not put into the RECORD the letters which I think he holds in his hand?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I shall be glad to do so, with the consent of the House. I believe if we could so regulate this matter as to get out of these Departments the incompetent clerks, then in place of increasing salaries by 168 new places, the salaries could be decreased to the extent of 1,000 or 1,500.

I desire especially to call attention to every new place created and every salary increased. The members of this House no doubt understand that some of the provisions in the bill may be subject to points of order. While we believe that in every instance where the bill increases a salary or creates a new office the action of the committee was right with reference to the efficiency of the service and in view of the additional work which these employees have to perform—while we believe that these provisions ought to stay in the bill, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that some of these provisions may be taken out on a point of order.

The committee, in reporting this bill, have undertaken, in the report furnished, to put every member in possession of the changes that are proposed to be made, so that he may clearly understand what the committee have done. We have undertaken to furnish to the House complete information, so that by going over the report, which is brief, covering only some 21 pages, members may ascertain all the changes proposed to be made in this bill of some two hundred-odd pages.

We have placed upon the bill some limitations to which I wish to call attention.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to correct a wrong inference which might be drawn from a remark which I made a while ago. When I put my question to the gentleman I was under the impression that he was talking about the Navy Department instead of the War Department. In my judgment we have now in the War Department the most competent Auditor that we have had there in the last thirty years.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I agree with the gentleman. I believe that all members who have had dealings with the Auditor of the War Department will certify that he is one of the most competent men who have ever occupied that position.

Now, as to the limitations upon the bill, beginning on page 5, it will be observed that in connection with the Capitol police force it is provided that the captain and lieutenant shall be selected jointly by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives; that with reference to the privates and watchmen, one-half of those men be selected by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives; and that the officers, privates, and watchmen of the Capitol police shall, when on duty, wear the regulation uniform.

Heretofore this force has been selected by a board composed of the Architect of the Capitol, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House. The committee believes that this force ought to be equally divided between the House and the Senate, and for that reason we put on that provision.

You will notice that we provide for inventories of books, etc., at the Executive Mansion. I think there is no question but what that provision ought to go on.

We provide further—

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to detail deputy collectors of internal revenue in one district for special duty in other districts, and the deputy collectors so detailed shall be paid by the collector of internal revenue and disbursing agent for the district for which they are appointed and for which the allowance for their salary and expenses is made, the same as if all their services had been performed and expenses incurred in that district.

In connection with the appropriation for the salaries and expenses of agents and the fees and expenses of gaugers, storekeepers, and storekeeper-gaugers in the Internal Revenue Service, the following:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to detail gaugers, storekeeper-gaugers, and storekeepers appointed in one district for special or regular duty in other districts, and the accounts of gaugers, storekeeper-gaugers, and storekeepers so detailed shall be adjusted and paid in the district where they are appointed, without regard to the number of districts in which they may have been employed in any one month, the same as if all their services had been performed and expenses incurred in the district in which appointed.

That provision is necessary because, under a ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury, a deputy who is appointed in one district and who goes to follow up a case and work in another district would have to be paid pro rata out of the different districts. This provision provides for his payment from the district where he is appointed and where he starts to pursue his work, and has been the custom in the past, until a recent decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Another provision in connection with the appropriation for public buildings and grounds in the city of Washington is as follows:

Of the foregoing amounts appropriated under public buildings and grounds, the sum of $27,130 shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

That is for taking care of these little parks around the city, and the committee were of the opinion that one-half of the expense ought to be borne by the District of Columbia.

Mr. MUDD. What is the amount?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Twenty-seven thousand one hundred and thirty dollars. This provision passed the House at the last session of Congress, but was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. MUDD. Where is that provision to which you have referred?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is on page 6 of the report. It is the opinion of Colonel Bingham, in charge of the public grounds of this city, that this provision is just and ought to be carried on the bill.

We undertook at this time to take up and place on the permanent list the employees under the Secretary of the Navy who are paid from appropriations for increase of the Navy and other appropriations, but we found it almost impossible at this time, with so many new ships being constructed, to take up all the employees and place them on the legislative bill and provide for them specifically. So in order that Congress be informed as to the number employed by the Secretary of the Navy and the salaries paid we put this provision on the bill:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to submit in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1902, and annually thereafter, under the respective bureaus and offices of the Navy Department, a statement in detail showing the number of persons employed during the previous fiscal year and the rate of compensation of each under appropriations for "Increase of the Navy" or other general appropriations.

This will give to the members of Congress a statement showing the number employed and the salaries paid.

We also put on a provision in connection with the appropriation for draftsmen, engineers, and others in the Hydrographic Office in the Navy Department, as follows:

And no other fund appropriated shall be used in payment for such or similar services in the Hydrographic Office.

And also the following:

No expenditure shall be incurred or authorized for personal services or otherwise under the Hydrographic Office during the fiscal year 1901 except as herein authorized by appropriations under the Navy Department or under appropriations that may be made for printing and binding.

Heretofore in the Hydrographic Office they have been paying for personal service out of general appropriations. We undertook to appropriate in this bill a sufficient sum to pay for all the services in that office, and then to say that they shall not employ and pay anyone out of their general appropriation.

Members of Congress will at once recognize the necessity for this provision. If the Hydrographic Office can take general appropriations and employ indiscriminately such number of people as they desire, then we have no way of ascertaining the number of people who are being employed in the Government service and the amount paid to each; and it is evidently the desire of Congress to understand at all times who are being employed and how much they are being paid. And to avoid as far as possible the payment for personal service out of general appropriations, this provision has been put on the bill.

I should like now to yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague for a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I should like to have a little more information about the condition of the public service in the various Departments. I would ask the gentleman if he knows or can approximate the number of incompetent employees in any one of the Departments?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I should say that in the Office of the Auditor for the War Department the statement shows that 10 per cent of the employees are—well, you might say, incompetent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Ten per cent?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Their efficiency is very low.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is there a like percentage of incompetency in all the other Departments?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In the General Land Office the Commissioner, Mr. Hermann, estimates that 40 out of 400 are incompetent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is 10 per cent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is 10 per cent. Here are two very competent officials whom I have selected from the list—the Auditor for the War Department and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Their estimates show 10 per cent of incompetent employees.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the chiefs of these various Departments make that admission in letters addressed to your committee, do they?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, either in hearings before our committee or in letters.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And do they confess their inability to correct that evil?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They confess their inability to correct the evil.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Under the operation of the civil-service law are they not required to discharge incompetent men from the public service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They are, but like all of us they are human, and while I have no desire to criticise Members of the House or Senators of the United States, when a number of Senators and Members of Congress come to these gentlemen and insist that an employee shall not be discharged, the gentleman can readily understand how difficult it is.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The bill reported by the gentleman carries an appropriation for the payment of these incompetent employees, I presume?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It certainly does, because the committee has no way of ascertaining who these persons are.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And no power to discharge them, of course?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No power to discharge, and we are simply bringing this fact before the House that they may understand the conditions. The Committee on Appropriations, by inserting the provisions found in section 4, on page 124 of the bill, has undertaken, by repeating what is now the law, to call attention to this condition and to bring about the discharge of these incompetent employees.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In just a moment. I will read section 4 of the bill:

That the appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons permanently incapacitated for performing such service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where is that provision to be found?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is on page 124 of the bill. The committee seeks by this provision to call attention to what is now the law, and thereby to prevent the payment, out of sums appropriated by this bill, for the services of incompetent employees; but gentlemen may stand here and talk about this during this session of Congress and the coming session of Congress, and the incompetent employees will stay in the Department. If the head of a Department goes to a chief clerk and down the line to try to ascertain who are incompetent, I will say to you that he has a very hard job, because they do not try to aid him in picking out the incompetent employees. And why?

Mr. SHATTUC. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY (continuing). Because they are there together, they have been there together for years; friendships there are just as they are here; and they are not going to try to get the old incompetent fellow out that has been there for many years. We have got to have some legislation upon this question that will remedy this evil; and if we do not, it is going to keep on growing and growing until we are going to have a great civil pension list.

Mr. SHATTUC. Is it not your opinion, if the heads of the Departments should dismiss these men and put in the men that Congressmen and Senators recommend, that the Senators and Congressmen would not ask them to keep these incompetent people?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no doubt that is correct, because when you give them the right to employ another man they would recommend competent men.

Mr. SHATTUC. Would it not be better for spoilsmen to recommend men who would be competent rather than to keep the incompetent men in the way they are now being kept?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reply to the gentleman's question, I can only say, with reference to this temporary force that has been employed, it is admitted by those who favor civil service and are at the heads of the different Departments that this temporary force, placed there within the last two or three years, is a very competent force; that they are more competent than the force secured through the civil service. They are younger men, men better qualified for the particular service to which they are assigned, and all along the line more efficient than the force secured through the civil service.

Mr. PEARRE. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Does he think it likely that the heads of the Departments and bureaus will appoint more competent men to the positions than those recommended by members of Congress and Senators; in other words——

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reply to that, I will say that when they ask for the appointment of any particular class, they designate the kind of a man they want. If they want an accountant, they say to the gentleman, "Will you furnish me an accountant?" and if they want an accountant you would not send them a laborer. It is the experience that Members of Congress and Senators, if given the opportunity to furnish a particular kind of man, furnish that kind.

Mr. PEARRE. Would it not give the heads of the Departments power to exercise their discretion solely, without any consultation of Members of Congress and Senators? These come from the people, and knowing what the people want, we would be more familiar with them than the heads of the Departments.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The head of a bureau would certainly get himself into trouble by doing that. There is no doubt but that Members of Congress and Senators would make his life a burden in a very short time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman if these men were incompetent when they entered the service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think not. I have no information except such as I get from the bureaus.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then how did they become incompetent after entering the service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. By old age and disease and the other ordinary ways by which men become incompetent to perform duties that they were previously competent to discharge.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am glad the gentleman has recommended action in regard to the estimates of the Navy Department. There has been a disposition there, even in the estimates this year, to lump such matters instead of specifying them.

Mr. PEARRE. What guaranty will there be that the heads of the bureaus or the Departments will not simply exercise their discretion in reference to their own incompetents rather than the incompetents of a member of Congress?

Mr. HEMENWAY. None whatever. I want the gentleman to understand that I am not suggesting a remedy. I am simply calling the attention of the House to the subject, so that they may study the matter out and suggest a remedy.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from Indiana prepared to state about how many incompetent clerks are now employed in the Government service in Washington?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I can give no more definite statement than I have made, which came from two most efficient officers, and they estimated that about 10 per cent of the clerks under them are virtually incompetent; very low in efficiency.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe that this provision in the bill will result in the discharge of that 10 per cent?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The same provision was in the bill for the fiscal year 1900, and it did not result in securing the discharge of the incompetent clerks.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman believe that one of the reasons for reporting so many incompetent clerks is the desire to have the proposition now pending for a civil pension bill go through the House?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly not. I do not think the gentlemen had that in view at all. They are both very honorable and competent men. It was not volunteered information, but information asked for by the committee.

Mr. MANN. The information is ascertained from sources below the gentlemen who make the report?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I should like to say that for the last four years the Subcommittee on Appropriations having in charge the legislative appropriation bill have been trying to ascertain the number of inefficient clerks in the Departments. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] required at one time the different Departments to give the ages of the clerks, their efficiency record, and their employment, by which the committee could ascertain the number of inefficient clerks.

It was brought about by the Secretary of the Treasury saying, about two or three years ago, that he had a roll of honor. We undertook to investigate that roll of honor, and we then ascertained that all through these Departments were a great many inefficient clerks, and that they could not get them out. We have been undertaking since then to get them out, and in the bill for 1900 we put in the provision referred to, thinking by that to get them out. We have constantly urged upon the Department officials that came before us that these incompetent clerks must be got rid of, and yet they do not go out; and they say that they can not get them out. I have no doubt that if this provision passed, that they will not go out, but will be continued there. I am only calling attention to the condition of affairs and the statements made by men in a position to know. They think the civil service is to a great extent responsible for the condition, and that there ought to be some amendment.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any report from the Weather Bureau as to the number of incompetents in that Bureau? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have not; we do not deal with the Weather Bureau; that is under the control of the Agricultural Department, and goes to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SHATTUC and Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Indiana yield—the gentleman from Ohio or the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHATTUC. The gentleman from Indiana is looking in the wrong direction. The gentleman from Ohio is over here. [Laughter.] When the gentleman from Ohio is mentioned, it is not necessary to always look over on that side of the Chamber—there are others. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Indiana says that 10 per cent of the employees in Washington are regarded as incompetents?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not say that. We have the statement of two of the officials, who say that of the clerks under them 10 per cent are inefficient.

Mr. SHATTUC. Well, probably that will hold good as to all of them. How many employees are there in the city of Washington under the Government?

Mr. HEMENWAY. About 10,000 are provided for in this bill.

Mr. SHATTUC. All together, I understand, there are 20,000; so that, according to the gentleman's figures, there are 2,000 men who are simply living off the Government's charity.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I said about fifteen hundred.

Mr. SHATTUC. And yet, when we spoilsmen who recommend some old soldier who fought to maintain the Government and the flag—a good man—to take one of these incompetents' places, it is said that we ought not to have that privilege.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to ask if the committee have made any attempt to learn from the Department the names of these incompetent clerks?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We did at one time.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Did you succeed in getting them?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We succeeded in getting a limited number.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to ask if it would not be well to provide in the bill that the appropriation should not be applied to those specific incompetent persons?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Massachusetts can see that reaching through all the Departments that would be almost impossible. Congress could not undertake to name all the people that should be employed or discharged in the Departments.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not see how it would be impossible. It might be disagreeable.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think it would be impossible.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me a moment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. As my colleague knows, I am not this year upon the subcommittee that has this bill in charge, although I have heretofore been. He has mentioned the fact that I have some interest in this question, and I believe I drew the provision in the bill for this current year. Now, I understand that those in charge of the employees throughout the Departments told us last year that they had a large number of incompetents, or a considerable number of incompetents. We enacted into law a measure making it compulsory upon the various Departments to discharge these men. What excuse have they given your subcommittee this year for not complying with the law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The pressure brought to bear by the members of Congress, as I believe I have already stated, and the statement, which I think the gentleman from Massachusetts heard, of the Commissioner of Pensions when he gave one instance where 14 Senators and many Members of Congress came and insisted that an incompetent employee should not be discharged. And the excuse given right along is that when they undertake to discharge one of these incompetent clerks, such pressure is brought to bear that it is almost impossible to get the employee out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Indiana

[Mr. HEMENWAY] allow me to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I should be glad to answer.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what reason did those people at the Departments give his subcommittee for not putting out those incompetents?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. If I may be permitted to answer, I will say that the subcommittee of which I was a member made inquiry, and we found that the question of superannuation was growing to be so serious a one in the Departments that the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to preserve the efficiency of the force in his Department, was undertaking to establish what, in effect, was a pension roll. We drew a provision, which was enacted by Congress, against the establishment of any such roll; we made it mandatory upon the various heads of Departments to discharge their superannuated employees. They have not done so; they have defied the authority of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that this provision will compel them to do so?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. This provision was in the bill of last year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not this provision, that incompetent employees shall not be paid?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; that was in the last bill.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Yes, sir. They are simply defying the authority of Congress as a body, upon the individual representations of members of Congress. Permit me to give an illustration right in my own committee. The Commissioner of Pensions told us the year before last that he would be better off if he could discharge 100 clerks; that the remaining 1,700 would do the work better if he were allowed to select those to be discharged himself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why did he not do it?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. We suggested to him, "Why do you not do it?" He had said, "Let me select the clerks, and I will better the service in my office with a reduced force and save money to the Government." We told him that he must do it anyway. He undertook to do it, and the very first man who came to him to intercede in behalf of one of the number selected for discharge was a member of our subcommittee. I am not going to say anything more about that, except that I was not the member.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And I was not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That being the case, does not the gentleman think there ought to be established an age limit, on attaining which employees should be retired, just as there is an age limit in the Army and Navy?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do. Although I believe in the present civil-service system, yet I will say that if we do not do something to meet this question of superannuation the service will break down.

Mr. WACHTER. I should like to know if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] can inform us what percentage of these incompetent employees are females?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have no information on that subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I supposed that I was through with the gentleman from Ohio on this question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated that the Commissioner of Pensions has said that if he could only discharge 100 clerks and fill the remaining places with persons of his own selection he could thereby greatly benefit the service. Now, does not the gentleman admit that the Commissioner of Pensions can not do this under the beautiful, far-reaching administration of the civil-service law; that where the removal of incompetent employees is desired there must be a trial before a sort of court, with a prescribed set of rules, to act upon each one of these individual cases?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that I believe the provision to which he refers, but which I do not understand to go to the extent he describes, was an unwise provision. But I do not understand that there is any difficulty in the way of the head of a Department discharging any of his subordinates if he will certify that they are incompetent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there not an Executive order forbidding that identical thing being done?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not so understand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was not such a provision inserted within a year upon the demand of the civil-service organization?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not so understand. I do understand that a man can not be discharged except for cause stated, and after an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very good; that is just what I said.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. But I venture to say that if the head of a Department, who is responsible for his work, undertakes to assert that the man is incompetent, that would be a sufficient reason for discharge. If that is not so, it is time Congress should go to work and make it so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We know they should; but they will not do it. The idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to be that if the head of a Department will only assert himself he may repeal the order of the Executive forbidding him to do what he undertakes to do.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not so understand the matter at all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I believe that there is no limitation upon the time; that each member obtaining the floor may occupy the time allowed under the rule. I give way to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] is recognized in his own right.

Mr. BELL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. I propose to yield any time to which I may be entitled to my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and will ask the Chair to recognize him at some later period in the day when he may claim the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] announces that he desires to be recognized and to yield his time to his colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who will claim it and be recognized some time later in the day.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the bill under consideration in all particulars, and this morning I wish to consider a question which, in my judgment, it is our duty to the American people to consider, relative to saving a leakage in the revenues of the Government.

A few days ago the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and myself got into a controversy here over the question of deposits in the national banks. I made the assertion that we had a hundred million dollars of deposits of Government funds in the national banks, and that these deposits had as complete and as well recognized a value on the market in every part of this country as have cotton, corn, wheat, or any other commodity.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], ever the defender of banks, whether right or wrong, insisted that these deposits were not profitable to the banks, and said that the fact that only 69 out of 3,600 had qualified for this money was evidence that they were not profitable.

Believing that my contention was right, and insisting that only the powerful banks got the benefit of this gift of the Government, I wrote to the State treasurers in the different States of this Union and asked what they did with the funds belonging to the State.

I have had replies enough to show beyond question or any chance of controversy that the public deposits of this Government have as well defined a market value as corn, wheat, or cotton, and that that value on daily balances is as well fixed in New York, in Boston, in Florida, in Minnesota, and every other part of this country as any other commodity.

I insisted then—and these letters have but confirmed my opinion—that the policy of this Government, of giving the deposits to the national banks, offers a premium to the banks to precipitate a tightness in the money market or to precipitate a panic to get more free money.

Now, sir, I want to read to this House, and I want to appeal to every individual member of this House, not as a Republican or as a Democrat, but as the agent of the public to criticise these reports from the different State treasurers and see what the States make out of the money of the people deposited in the national banks at the different State capitals.

I will begin with the great State of New York, where, if there is a plethora of money anywhere, you can put your finger on it there. I will now read from the reply of the State treasurer of New York. In reply to my letter, the treasurer of the State of New York says "that the State receives on deposit, subject to check at any moment, 1½ per cent per annum."

Bear that in mind. In the State of New York, on the daily balances of the State fund, subject to check at any moment, they receive 1½ per cent per annum.

The State treasurer of the State of Kansas writes that they keep a fund of $20,000 in a national bank in New York, subject to daily checks, upon which that bank pays them 2 per cent on the daily balances.

The State treasurer of the State of Maine says that that State obtains 2 per cent on their balances kept in banks in other States, and very probably in New York.

Now, let us see what they take on more permanent deposits. I read further now from the treasurer of the State of New York:

Banks holding canal fund moneys pay 3 per cent, as their deposits are more stable.

Now, my friends, that is what the State treasurer of New York obtains upon the funds of the State of New York.

The next answer is from the State of Pennsylvania. The treasurer sends me simply section 6, of the State statutes, which says that the State treasurer of Pennsylvania shall keep certain funds in certain banks, and those banks shall make all collections for the State without charge, and in addition to these services they shall pay the State of Pennsylvania 1½ per cent per annum on the daily balances.

I next come to the State of Michigan. The treasurer of that State wrote me on January 27, that—

The interest rate has been usually 3 per cent, but that owing to a plethora of money in 1897 and 1898, the rates were reduced to 2½ on the inactive and 2 per cent on the active accounts.

The treasurer of the State of Vermont wrote me on January 26—

That 2 per cent is the rate of interest received on the principal accounts kept by that State.

On January 23 the treasurer of Massachusetts wrote me this, which I want you to hear:

The amount deposited in the several banks at the close of business hours January 22, was $6,978,898.49. Four million three hundred and thirty-three thousand dollars of this drew 2½ per cent interest, and on the sum of $2,170,000 interest at 2 per cent is paid. Four hundred and seventy-five thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight dollars and forty-nine cents of active or working bank deposits, interest at 1½ per cent is paid, on which we draw every day.

That is in Massachusetts. Taking this as the average of the year, makes $157,853.73 profit per annum on the public deposits of the State of Massachusetts alone, and on only a little over $6,000,000; while we had, or now have, in the different banks to-day probably one hundred and fifteen million to one hundred and twenty million dollars.

I am sorry that our friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who believes that these deposits are valueless, is not in his seat when I make the statement that is given to me by the State treasurer of the State of Connecticut, who says that "deposits are made at the rate of 2½ per cent, and that in the year 1899 the State received $34,566.53 interest on the State deposits." That is what the State of Connecticut receives on the little deposit of that State.

January 24 the treasurer of the State of Florida wrote:

On those deposits, which are always subject to check, the State receives 2½ per cent interest per annum, payable quarterly.

On January 24 the treasurer of the State of Georgia wrote:

We deposit with our State depositories and receive interest on the same at the rate of 2 per cent per annum.

On January 22 the treasurer of Maryland wrote:

Upon such deposits 2 per cent is allowed by the banks on daily balances.

On January 25 the treasurer of Kansas said that about $20,000 of the funds of that State are kept in the National Bank of the Republic, of New York, as fiscal agent, and that the bank pays to the State 2 per cent interest.

The secretary of state of Colorado on January 24 says:

I have been informed that 2½ per cent on open accounts and 4 per cent on time deposits are the rates we get in this State.

On January 24 the treasurer of Minnesota wrote:

The State is now getting on most of its deposits 3 per cent, making about thirty or forty thousand dollars per year.

The treasurer of Wisconsin on January 26 wrote:

The State receives interest of very nearly $25,000 per annum.

Not giving me the rate per cent. The statutes of Nebraska make 2 per cent the minimum charge for State deposits, but Mr. STARK informs me they get from 3 per cent to 4 per cent per annum on State and county funds. Missouri receives from 1½ to 1.69 per cent per annum, according to the report sent me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will it disturb the gentleman to supplement his statement about Missouri? We have a law out there, in addition to that, which requires that the county court let out the county deposits to the highest bidder among the banks.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In my county the revenues run something over $100,000, and a year or two ago one of those banks bid 6 per cent for the average daily balance.

Mr. BELL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And gave good bond for it.

Mr. BELL. North Dakota. The treasurer of North Dakota informed me that they received 3 per cent on their deposits.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report says $76,283,655.30 of public money was in the banks on June 30, 1899, or at the end of the fiscal year. And on December 17 a proposition generally stated was that the Secretary of the Treasury announced that he would increase these deposits from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 immediately, and on December 18 the Secretary of the Treasury ordered the collection of internal revenues of $1,000,000 daily left in the banks, now making probably considerably more than $100,000,000 of Government funds in the banks, without charge or limiting the amount of interest that they shall charge the people for the use of their own money.

If we say there is $100,000,000 of the public funds in the banks—and I have figured up the average per cent paid throughout the United States to the States is a little over 2.7 on daily deposits; on time deposits, anything of a permanent nature, it is 3 per cent. Taking it, then, at 2.7 per cent per annum, and taking $50,000,000 at this price, would give us a profit of $1,035,000 interest per annum; and the other $50,000,000 at 3 per cent per annum would give us $1,500,000 per annum, or a total interest per annum on $100,000,000 deposited in the banks of $2,535,000, or a value of $6,945 every day.

Now, it seems to me, after it has been shown beyond chance of controversy that these deposits have a fixed market value and that the money belongs to the Government of the United States, and it having been shown that it is worth at the lowest market value $6,945 every day, that we are criminal if we refuse to protect the people in securing these great values that belong to them. I want to submit to the consideration of this House and to the country the query: Is it any more a moral wrong for the Government to allow these banks to ram their arms into the Treasury daily and purloin $6,945 than it is to give them the free use of $100,000,000 daily which has a market value of $6,945, which market value is as well fixed as the value of wheat, corn, or cotton?

It is as great an injury to the people of the United States and as flagrant a neglect of duty of this Government to give away the use of that $100,000,000 worth, in an eager market, the value of which is $6,945 per day, as it would be to give those banks daily, without charge, $6,945 worth of postage or revenue stamps. The Secretary of the Treasury might as well make them a gift of $6,945 out of the Treasury, as equivalent things are equal to each other.

President McKinley said on the floor of the House on February 28, 1888:

Nearly $59,000,000 is out among the banks. While for them they give to the Government bonds as security for the deposit—and they are getting it without interest, and they draw the accrued interest on the Government bonds.

Just as is done to-day—

Just what they are doing to-day with these deposits. He properly and severely criticised President Cleveland for allowing them to have $59,000,000 without cost, and at the same time he is allowing them to have practically twice as much in exactly the same way. He was right then; he is certainly wrong now. This Administration and the last one have, in my judgment, permitted the mammoth bondholding and banking institutions flagrantly to filch from the people more than a hundred million dollars in value. In the so-called popular loan of $200,000,000, given them at par, when they were worth on the market from 106 to 109, there was an absolute gift of from $12,000,000 to $18,000,000. There is no controversy about it; the banks know it and everybody else knows it.

When I speak of banks fleecing the people, I do not include the little banks scattered out through the country—this pilfering impoverishes them as well as their patrons—but the great syndicated banks, the 69 of which our friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] speaks here, the association that is controlling the destiny of this nation. The financial bill now before Congress will be the most nutritious food they have had since they manipulated the bonds of the rebellion. They have put the interest lower than the bonds of any other country on the globe—lower than Great Britain—and they will be bought. Why? Because the banker can take the 2 per cent bond; he can walk over to the Treasury and he can deposit it, take out of the Treasury dollar for dollar in the people's money, gold, silver, or paper, take it home with him, get the use of that money for nothing, and draw 2 per cent interest on his bond. Who would not buy them? They could afford to buy them under those conditions if they did not draw a single cent in interest, as security merely.

The same banks a few weeks ago brought a Black Friday on New York, and not only made untold millions out of that Black Friday, but they walked up and made this Government give them more deposits for nothing. The Government had to buy its peace, or was rather glad to buy it.

In 1837 a great panic occurred in this country on May 10. The banks in New York all suspended, and there was a general wreckage, and yet Prof. W. G. Sumner, of Yale, states in his history of American currency that nearly all of these banks made big money out of the suspension and paid big dividends during the year. I am sure there has been no panic since that time that the large banks—the mammoth institutions in the East—have not generally made infinitely more money than they do in normal times, and they cleaned up the small banks, they destroyed the little banks, and in ghoulish glee they said among themselves, "It is a benefit; it is simply cleaning out the unstable financial institutions."

If we adjourn this Congress without passing a law forcing the Treasury to let these deposits out at their market value, in the same way that the States do, we should be condemned to stay at home by our defrauded constituents. Where could this Congress do more for the people than by passing a bill that would force its negligent servants to collect $6,945 per day of its dues in revenue belonging to the Government, and which is being awarded to the favorites of the Treasury Department, if not to political favorites? The ordinary banks of the country do not get the benefit of it. In the first place, they do not have the United States bonds to deposit, and if they did have them they would not have the influence to get the deposits.

If the one hundred millions were equally divided among 3,600 banks, they would only get $27,777 each, while it has recently been shown by the press that the National City Bank of New York at times had a daily balance of from twenty to twenty-nine millions. At this rate you could only distribute to three banks the $100,000,000. If the National City Bank of New York were given thirty millions, only five banks could be reached. If it got five millions, only twenty banks could be reached. The whole system tends to make the rich more powerful and the ordinary banks weaker.

December 23, 1899, Mr. Walker Hill, president of the American Bankers' Association, in an interview is reported to have said: "The banks derive a profit of one-half of 1 per cent per month, or 6 per cent per annum, on these free deposits." That was said when he was opposing the published intention of this Government to give the National City Bank of New York forty millions of the deposit. He said it was really worth this to the banks, although they only pay 1½ to 3 per cent—6 per cent per annum. "The last statement," said he, "shows that the National City Bank of New York had $13,000,000 of those deposits," worth $780,000 per annum.

Those are the words of the president of the Banking Association of the United States in their row over the division of these free spoils; that the deposits of that bank before this renewed deposit was worth to the bank $780,000 per annum, or a profit of $2,126 per day, quite a handsome gift to the richest and most powerful and relentless financial organization in the United States. The $100,000,000 divided among the banks are worth to them $6,000,000 per annum. Take the $76,283,625.30 in the banks at the end of the last fiscal year as the amount of money in the banks at that time, thirteen millions let to the National City Bank of New York out of this, and treating the other banks as liberally, 6 banks would consume the entire deposit, and the 3,594 other national banks would get nothing.

As to the State banks, it is an absolute injury to and a discrimination against those banks. It has a tendency to destroy and drive out of existence your State institutions. It appears that, from the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], only 69 out of 3,600 of these institutions call for these deposits.

Sir, it seems to me that if these flagrant evils go on much longer many of our constituents, who charge that instead of their representatives regarding a public office as a public trust they regard it more in the nature of a private opportunity to serve some great interest that boosts this or the other political party, will certainly be supported in their position by the proof.

Do not these flagrant wrongs justify the criticisms that are being thrown far and near from every quarter upon this body and the body at the other end of this Capitol? A few days ago the chancellor of the New York University Law School, while deploring our weakness and our failure to represent the people, said that the interest of our country in the great rivalry between corporations and the Government is coming; and where but from among the masses will spring the advocates of the people's rights? He was showing that the membership of this House was composed principally of the representatives of the great sordid interests and not of the American people.

A few days ago I noticed in a leading text-book in general use in one of the colleges of this city a statement that this is a time in the history of the American Government without statesmanship. This is the doctrine that is being taught to our children right under our noses and in the great capital city of the nation where we deliberate. And in Chicago, the day before yesterday, the mayor of the second largest city in the United States, welcoming the members of a great assemblage in that city, said that one House of the American Congress had become a gathering of the owners and representatives of trusts and that a few years more will see the House reduced to the same condition.

Mr. GAINES. Is it not a fact, or at least is it not stated and undisputed, that one of the present members of the United States Senate has recently been employed and is now the counsel for the Standard Oil Company?

Mr. BELL. I do not believe that the rules of the House give us liberty to discuss the conduct of members of either body by name.

Mr. GAINES. I have not given any name; is not that a fact as stated in the press?

Mr. BELL. I would say to the gentleman outside——

Mr. GAINES. I say it here; it is so.

Mr. BELL. I never knowingly transgress the rules of this House.

Now, does it not behoove us to lay down all partisanship and to investigate impartially some of these business questions in behalf of the American people? Would it not be well for us to take up the charges against our conduct made by no inconsiderable portion of the people and coming from most elevated sources and from all parties, and analyze for a while our conduct—see what we are doing, and "see ourselves," if possible, "as others see us?" May there not be some truth in the old adage that where there is so much smoke there must be at least a little fire? Should we not take up this great bank trust and see why we should give them our $100,000,000 deposit when our people at home are drawing large revenues from their deposits of public funds? If Massachusetts had those $100,000,000 in her State treasury, she would collect between two and three million dollars per annum out of that deposit.

Now, sir, I say that there are no two sides to this proposition; that there is in this House a favoritism toward these great institutions—a favoritism which permits them to plunder the public Treasury; and every part of the history of this Government establishes it beyond question.

You may go to the Treasury Department of the United States, and let it have a dealing with an individual, an ordinary citizen or laborer, and it will figure for untold hours to disallow every cent that does not come within the red tape of that organization. Yet it gives to the banks the free use of a hundred million dollars—worth nearly $7,000 per day—a value established as completely as the value of the other commodities that are on exchange.

It offers a premium to these banks to wreck the market. And when the great banker of New York brought on that memorable "Black Friday" he got a great premium for it. He got his coffers filled with public money in order that he might let the people breathe. We had such a proceeding in the days of Jackson. We had the old Bank of the United States standing here and insisting that unless its charter was renewed it never would loan money to the people; it would not pay out the $40,000,000 of Government funds; it would not pay out the money necessary to meet the pensions; it would throttle the Government unless Congress legislated to suit it. Jackson said, "Before this institution gets bigger than the Government, let us throttle it." And Congress did throttle it. We have now a banking power which is bigger than the Government; it dominates the Government; there is no doubt about it; and I am sorry to say that in my judgment five-sixths of the men who represent the people are interested in some kind of banking. I do not say that they can not be interested and be impartial, as but few of the banks get these special favors. But the men in the country and the smaller towns are injured by these great favors given to the great central banks.

As for me, I feel that we are plundering the people of this vast sum of $6,945. Giving the banks the benefit of every doubt, and taking the lowest estimate from every part of the country and striking an average, the above sum is obtained. I do not doubt but that they could get from eight to ten million dollars if they saw fit, but the Government and the Treasury Department, which has been run so long by the banks, allow the banks these privileges without money and without price.

For one I never expect to stop talking of these great favors and of the flagrant neglect of duty of our Representatives until they treat these great institutions just as they treat the individual citizens of the United States.

I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I take the present opportunity to submit a few remarks on the question of pensions and the bad effects which our overgenerous pension legislation is having upon the country, or at least some parts of it.

From the report of the Secretary of the Interior it appears that there have been paid out on account of pensions and expenses incident to the execution of pension laws, from 1866 to 1899, the enormous sum of $2,469,751,366, a sum so vast as to tax the powers of the mind to comprehend its magnitude.

The number of pensioners on the rolls in 1866 was 126,722. The number on the rolls in 1899 was 991,519. The amount paid on account of pensions for 1866 was $15,450,549.88. The amount paid on account of pensions for the year 1899 was $138,355,052.05, and the estimate for the fiscal year 1901 is $144,000,000. Thirty-three years after the close of the war between the States we have, in round numbers, eight times as many pensioners on the rolls as we had then, and are paying, in round numbers, ten times as much money on account of pensions as we did thirty-three years ago, and it is estimated that it will take at least $6,000,000 more to pay pensions for the year 1900 than for 1899 on account of the Spanish war. I here read and make a part of my remarks a clipping from the Washington Post for February 7, 1900:

DELUGE OF PENSION BILLS—IF ALL OF THEM WERE ENACTED, THEY WOULD BANKRUPT THE GOVERNMENT.

Senator GALLINGER, chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions, says that never before during his term of public service has there been such a deluge of general pension bills designed to take large sums of money out of the Treasury as now. He gives it as his opinion that if all the bills now before his committee should be enacted into law, they would absolutely bankrupt the finances of the Government.

The latest scheme that is being pressed upon the committee is to wipe out the pension rolls by paying all pensions in a lump sum, according to a table based upon the expectation of life as estimated by the American life-insurance companies. The advocates of this scheme have probably not taken the trouble to figure out the amount that would be called for, but it is safe to assume that it would run into the billions. Fortunately, there is no danger of a measure of that kind receiving serious consideration, but the mere suggestion of it shows the reckless views that some people hold in regard to pension matters.

What was intended as and in fact was a roll of honor is fast becoming a roll of shame. Those who seek to plunder the Treasury through one means or another are making use of the generosity of a grateful people and the popularity of pensions in order to accomplish their nefarious purposes, and a grateful people are getting tired of such abuse of their gratitude.

This matter of the rapid and reckless granting of pensions and the passage of ill-advised and ill-considered pension legislation is debauching the manhood of the country and deadening the national moral sense.

To prove this it is only necessary to investigate the applications for pensions made on account of the Spanish war and analyze the same.

Mr. Chairman, I here insert a list of 23 regiments of the Regular Army and 2 batteries that took part in the Santiago battle, with list of casualties and number of claims filed for pensions on account of service, as follows:

It will be seen that there were killed, wounded, and missing in said 23 regiments and 2 batteries of the Regular Army that took part in the battles of Santiago 1,344 men, and that there are applications for pensions for the whole number of said 23 regiments and 2 batteries 2,962, or 2¼ applications to each soldier killed and wounded in these regiments of the Regular Army. I now read, and insert as a part of my remarks, a list of 8 regiments of volunteers who took part in the Santiago battles, with the list of casualties and number of applications for pensions.

Regiments of volunteers.	List of casualties in Santiago battles.				Number of claims filed on account of service.
	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.	Invalids.	Widows.	Dependents.	Total.
Second Massachusetts Infantry	5	40	....	45	424	15	28	467

It will be seen by reference to these tables that the 8 volunteer regiments had a total of 209 killed and wounded, and that the applications for pensions filed by these 8 regiments are 3,588, or 17 applications for pensions filed for each soldier killed or wounded, or, in round numbers, eight times as many applications for pensions by the soldiers of these 8 volunteer regiments as in the 23 Regular Army regiments calculated on a basis of casualties.

It will be seen that the above 8 volunteer regiments are from Massachusetts, New York, District of Columbia, Michigan, and Ohio—all from the North, where it is popular to favor liberal pensions.

I now read and make a part of my remarks a list of casualties and applications for pensions for 8 other volunteer regiments, as follows.

Volunteer regiments in the war with Spain.

Regiments.	Strength.	Casualties.				Number of applications filed for pension.
		Killed in action.	Wounded.	Died.	Total.
First Alabama Infantry	1,651	.....	.....	16	16	71
First Georgia Infantry	1,331	.....	.....	11	11	65
First Kentucky Infantry	1,334	.....	.....	28	28	122
First Mississippi Infantry	1,141	.....	.....	30	30	66
First South Carolina Infantrys	1,359	.....	.....	18	18	110
First Tennessee Infantry	2,055	1	.....	25	26	174
Second Tennessee Infantry	1,419	.....	.....	15	15	93
First Texas Infantry	1,397	.....	.....	15	15	60
Total	.....	1	.....	158	159	761

It will be seen that the total number of deaths, killed, and wounded in these 8 regiments are 159; that the total number of pension applications by soldiers of these 8 regiments are 761, or, in round numbers, 4 applications for each death in these 8 regiments.

These last 8 regiments are from the States of Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas, where the pension evil has not reached the horrid proportions it has in the Northern States, and where the people are still willing to make a living by honest toil and are not knocking at the doors of Congress day and night for the passage of legislation enabling them to appropriate the hard earnings of other people to their own use.

Mr. Chairman, let us analyze the status of these 16 regiments of volunteers a little further.

In the 8 Northern regiments there were 35 deaths and 3,588 applications for pensions, or, in round numbers, 100 applications for pensions to each death reported. In the 8 Southern regiments there were 159 deaths and 761 applications for pensions, or, in round numbers, 5 applications for pensions in these 8 Southern regiments to each death.

In the Northern regiments there are 100 applications for pensions for each death, while in the 8 Southern regiments there are only 5 applications for pensions to each death, or twenty times as many applications per death in the Northern as in the Southern regiments.

It must be further remembered that all these applications are based upon alleged injuries received while in line of duty—are all for causes alleged to be of service origin.

Will any member on this floor arise from his seat and say that he believes that each of these applications for pensions in these 8 Northern regiments are honest and made in good faith?

I beg to call the attention of the House to what appears to be a most remarkable fact in connection with these 8 Northern regiments, and that is that the fewer casualties the greater the number of applications for pensions.

In the Second Massachusetts Infantry the killed are 5 and wounded 40; total, 45; applications for pensions, 468.

First United States Volunteer Cavalry, killed, 15; wounded, 76; total, 91; applications for pensions, 241.

In Seventy-first New York Infantry, killed, 13; wounded, 43; total, 56; applications for pensions, 305.

In First District of Columbia Infantry, killed, none; wounded, none; applications for pensions, 419.

In Ninth Massachusetts Infantry, killed, none; wounded, none; deaths, none; missing, none; applications for pensions, 645.

In Thirty-third Michigan Infantry, killed, none; wounded, none; missing, none; applications for pensions, 459.

In Thirty-fourth Michigan Infantry, killed, none; wounded, none; missing, none; applications for pensions, 535.

In Eighth Ohio Infantry, killed, none; wounded, none; missing, none; applications for pensions, 487.

So you see, Mr. Chairman, that the fewer the casualties in these Northern regiments the greater the number of pension applications, all based upon causes of alleged service origin.

These figures and tables are all official, all coming from the Bureau of Pensions.

These eight Northern regiments had the following number of men enlisted and mustered out.

The regiments referred to are as follows:

Regiment.	Number of officers and men accounted for on muster-out roll.	Strength at muster out.
Second Massachusetts Infantry	943	841
First United States Volunteer Cavalry	1,237	1,137
Seventy-first New York Infantry	1,325	1,164
First District of Columbia Infantry	990	859
Ninth Massachusetts Infantry	1,334	1,197
Thirty-third Michigan Infantry	1,310	1,206
Thirty-fourth Michigan Infantry	1,334	1,198
Eighth Ohio Infantry	1,346	1,230

From the above table it will be seen that the First District of Columbia Infantry had officers and men all told at highest point only 990, and 859 at muster out. The applications for pensions in this regiment that never had a man killed or wounded is the modest number of 419, or a number nearly equal to one-half the full strength of the regiment.

Now let us look at the Ninth Massachusetts Infantry. Full strength of regiment, 1,334; at muster out, 1,197, with not a man killed or wounded or reported as having died; yet the applications for pensions are the insignificant number of 645, lacking only 116 applications of being equal to all the applications filed by the entire 8 Southern regiments.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. On what ground do these men, where there have been none killed or wounded, base these applications for pensions?

Mr. SIMS. That is a question which I want the House to answer. This regiment had about six months' service and now makes applications for pensions based on alleged causes of service origin, in number exceeding one-half of its full strength at date of muster out and lacking only 27 applications of being equal to half of the full strength of the regiment at any time. If this regiment had remained in the service another six months and had not been in a single battle or skirmish, the whole regiment would have been disabled and applicants for pensions, reasoning from the record they have made for the six months they did serve.

Mr. Chairman, if the Ninth Massachusetts Infantry is any criterion by which we may weigh the value of the services of volunteers from that State, it will be better not to ask for volunteers from that State in any future wars we may have. It must be certain that if these applications for pensions are honest and based upon honest causes of service origin, this volunteer regiment will cost this Government more money for its six months' service than any regiment of the Regular Army will cost the Government, including full term of service, retirement pay, and pensions. Those who advocate a larger standing Regular Army can certainly find much to strengthen their position from the records of these 8 Northern regiments.

Mr. Chairman, I now turn from this regiment of hardy New Englanders to the Thirty-fourth Michigan Infantry Volunteers. The record of that regiment is none killed, none wounded, none missing, and no deaths, with applications for pensions, 535. The full strength of this regiment was 1,334, and at muster out 1,198, showing applications for pensions, less 64, equal to one-half the strength of the regiment at muster out. I do not know the length of service of this regiment, but suppose it was about like that of the other volunteer regiments that did not go to the Philippines, about six months.

In case of the 23 regiments of the Regular Army, set out in the first table above exhibited, it must be remembered that they have been in the service ever since April, 1898, and are still in active service, and that the applications for pensions from these regiments of the Regular Army cover the whole period of their service since April, 1898, while the whole period of service of these 8 volunteer regiments from the North was only a few months, and that they have been out of the service for a long time and, notwithstanding this, that the applications for pensions filed by these 8 Northern regiments exceed the applications filed by the 23 Regular Army regiments and 2 batteries by 626.

Mr. Chairman, I now invite the attention of the House to a comparison of the 8 volunteer regiments from the South embraced in one of the above tables; and it must be remembered that the First Kentucky served in Puerto Rico and that the First Tennessee served in the Philippines from October 30, 1898, to November 11, 1899—more than one year.

The First Alabama, full strength, 1,651; deaths, 16; applications for pensions, 71; or 1 application of every 23 men, or 4½ applications to each death in the regiment.

The First Georgia, full strength, 1,331; deaths, 11; applications for pensions, 65, being 1 application to every 20½ men, or 6 applications to each death.

The First Kentucky, full strength, 1,334; deaths, 28; applications for pensions, 122, being 1 application to each 10 men, in round numbers, or 4½ applications to each death.

The First Mississippi, full strength, 1,141; deaths, 30; applications, 66, being above 1 application for each 20 men and only 2½ applications to each death.

The First South Carolina, full strength, 1,359; deaths, 18; applications, 110, being about 1 application for each 12½ men, or 6⅛ applications for each death.

The First Tennessee, full strength, 2,026; deaths, 26; applications, 174, being 1 application to about every 12 men, or about 6⅔ applications to each death; and it must not be overlooked that the First Tennessee served nearly eighteen months, and more than one year of this service was in the Tropics.

The Second Tennessee, full strength, 1,419; deaths, 15; applications, 93, being 1 application to every 15¼ men, or about that, and 6⅕ applications to each death.

The First Texas, full strength, 1,397; deaths, 15; applications, 60; being 1 application to 23 men, or 4 applications to each death.

I invite the careful attention of the members of this House to these comparisons; and tell me what are the lessons to be drawn from them. Would any member of this House consider it an honor to be on a pension roll made up from such applications as those from the 8 Northern regiments?

Mr. Chairman, I have not selected these 16 regiments with the view of proving my contention. I am fully satisfied that if the records of all the volunteer regiments that served in the war with Spain were examined and compared the same results will be found to be true; that there are from five to ten times as many applications for pensions in proportion to length of service, strength of regiments, and casualties in the Northern regiments as will be found in the Southern regiments.

There is but one general cause that can be assigned for this great and astounding difference in the number of pension applications from the North and from the South. It must be due to a wide and generally prevailing depraved, debauched, and corrupted public sentiment that exists throughout the North and does not exist throughout the South, due to education and environment.

In the North the people have been taught that it is right to assist private enterprise by so adjusting taxation as to favor some at the expense of others, called, to hide its deformity and ugliness, protection.

In the North the people have been taught that it is right to create great banking monopolies by means of friendly legislation to the national and unfriendly legislation to State banks.

In the North the people have been taught that it is right to strike down one-half the redemption money of the people in order to increase the values of the fixed incomes of the wealthy at the expense of the poor and the wage-earner.

In the North the people have been taught that it is right to tax the productions of the Southern cotton grower out of existence in order to enhance the value of the products of the Northern dairymen.

In the North the people have been taught that it is right to grant subsidies to millionaire shipowners by taking taxes wrung from the people and giving to them, simply because they have the power to do so.

In the North the people have been taught that the objects and purposes of government are not the greatest good to the greatest number of the whole people, but the greatest number of special favors and exclusive privileges to the favored classes at the expense of the masses.

In the North the people have been taught that it is right to secure legislation having for its sole object the benefit of certain lines of business, certain classes of people, and certain sections of our common country.

Is it any surprise, then, that the brave young men from the North who lately volunteered to go and fight Spain, to liberate her oppressed and tax-burdened subjects, are not restrained by the same noble sentiments when it comes to thrusting their hands into the pockets of American taxpayers and robbing them of their hard earnings by means of fraudulent and unjust pensions.

Mr. Chairman, I hope and pray that such a state of things may never prevail in my own beloved sunny South. But like causes produce like effects, and I suppose the people of the South can be debauched by subjecting them to the same causes that have debauched the people of the North.

It is far better that no pensions be paid than that our national standard of morality should be reduced, than that our national character should be degraded. As far as the South is concerned, I say to you of the North, keep your money, but let us of the South keep our good name. We can afford to be poor, but we can not afford to be corrupt.

Mr. Chairman, it is high time that a serious consideration of this pension evil be undertaken. We must throttle it, or it will throttle us. If the South were to-day in the same condition in which the North finds herself, no man can conjecture what would be the result.

Gentlemen on this floor are afraid to give expression to their honest sentiments for fear they may be misunderstood, for fear they may lose a few votes at home or cause their party to lose votes somewhere.

Mr. Chairman, securing votes by voting money out of the Treasury into the pockets of certain individuals or certain classes is securing votes by bribery, nothing more nor less. The same amount of money paid to the same individuals by candidates or party campaign committees would secure the same votes and would be nothing less than bribery.

Whenever the voters of this country cast their ballots with an eye single to the amount of money they are to secure, either from individuals, corporations, campaign committees, or from favorable legislation, then has our country reached that stage of debauchery and corruption which is the sure forerunner and presager of revolution and destruction.

I make the assertion that there is not in this broad land of ours a single volunteer soldier who served in the war with Spain who has not received numerous letters from sundry and divers pension attorneys, inviting and suggesting the filing of applications for pensions and making suggestions as to what was necessary to be done in order to secure a pension, and insinuating and suggesting the thought of procuring a pension, right or wrong, and inclosing blanks for applications. Such work as this bears an abundant crop of evil fruit, resulting in the debauching and corrupting of these otherwise worthy and honored fellow-citizens of ours.

Why are the applications for pensions from the Regular Army so few in comparison with those of the volunteer regiments? The regiments of the Regular Army are engaged in a much more arduous and perilous service than the volunteers, and yet applications for pensions from this source are not one-third what they are from these volunteer regiments of the North. The reasons are plain. In the first place, they are not subjected to the corrupting and debauching influences of the pension attorneys and are subject to the examination of competent Army surgeons.

The organized pension grabbers have a great weight in politics, and they never fail to use it. Just let an executive officer try to execute the laws and hold down the pension frauds and a howl goes up from that class, many of whom are members of that Treasury-fed, Treasury-fattened organization called the Grand Army of the Republic. No sooner do the Grand Army posts have a meeting than these same pension attorneys set up a howl against the offending officer and go to work to have him removed. Such has been the case with the present Commissioner of Pensions. So permeating and far-reaching is this baneful influence that Democrats in the North, in many instances, are as bad or worse than Republicans. It seems that in that section of the country where the pension crop exceeds almost any other source of money supply Republicans, Democrats, and Populists fall over each other in their efforts to execute the will and wish of this army of pensioners.

Mr. Chairman, it has almost reached that stage on this floor that in considering private pension bills the fact that the beneficiary of the private bill has been rejected at the Bureau is deemed sufficient excuse for the passage of the bill. No longer than last Friday night a bill was passed where the examining surgeons of the Pension Bureau had certified that there was no evidence that the injury complained of was of service origin. It is true that the one-sided ex parte statements of some physicians and friends and neighbors of the soldier stated that they believed the injury to be of service origin, and a distinguished member from Indiana, for whom I have the highest regard, charged that the surgeons of the Pension Bureau were under the influence and control of the Commissioner of Pensions, and were bringing in such reports as he dictated. The people lose all protection in the granting of pensions when the honor and integrity of the sworn officers of the law are impugned on this floor because they determine that the applicant has not made out his title to pension under the very laws these officers are sworn to observe and enforce.

No longer than last Friday night we saw a distinguished member of this House, as chairman of the Committee of the Whole, when pension bills were up for consideration, refuse absolutely and repeatedly to recognize the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] who desired to address the House. The gentleman, from South Carolina had as much right to recognition as any member of the House, and was arbitrarily and wrongfully deprived of his rights while two bills granting private pensions, including amendments, were passed, and this arbitrary and unwarranted action of the Chair was loudly applauded by the Republicans.

To such an extent has this pension frenzy gone that in order to rush these private bills through in indecent haste the constitutional rights of members of this House on this side are ignored and trampled upon, while the majority on the other side applaud the outrage.

Mr. Chairman, when in the history of this House was ever a member refused recognition in Committee of the Whole to discuss a private bill of any other character? I have no knowledge of such an instance. Look over the record of last Friday night's session, when between thirty and forty private pension bills were passed, and show me where a single report was read or statement made in explanation of the bill except where the same was demanded by a Southern Democrat.

From whence is the money to come with which to pay this ever-increasing pension burden? It now comes out of the pockets of the consumers of this country, which means, in the main, the poorer classes, because under our system of taxation the poorer classes consume more of the taxed articles than the rich and idle.

Why not join with us in securing an income tax, in order that this pension burden may be borne by those who are most able to bear it and who are more largely interested in having the protection of our soldiers?

I am willing that an income tax be levied just sufficient for the payment of pensions, to be increased or decreased just as the demand for payment of pensions increases or decreases. While I believe an income tax is a just and proper tax for any and all Government purposes, yet, situated as we are, I am willing to compromise and take no more revenue from this source than will be sufficient to pay pensions. This would certainly be a great relief to the people. But our Republican friends are in a bad fix. If they favor an income tax, they lose the chief contributors to their campaign funds; if they do not do just what the pensioners want, they will lose their votes; and so they meet the demands of both by giving liberal pensions to the soldiers and collecting the taxes with which to pay those pensions from the poor consumers of the country.

Mr. Chairman, all these evils are the legitimate outgrowth and logical results of using the taxing power of this Government for other than strictly Government purposes.

Just so long as the powers of government are prostituted to private ends, to serve the demands of greed and gain, just so long will we be cursed with these and similar evils.

At this very moment bills are pending in this House to pension civilian employees of the Government after they have served a certain period of time or reached a certain age.

No sooner is such a measure introduced than a great newspaper champions its cause. I read from a recent issue of the New York Times:

> Among the bills earliest introduced at this session of Congress was one by Mr. BROSIUS, formerly chairman of the Civil Service Committee, for the retirement with pension of employees in the service of the Federal Government. It is being urgently pressed, and it has strong claims on the favorable attention of Congress; but there is a good deal of opposition to it, most of which is unreasonable.
> In substance the bill provides for the retirement of three classes of persons: 1. Those who have been twenty years in the service. These may be retired on their own request or compulsorily. 2. Those who have been thirty years in the service and have attained the age of 60. These may be retired only at their own request. 3. Those who have been thirty-five years in the service and have attained the age of 70, who must be retired compulsorily.
> All these classes must have been in what is known as the classified service—that is, the service subject to the civil-service rules, though service in the unclassified positions may be counted in the term served. Each person so retired is to receive 75 per cent of the highest pay he or she has received while in the service. * * * It is not easy to see what logical or reasonable objection can be made to the principle of this bill.

We who have had an opportunity to observe know that thousands of people are anxious and clamorous to secure these Government positions in the civil list; that no one is appointed on the civil list who does not seek it and is not anxious to get it. The pay is good, far better than the average employment of a business character. Then pray tell me why should these Government employees be pensioned at 75 per cent of the highest amount of compensation paid them at any period of their service after they have served a certain length of time or reached a certain age? With salaries ranging all the way from fifty to two hundred and fifty dollars per month, why is it that these employees are supposed to save nothing in a lifetime of such remunerative service and are finally to become a public charge upon their fellow-employees?

Who is to take care of the wage-earner or the farm laborer when he is old and unable to work? Who will say that it is right, that it is just, to tax the poor old worn-out laborer or farmer to provide a fund with which to keep up these high-salaried Government employees after they are too old to longer discharge the duties of their respective positions?

Mr. Chairman, I think there is grave danger of this very bad bill becoming a law. It is introduced by a very able member of this House, who comes from a section of this country that has never yet knocked at the door of the Treasury in vain. It is not more unjust than many other species of legislative favoritism that have already received recognition. It will no doubt bring to its support the hundreds of thousands of pensioners we already have.

I am afraid that it will give some gentlemen in this House the nightmare to vote against any kind of a bill proposing to grant pensions to anybody for any cause whatsoever.

The very word "pension" is both a charmer and a terrorizer of many gentlemen on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, if the Southern members of this House, who are not entirely dependent on the pensioners' vote for a seat in this House, do not take hold of this evil and by determined and long-continued effort root it out, no mortal can predict to what ruinous lengths it will go. Speaking for myself, I most solemnly declare that as long as I am honored with a seat in this body I shall never cease to make the best efforts of which, in my weakness, I am capable to root out and utterly destroy this monster of evil, and I call on all my colleagues of the South who have the courage of their convictions to stand by me in this fight. [Applause.]

Mr. PUGH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the balance of my time, I desire to yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

[Mr. BARTHOLDT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

When Mr. BARTHOLDT's time had expired, but before he had concluded his remarks, the following proceedings took place:

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] can yield to the gentleman from Missouri a part of his own time if he desires.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have only about ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BENTON. Will that come out of the general time?

The CHAIRMAN. It must come out of the general time.

Mr. CANNON. If I can be recognized, I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized, and yields to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that motion will not be agreed to at this time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that we have agreed upon a time limit for general debate as between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and myself, and we want to submit a proposition for unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are you going back into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then we will go back into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BENTON. I do not want to make any trouble or interference.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that we shall go right back into Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. HEMENWAY was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the legislative bill be closed to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock and that the bill be then taken up under the five-minute rule. That arrangement has been agreed to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] who is in charge of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that general debate on the legislative appropriation bill be closed to-morrow at 3 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia and myself.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is also asked that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY].

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. BENTON was recognized.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed, I desire to yield three minutes' time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am amazed at the unjustifiable attack which the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat has made upon the Irish people of this country. I listened with a great deal of interest to his praise of the German character and what the people of that race had done toward the development of this nation. I join with him in everything he has said in praise of these people who have done so much in all periods of the development of the country for the common good. I can not, however, understand his reflections upon the Irish people, and I hurl the charge back in his teeth when he says that "while the Germans are always found supporting the Government, the Irish are always against it." The statement which he has given utterance to seems to have been premeditated and can not be excused on the ground of thoughtlessness or any other cause, because the speech which he has just made was read from manuscript.

The members of this House know full well the absurdity of the statement which the gentleman has made, and were it not for the fact that it would be criminal to let a charge like this go unchallenged while there was a single individual in the House with a drop of Irish blood in his veins I would not dignify his statements by answering.

I would inform the gentleman from Missouri that from the inception of the Government until the present time in every hour of trial or peril the Government has found the man of Irish birth and Irish extraction always in the vanguard in the defense of the honor and glory of the Government. Does the gentleman say they are always found against the Government?

Why, Mr. Chairman, of the fifty-six signers of the Declaration of Independence nine were of the Irish race. All through the eight eventful years of the Revolution you will find a very large proportion of Celtic names on the military and naval rolls of the thirteen States. From Pennsylvania alone five Irish colonels headed as many regiments, made up mostly of men of the same nationality, and fought on the side of the colonists. Barry and O'Brien were the first two naval heroes of the Revolution, and Andrew Jackson—"Old Hickory"—the hero of the war of 1812, was of Irish extraction and some writers say of Irish birth. No braver hero of the Mexican war wore the uniform of the American soldier than General Shields, and every American loves to honor the memory of that fearless and intrepid fighter of the war of the rebellion, Gen. Phil Sheridan.

I have heard my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] tell many times of the fear that was imparted into the hearts of the rebels when the news was sent along the line that the Irish Brigade was in front. "With coats thrown aside and their sleeves rolled up," he says, "they were the very incarnation of fighting men," and he has told me repeatedly in this House that the best fighters of that whole war, in his judgment, were the men who formed the Irish Brigade.

I would ask my friend from Missouri if the men of the Irish race and Irish extraction were against the Government in the recent war with Spain? If he thinks so, let him consult the records of the War Department. I know, speaking for my own State, which sent a larger percentage of men to the front, both in the Army and in the Navy, than any State in the Union, that the Irish boy, so called, was very much in evidence. In fact, Mr. Chairman, it would not surprise me, if the records could be obtained, to learn that a majority of those who enlisted from that State were either of Irish birth or Irish extraction.

In the struggle that is now going on in the Philippines I think that a large proportion of the men in the Regular Army are of Irish birth or Irish extraction. This was very forcibly brought to my mind one evening last week when looking over the columns of one of the local papers on the list of deaths reported by General Otis. Every one of the names reported that evening indicated that the soldier was either of Irish birth or Irish extraction. I think it is only fair to mention these matters and to emphatically deny the charge of the gentleman from Missouri, who has made this unjust charge against the Irish people. There is no question in my mind that although a great majority of the Irish people in this country to-day feel that the war in the Philippines is an unjust one, yet they are with the Government in every effort to maintain the supremacy of our Army and the success of our flag in that distant region.

I think that a great majority of the people of Irish extraction believe as I believe, and as I expressed myself very strongly three or four weeks ago in a speech in Boston, that the right or the wrong of the war in the Philippines is not to be discussed now that the American soldier is at the front, and that it is the duty of every citizen to strengthen his arm in the fight against the enemy. The Government of the United States has indicated no policy toward the Filipinos, and will not until after hostilities cease and peace is restored in those islands. When that time arrives the Irish people of this country will be glad, as far as their influence can be exerted upon the Government, to give the people who inhabit those islands that measure of self-government which they show themselves capable of maintaining.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I emphasize the fact that in all periods of the Government's history the people of the Irish race have stood for the Government. Their sons in the city and the State and the nation have always stood for law and order and good government. In the hour of peril they have fought for the flag and given of their blood freely in order that liberty and freedom might remain the symbol of a great people. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has the floor.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to use two minutes of my own time?

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I commend my friend for his defense of the race which he represents. I should have had less respect for him if he had not said what he did. My remarks were certainly not intended to be offensive or insulting, and I do not believe anybody on the floor took them in any but a Pickwickian sense. When I used the expression that the Irish are "agin the Government," I had in mind the old story which is frequently told of an Irishman who was shipwrecked upon a God forsaken island somewhere. When he met a native of the island, he asked him, "Is there a g'uvernmint here?" And the native said, "Yes, there is;" to which the Irishman replied, "Well, I am forninst it." [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is adding insult to injury when he repeats that story.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] is recognized.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, the people of Missouri of all political parties have been so long at peace among themselves that the idea of one Representative from that sovereign State feeling it necessary to attack the laws of his State, and bringing the necessity to another member of this House from that State to defend them, will be strange to the people and is something that has not occurred in the halls of Congress since the Democratic party took possession of the State government of Missouri in 1873. Out in the great State of Missouri nobody has ever complained of our election laws in a serious way, and when they did and made their complaint heard, and showed that those complaints had foundation, the legislature has been promptly responsive to the request. After these thirty years of peace within the borders of Missouri, there comes a gentleman's voice on this floor—one of her Representatives—attacking the laws of that great State. I have lived longer in Missouri than the gentleman who represents the Tenth Congressional district, and I think my memory of the various laws of that State dates further back and is clearer than his.

In the beginning of what I am about to say, Mr. Chairman, I want to recur to the gentleman's constant use of the term German-American. Out on the prairies of that great State, along the running streams and on the mountain sides, we do not hear any such terms as German-American, Irish-American, Norse, or English, or French American. Such terms are, and ought to be, offensive. When a German comes to my part of Missouri and gets his citizenship papers, he becomes not a German-American, but he becomes an American and a Missourian. That may be a familiar term to gentlemen in the city of St. Louis; but we out in the State, regardless of our politics, are of opinion that when a man comes to the United States and petitions our Government to become a citizen and renounces his allegiance to every foreign emperor, king, or potentate, he ought to be an American and ought never to be a German, Irish, Norse, English, or French American, for when he becomes an American citizen he can not have a grander title, and he ought not to have a prefix to it. [Applause.]

For the 150,000 Germans, Irish, English, and French that live in Missouri, I resent the prefixing of anything to the title of American citizen. The man is either a German or an American citizen. If a German comes here and does not take out naturalization papers, he is still a German; and if he does take out his papers and becomes a citizen of the United States, he is not a German-American, but an American citizen; and all of them that I have ever seen are loyal and true to our Government from whatever government they come.

The gentleman from the St. Louis district [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has seen fit to attack the election laws of our State, and in doing so has attacked our people. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] the other day made a bold announcement without the record before him, that the record bears out—that there is not in the American Union a single State whose election laws are fairer or more honest than the election laws of Missouri. That was not always so. I have no disposition, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to drag away the ashes from the embers of an almost forgotten period, but the gentleman from St. Louis almost immediately after beginning his remarks says: "I shall pull aside the curtain and scrutinize the election laws of Missouri." Let me say to him that we had an election law when I first became a resident of that State, and for several years afterwards, built on a plan to suit him.

In the first place, there was a constitution adopted in a fraudulent way in the spring of 1865. By the terms of that constitution every man who had borne arms against the Government or given aid or comfort to those who had, was not permitted to be registered or become a voter or serve as a juror. If he had been in the Confederate army or was in sympathy with those who were, he was not permitted to practice the profession of a lawyer or a doctor; he could not even preach the unsearchable riches of the Master. That was the sort of constitution we had for several years, beginning with the spring of 1865, in Missouri. We had in addition an election law which put the election machinery into the hands of three unequivocal radical Republicans appointed in each county.

Sixty days before each election it was the duty of a man who desired to become a registered voter in the State to go before this registration board in his county and prove, not only by his own oath, but by competent witnesses besides, that he had not been in sympathy with the Confederate cause and that he had been loyal to the Government of the United States. His name was then, when the proof was made satisfactory to this board of registers, put upon the registration book. Twenty days after the registration closed this board of registers went into executive session, and by its own action, where no one could say no—court or anybody else—deliberately erased such names from that list of registration in each county as seemed good to them. After the citizen had proved his right to vote under the Constitution and law, he was at the mercy of the registration board.

My young friend from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] has referred to Gen. James Shields. I want to call your attention to how that brave old man was treated in Missouri. He was the hero of two wars and a Senator from three States. He was the candidate of the opposition party, called the Conservative party, afterwards the Democratic party—because all the elements of opposition were called Conservatives then—he was candidate for Congress in 1868, and there were registered in the counties representing the district from which he ran something like 9,000 of the 22,000 votes. The registration officers cut off several hundred of those voters' names, and still the gallant old American, James Shields, was elected to Congress. The ballots were taken to the secretary of state's office in Jefferson City and destroyed, and a certificate given to his Republican opponent, who was seated. That was the kind of election laws you had in those days in Missourri.

In 1870 the Republicans fell out among themselves, and a large number of them through the State, believing that the election law under the constitution of 1865 was incorrect and not fair, insisted that the time had come, if it ever was to come, when men in the Southern army, and those represented by their friends and kindred, should be given the franchise. The disruption occurred, and I am glad to say, for I was on the scene, that the men whom my friend calls German-Americans, but who call themselves Missourians and Americans, were in the front of the great fight that helped to turn the ex-Confederates loose and helped to make them citizens and voters again. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In using the expression "German-Americans," I simply followed my friend Mr. CHAMP CLARK, who used it first, and whose statements about the attitude of the Germans in my district I was endeavoring to answer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I never used such an expression in my life. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The RECORD has been read in the House, and I believe the gentleman said "Germans."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You bet I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENTON. I am exceedingly glad that the gentleman from

Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has begun to apologize for his un-American remark quoted two or three times. Very likely he will not use it any more on this floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the Liberal Republican element got control of the State of Missouri in 1870; that is, of the State government. The legislature was not in their control, but by the amendment to the constitution of 1865 everybody in the State who was of age was permitted to vote. The Democratic party came into full possession of the State government in January, 1873—all branches of it.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. BENTON. Certainly.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I understand the gentleman to admit that it was the Republican party that removed the disqualifications under the constitution of 1865?

Mr. BENTON. No; but I have great pleasure in saying that a portion of the Republican party in Missouri, something like 50,000, did vote for enfranchisement, and, with the Democratic vote, it made about 40,000 majority in the State. Yes, a large number of Republicans in the State voted for enfranchisement, something like 10,000 in the gentleman's own city. I do not mean to take away the meed of praise from any man who ever does get right, even if he has once been wrong. And I say that a large number of Republicans, as many as 400 out of the 1,200 in my own county, voted for enfranchisement, and so all over the State, and I honor them for it.

The Democratic party got into possession of the State government in January, 1873, and in the election of 1874 the question was submitted for a constitutional convention and was carried. The constitutional convention convened in May, 1875. A very serious question at issue then, Mr. Chairman, was the enormous State debt which had been piled upon the people of Missouri and the way to manage it without robbing the people in the shape of taxes. The constitution of Missouri was made and ratified by a large majority, and we have now lived from 1875 under that constitution. Some men say it is a little narrow. While in some points it is a little narrow, yet that is the best possible thing that could happen to the taxpayer of Missouri. It gives the people control of the corporate interests of the State; it keeps men in excitement from doing things locally that they ought not to do; and while the constitution may in some points be a little narrow, it is the best constitution the people of Missouri have ever lived under.

Now, after the adoption of the constitution in 1875 we had this sort of election law. All parties and all persons could make any sort of ballots they chose—that is to say, anybody could print ballots for himself. He could, if he wanted to, leave off the name of the nominee of the party, and leave it blank and have his own or another's name written in. That law, when complained of by men of all parties, was repealed, and it was made unlawful to scratch off any man's name from the ticket except by the voter and give him an opportunity to insert the name he wanted to vote for instead. Our Republican friends in 1889 and 1890 made this complaint of the Democrats. They said, "Your election law is of this character. Every political party prints its own ballot; there is nothing to prevent a man going to the polls leading another voter by the arm and voting him, sometimes against his will." The complaint was made that "You Democrats have got the wealth, the power in the State; you have the large farmers, you have the bankers, you have the great majority of merchants, you employ the most men, and as long as you can walk up to the ballot box holding the voter's arm and handing him a ticket at the ballot box, you unfairly control elections because of your superiority in numbers, influence, and wealth in the State."

A large number of Democrats were of opinion that this complaint of our Republican friends was well grounded, and the law of 1891 was the consequence. That law we know as the Australian ballot law, under which the clerk of the county court is required to print all the ballots. At first they were printed all on one sheet, but afterwards a change was made so that each party had its own ballot. Those ballots are held by the county court clerk until a day or two before the election—never more than two days—and are then sent out to one of the sworn judges by a sheriff or his deputy and handed to the judges in the various precincts of each county. No man is permitted to come within 100 feet of the booth where the ballot is prepared. The voter on coming to the voting place finds two judges. What sort of judges? One a Democratic judge and the other a Republican judge (which is the requirement of the law), who sit there with tickets.

The voter is given one of each ticket. He then goes into the booth alone, fixes up his ticket as he wishes, folds it, and then goes to the ballot box, where sit two other judges. One of the receiving judges is a Democrat and the other a Republican. And mark you, one Democratic and one Republican clerk sit there to take his name down and put the same number on the book opposite his name as the judge does on the ballot before it is deposited. When the ballot is deposited, the remaining ballots are put into a waste box. That is the election law of Missouri to-day; and here is exactly how it is executed. In Democratic counties, controlled by Democratic county courts, the Democrats always have three of the judges. If there is a considerable number of third-party men, they have one judge, and the Republicans have two. In a Republican county—and there are some thirty-two or thirty-three counties in the State that are usually reliably Republican—the Republicans have three judges sure, the Democrats two, and if there is a third party, that party one. There has never been any serious complaint of that law.

But that is not all. Under the election laws of Missouri as they have existed for two decades, the Republican and the Democrat and the Populist and the Prohibitionist and the Socialist-Labor men are entitled to have a challenger inside the election place to sit by the box where the ballots are deposited, who has authority to object to any voter, giving his reasons therefor; and he has the right to stay there until the ballots are counted and strung and put back into the box and sealed up. The Republicans have exactly the same rights as the Democrats. If a man comes to the polls and offers his vote, if he is a Republican a Democrat may challenge his vote, or vice versa; but his vote must be accepted if four of the six judges declare that he is entitled to vote.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. As I understand, the gentleman is discussing the election laws of Missouri.

Mr. BENTON. The election law as applying to counties. I will come later to the law as to cities.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I would like to ask my colleague whether he is familiar with the Nesbit election law?

Mr. BENTON. I think so, as to its general terms. I have been following it through and pencil marking it for two days.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. The speech my friend is making does not seem to agree with that law.

Mr. BENTON. Wait. As I was saying, no man offering to vote at any precinct can be deprived of his vote if four of the judges concur in deciding that he is entitled to vote. These men who watch the voting are appointed by the several political parties. They are entitled to remain until the whole matter is through. Such is the election law of the State of Missouri.

Now, complaint is made by the gentleman from St. Louis of what is known as the Nesbit election law which applies to cities of 300,000 inhabitants and over. I am going to read from that law, and I stand ready to be challenged about any section of it. I am going to read freely from its provisions. The reading may be a little tiresome. But since the election laws of my State have been attacked by a Missouri Representative it is right that this House should know what those laws are.

Mr. THROPP. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. BENTON. Certainly.

Mr. THROPP. Before the gentleman proceeds to discuss the law with reference to cities I wish to ask him, Are your voters registered?

Mr. BENTON. There is no registration in the country. In towns of 5,000 inhabitants and over there is for city elections, but in smaller places there is not.

Mr. THROPP. There is registration in the cities?

Mr. BENTON. Yes, in large cities, for all elections.

Mr. THROPP. Can the members of either party appoint any of those judges, or are they appointed by the court?

Mr. BENTON. By the courts of the counties out in the State; but the law requires that the courts give to the opposite party half the judges and half the clerks.

Mr. THROPP. As I understand, then, a Democratic court is required to appoint men who represent the Democratic party and the Republican party?

Mr. BENTON. Oh, yes; and in the same way a Republican court is required to appoint Republican and Democratic judges.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it may be well for my friend to understand one thing. The city of St. Louis is a city under a separate charter.

Mr. BENTON. I do not want my time taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. BENTON. I can not yield.

Mr. THROPP. I wished only to ask a question for information.

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. THROPP. When the voter presents himself there, if he is a voter who can not well understand how to mark his ticket, who is allowed to help him mark it?

Mr. BENTON. I ought to have explained that. I am very thankful to the gentleman for that suggestion. If a voter comes in and asks for a ballot and says, "I am unable to fix my ballot," for any reason—he may be partially blind, or he may be so illiterate that he can not read or write, or he may be crippled; under those circumstances the law requires that the judge whom he selects—that is, one of these distributing judges from whom the voters get the tickets—shall mark the ballot the way he wants it.

When we had the blanket ballot, if he wanted to vote the Republican ticket, his Republican judge scratched out the Democratic name by drawing a line through it, the People's Party, the Prohibition ticket, and so on, and left the Republican column unmarked. Then I if he said, "I want to vote for John Smith for constable," whose name was on the Democratic ticket, the judge scratched out the name of the Republican candidate and wrote in the name of the candidate for whom he wished to vote. Now, the judges are required under oath to keep the secret of how that man voted.

Mr. THROPP. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I have had something to do with elections since I myself was enfranchised in 1870, and I have never seen a legislative enactment on the subject of elections that is clearer and fairer than the election law of Missouri.

In framing the Australian-ballot law we took advantage of the Australian-ballot law in several other States—one of the New England States and one of the middle Western States—and based our election law upon it.

I speak certainly for the country districts of Missouri when I say there has never been any idea in that State that there was anything like general fraud. Now and then we hear of a fellow being bribed to put some particular name on his ballot; but as to wholesale fraud and corruption, it has been absolutely unknown for nearly thirty years in Missouri. I do not pretend to say that every man who votes at any particular ballot box in Missouri is absolutely an honest voter; but the judges and clerks of election believe he is, and the men who watch the ballot box and who watch the counting of the ballots believe he is. I say, of course, in a small way there is wrong occasionally; but as far as the working of the election law in Missouri is concerned, the perfection of that working is due to the efforts of honest legislators. We passed the Australian ballot law, so that nobody could prevent a man voting just as he likes one time and no more.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow a question there?

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it not a fact that the election law which the gentleman speaks about now was passed by a Republican house in Missouri?

Mr. BENTON. No, sir-ee, bob.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I know it is a fact.

Mr. BENTON. Well, I know it is not a fact. I know when it was passed. It was passed by that legislature that reelected GEORGE G. VEST for a third term to the United States Senate, and gave him 36 majority in the house and 14 in the senate. That is the legislature which passed it, and it was in 1891.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I say the last election law——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENTON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I say the last election law, which was repealed as far as the city of St. Louis was concerned, and for which the so-called Nesbit bill was substituted. That law was enacted by a legislature of which the house was Republican. The Republican house had passed it, but the legislature adjourned without having taken action upon it. Thereupon, by force of public opinion, the governor had to recall that legislature, and then that law was passed by both houses and signed by the governor. That was the history of it.

Mr. BENTON. The gentleman is so anxious to get to wading in the mud of St. Louis politics that he will not wait until I get to the St. Louis election law in the course of my remarks. I was finishing up about the State election law, at the instance of my friend on my left [Mr. THROPP], and making some explanations that I had failed to make in the beginning.

I challenge now the attention of this House to what these gentlemen call the Nesbit election law. The gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. BARTHOLDT] said the other day that if that law was permitted to stand there would not be any more Republican members of Congress from the city of St. Louis. God grant that his statement is true. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I say that with all due respect to the gentlemen who now occupy seats on this floor from that city.

Now, I want to say something to you about the election law for St. Louis, and why the Nesbit election law was passed. The gentleman is mistaken when he says that the governor, by force of public opinion, was forced to call the legislature in special session to pass this election law. Nothing on earth is farther from the truth.

The disposition of the people of the State was to pass a most stringent railroad law and a fellow-servant law. The legislature at its main session was composed of a Democratic senate and, remarkable to relate, for the first time since enfranchisement in 1870, of a Republican house. That was the time that the Democrats cut off their noses to spite their faces, and 60,000 of them would not vote at all, and 11 Republican Representatives from that State were rolled into this Hall, and the lower house of the legislature was Republican. The governor felt that the desire of the people should be followed out, and he did what I thought and said to him was a mistake. I was in sympathy with its purpose, but did not believe it could be accomplished. The object and purpose in his mind was to get legislation favorable to the laboring element of the State on the subject of railroads.

When they got there the only thing they accomplished was to pass a compromise, unsatisfactory election law. Well, somebody says, what complaint have you to make of the election law of 1895? It is this: It took the election machinery out of the hands of the people and their immediate representatives and the executive branch of the Government and put the finality into the hands of the circuit judges, whose business it is to try lawsuits, not to decide who should be judges and clerks of election. That was my own individual objection to it.

But I want to tell you, gentlemen, why the election law of 1899 was passed. I want to call your attention now to some figures on the subject of elections. I want to be just about as dispassionate as a reasonable man can be; but it is enough to make a man who knows the history of Missouri a little hot under the collar when a newcomer jumps on the great State of Missouri and says he wants "the curtains pulled aside and the whole thing shown up." We may say things we ought not to say. I will try to be parliamentary, but I will tell you why we passed the election law of 1899. We did it in the interest of having every man who was entitled to vote in the city of St. Louis vote in the particular precinct where he lives, where his neighbors were acquainted with him, and for the purpose of permitting him to vote once and not more than once.

The people of the State of Missouri became alarmed at the election performances that took place in St. Louis. The growth of the Republican vote in the State was large, but so was the growth of the Democratic vote in the State large. It was a splendidly healthy vote. But the growth of the Republican vote in St. Louis was so abnormal, beginning with 1895, and especially in 1896 and 1898, that the people of the State rose and demanded of their representatives in both branches of the legislature that such an election law should be passed as that the gentleman's friends, who control the city of St. Louis, could not bring men from New Orleans and Vicksburg and Memphis and Cairo and all up and down the Mississippi River and register them from five to eight times in the city and vote them in the election following. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That was never done.

Mr. BENTON. Why, of course, I rarely ever knew a man in my life who received stolen goods to confess it in open court. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Is not that the same kind of people who had ropes threatened for them by the people the other day in St. Louis?

Mr. BENTON. Yes, sir. Let me show how the State of Missouri has grown in voting power. It will throw much light on the situation. In 1880 the Democratic vote was 208,000 in round numbers, the Republican vote 153,000, and the vote of the third party, with Mr. Weaver at the head of it, 33,000. That year the vote of the city of St. Louis was, Democratic, 24,000; Republican, 23,000; Greenback, 900.

In 1882 the Democratic vote in the State was 199,000, and it was an off year, and the Republican vote was 128,000, the Greenback, 33,000. In the city of St. Louis the Democratic vote was 16,900, the Republican vote 11,300, and the Greenback vote 2,200. In 1884 the Democratic vote was 236,000, only a rise in the whole State from 208,000, whereas the Republican vote was 203,000, rising from 153,000 in 1880; and I will explain how that was done. Much has been said by Republicans about the decay and infernality of Populism. In 1884, strange to relate, our Republican, gold-standard, gold-bond friends, who have so much to say about taking care of the Government and protecting its credit, made a bargain with our Greenback friends in the State, had a joint convention and gave to our Greenback folks half the electoral ticket, and voted a solid vote against the Democratic party and swelled their vote abnormally over that of the Democratic vote; yet they were 30,000 behind, but they joined hands with those they claim are anarchists.

That same year the city of St. Louis gave for Cleveland 22,000, for Blaine 21,000, including the third party copartnership. I want to show you now that in all these years the Democratic party controlled the great city of St. Louis by a small majority, as well as the State. In 1886 the Democratic vote in the State was 230,000 and the Republican 178,000 and the third party vote 13,000. They had separated again, and the Republican vote fell wonderfully behind that of 1884. In the city of St. Louis the Democratic vote was 18,000, in round numbers, and the Republican vote 15,000. Still a majority of 3,000 for the Democrats. In 1888, a Presidential year, the whole vote of the State was, Democratic, 262,000; Republican, 235,000; the third party, 18,000; the fourth party, 4,000. In the city of St. Louis the Democratic vote was 27,000 and the Republican vote 32,000, showing the Republicans had changed the vote to a majority for their party. But we can readily get at the cause.

The Democratic party was made obnoxious by a lot of vetoes of pension bills, and for a while it looked as if the whole of the Union soldier vote was going to leave the Democratic party, and it affected the St. Louis vote. In 1890 the vote in the State for the Democratic party was 260,000, the Republican vote 188,000, a decrease. In that year the Democratic vote in the city was 25,000, the Republican vote 21,000. Our party had righted itself, and the city went with a nominal majority of from 2,000 to 4,000 Democratic. In 1892 there was not a tremendous increase of votes in the State above that of 1888. The vote in the whole State was 270,000 Democratic, 227,000 Republicans, and 41,000 third party, the latter vote a protest against our nominee for President.

In the city of St. Louis the vote was, Democrats 34,000, and Republicans 35,000. The Republicans carried the city and elected two members of Congress; and I want to call attention to that. I do not pretend to defend everything the Democratic legislature did in 1891. It was just like legislatures always do. If it had been a Republican legislature it would have done the same thing, only in a different way. There was a districting bill passed, which my Republican friends call a gerrymander, by which one powerful Republican district was formed of two counties of the State and part of the city of St. Louis and turned over to our Republican friends, to the common enemy; and when I tell you that since that time the unfortunate people of that part of Missouri have been compelled to stand the gentleman who spoke to-day as a representative you will know what a misfortune occurred to them. [Laughter.]

In 1894, as I said, a large number of Democrats did not vote at all, and we were beaten more. In 1896—now mark you—the Democratic vote of the State had risen to 365,000 and the Republican vote to 304,000. In the city of St. Louis the Democratic vote had risen to 50,000 and the Republican vote to 66,000. In other words, the splendid gain of the Democratic vote from thirty-five to fifty thousand in four years was 15,000, and the increase of the Republican vote in that same time was more than 30,000. The people of the State became satisfied that there was no such great disparity in the number of Republicans and Democrats that had come into the State; the money question could not account for it, because our vote increased 15,000. They did not believe, in the natural way of making voters, that the Republicans had been any more industrious than the Democrats. They were of the opinion that something was wrong, and the people of the State, as they had a right to, demanded that an election law be made strong enough to go to the bottom of things, so that a political party sixty-odd thousand in the minority in the State should not double its vote up from thirty-five to sixty-six thousand in four short years in St. Louis, and thus attempt to nullify the will of the people of the State.

But, you say, did the Republicans follow it up? Yes; in 1898, an off year, the Democratic vote maintained itself at 40,000, coming within 10,000 of its great vote in 1896, a Presidential year; the Republican vote held itself at over 50,000. And therefore to probe to the bottom this unprecedented Republican vote our election law of 1899 was passed. What are the provisions of that law? If there is any gentleman here who wants to call my attention to any particular provision of it, I will give him time. I shall go over the provisions of the law. By virtue of the provisions of the law of 1899, known as the Nesbit election law, for cities of 300,000 and over, the governor is required to appoint three commissioners, to be men of probity, and one of whom must be a member of the leading political party next to the dominant party in the State. We also had three commissioners under the law of 1895.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BENTON. Certainly.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not rather a serious trust to place in the hands of a Democratic governor to appoint a Republican election commissioner?

Mr. BENTON. Certainly not, when he is dealing with the kind of radicals you have in St. Louis. [Laughter.] Men that will pile up their votes in four years thirty-odd thousand ought not to be permitted to cover that work, especially when you give St. Louis such a city administration as the present. But I want to say seriously in reply to that, that there has never been a Democratic governor in Missouri who has ever made an appointment of a serious character that has been successfully attacked.

The Republican commissioner appointed by our governor under the Nesbit law is a man of high character. Of course the minority would like to have its central committee name the member of the commission. They would like to have the central committee name the judges and clerks of election, but that is not permitted by the laws of Missouri. County courts do it in the country and election commissioners in the city. These commissioners are required to select four judges of election. But, in the first place, they are required to divide the great city of St. Louis into election precincts, which must be of contiguous territory, and they must be as nearly in blocks as possible, and must have, as near as may be, 400 voters in a precinct. What was the reason of that? So that the inhabitants of that block might know their neighbors, where they came from, where they lived, how long they had lived there, and whether they were honest voters.

Does any honest man kick on that proposition? If there is a Republican on that side of the House—and there are plenty of you honest over there, just as good as we are—is there one that says that is not a good law, to make an election precinct as small as possible, even if it costs a little more money for judges and clerks, so that every voter can know that in the one, two, three, four, or five blocks who the voters are in his precinct and how many there are? That is one of the serious things that hurts the Republican machine in St. Louis in this election law—the fact that we are going to divide the great city into precincts where there are not over 400 people in one precinct to vote and where voters are known.

What is the next thing? Election commissioners, after having given a $10,000 bond, are required to appoint a deputy commissioner, who is to act as their secretary, and it is made their duty to appoint four judges. Now, I do not think my friend from St. Louis [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has been in the American Congress long enough to get brazen, but he made a serious mistake in his declarations the other day in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. He said no Republican had any chance to be a judge of election.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption right there?

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The law provides that two Republicans and two Democrats shall be appointed judges in each precinct. Is it not a fact that the three election commissioners will appoint such Republicans as suit them? Is it not possible that they will appoint four Democrats and call two of them Republicans, as was done under the old law, which the gentleman praises so much?

Mr. BENTON. No; I deny it. Now, let me read the law as it is:

> Such board of commissioners shall choose four electors as judges of election and two clerks for each precinct in such city. * * * Two of said judges and one of said clerks shall belong to and be members of the party of opposite politics to the other two judges and clerk.

Now, of course, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is not a lawyer, but he knows as a matter of history and tradition that there are such things as courts in Missouri, and that if the Democrats should violate the plain mandates of the law, the courts would be open to him. Does he not know that the election would be vitiated if they violated this section of the law, that it would invalidate the election in that ward or precinct?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. How can you tell? Suppose they appoint a Democrat and call him a Republican; and suppose when the man is called to account he says, "Yes; for the purposes of this election I am a Republican. I have changed my political faith since last night."

Mr. BENTON. Now, as the gentleman must see, that is all a matter of guesswork. My colleague constructs for himself a straw man in order that he may knock him down. He has been so used to the infernal politics of his party in the city of St. Louis for the last four years that he does not think anybody is honest. Why, gentlemen, here is the fact about it: They are compelled to appoint these four judges sixty days at least before the election.

Mr. THROPP. Are they obliged to announce them?

Mr. BENTON. Yes; their names must be published; they must be voters in the precinct where they are judges; must be capable men and not candidates. But that is not all. These commissioners elect two clerks, and it is the business of the clerks to go around from house to house to make up and verify their lists of men already registered, and the law requires that no one of the clerks shall go except in company with the other, and that the clerks must be of opposite politics.

Mr. THROPP. Suppose that one or two of those commissioners are objectionable to the party, or to members of the party, which they are chosen to represent. Is there any way by which the regular organization of that party can have others substituted?

Mr. BENTON. Not unless they can show that the commissioners are not members of that party, or can show that they are personally dishonest, or that they are criminals or ex-criminals, or for other lawful reasons are disqualified. The whole of the criminal laws of the State are spread over this election law. No one has a right to come in and say, "We do not want John Smith for judge." We sometimes allow them to come in, but it is not the rule. The rule is for the Republican courts in Republican counties to name the judges and in Democratic counties for the Democratic court to name the judges. As we have seventy-odd counties to their thirty-odd, of course we have more judges in the State than they have.

Mr. THROPP. Why not amend your law so as to allow the regular organization of each party to choose its election officers in the county?

Mr. BENTON. It never has been the law in the State of Missouri to do that. The power has always been lodged in the county court in outside counties. We have never had political parties (except as they controlled the courts) meddling with the business assigned to the court.

Mr. THROPP. Do you not think the plan I have suggested would bring the officers closer to the people and that the system would be more in conformity with the representative idea?

Mr. BENTON. No; I do not. I would rather trust a Republican county judge than a Republican committeeman, because the county judges elected by the Republicans are usually as straight men as the Democratic judges are.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Does not my friend know that in regard to the appointment of judges and clerks under the law he is now discussing the courts have no jurisdiction to make inquiry into the matter?

Mr. BENTON. Of course they have not the right which they had under the law of 1895, but it is idle and incorrect for the gentleman to say that courts have no power when the law is violated.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. That is just what is the matter with the law.

Mr. BENTON. The courts have not the right to nullify what the commissioners have done by ordinary petition under the law of 1899. Under the law of 1895, if anybody kicked, or if nobody kicked, the circuit judges took under advisement the list of judges and purged them on any complaint that satisfied them. We said, "The criminal laws of the whole State should apply to St. Louis as well as to the other portions of the State; the nisi prius courts should not control at all, except when the provisions of the law were openly violated, and if the commissioners authorized by law to appoint judges and clerks violate the law, either in St. Louis or throughout the State, there should be an appeal to the law in St. Louis as well as in Springfield or elsewhere."

The trouble with the gentlemen from St. Louis is this: The majority of the judges of the circuit courts are of their making; most of them were elected in 1896 and in 1898. They, the Republicans, evidently think—I do not think so, for I believe that the judiciary of St. Louis is composed of fair men—they evidently believe that the judiciary of St. Louis can be manipulated in the interests of a particular party organization. That is the only trouble with you about this election law. It is simply that the Republicans are worried to death because the machinery is put in the hands of honest men—some Republicans and some Democrats. I say to my colleagues that if it can be proved that a man who has been appointed as a Republican judge is in fact a Democrat in disguise there is a right of appeal to the courts of the country under the extraordinary writs which all lawyers know exist in every State of the Union, and especially in Missouri.

The commissioners are compelled to comply with that statute. Now what do they do? These clerks go from house to house to verify these lists. When they come to a two-story house with a cellar and 10 rooms and find that 50 men have been registered as residing in that house, or even 30 or 20——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENTON. I thought I was to have an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied an hour.

Mr. BENTON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PIERCE] promised me some time.

The CHAIRMAN. One hour having been occupied on the Democratic side of the House, the Chair must now recognize some gentleman on the Republican side.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be permitted to continue and conclude his speech, the time which he may occupy coming out of my hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PIERCE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be permitted to continue and conclude his speech, the time thus occupied to be taken from the time which the gentleman from Tennessee would hereafter have. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. GAINES. Before the gentleman from Missouri resumes, will he allow me to remind him that the game which he was just now describing has been practiced very successfully in the city of Philadelphia, where, according to the exposures of the North American newspaper, 150 men have been found registered at a single dwelling where perhaps not more than 10 or 20 would really reside?

Mr. BENTON. Yes. When these two clerks appointed by the commissioners—one a Republican and the other a Democrat—go around in these election precincts and find that 50 or 60 men have been registered as residents at a house where there are only 18 or 20 living, it is the duty of the clerks to verify the list, and if they find only 18 men living at a house where 50 are registered, it is their sworn duty to give that information to the election registry board and must notify the persons registered; and the board of registration, Republican and Democratic, the Republican clerk and the Democratic clerk, shall purge that list by notifying each one of the men registered at that particular house to come forward and prove his right to vote, failing to do which he loses that right.

There is another thing which seems to hurt worse than anything else. It has been charged—I do not live in St. Louis; I have not lived there since I was a schoolboy—it has been charged frequently by Populists and Prohibitionists and Democrats that boat loads of negroes were hauled up from New Orleans, Vicksburg, Memphis, Helena, Cairo, Ill., and Columbus, Ky., and dumped out at St. Louis where they were registered as belonging to the Fourth Ward or the Fifth Ward or some other ward of that city, and it was the aim of the people of Missouri to ascertain whether that charge was true or not. I do not know that such charges were true. It was charged by men there——

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri rose.

Mr. BENTON. Wait a minute till I get through with my sentence and I will give you a show. Of course, I do not want to be ungenerous to my colleague. I always yield.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Does the gentleman assume any responsibility himself for that statement?

Mr. BENTON. Do I?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BENTON. I absolutely assume responsibility for the statement I made.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Do you assume responsibility for that imputation that we imported voters from New Orleans to St. Louis?

Mr. BENTON. Did you hear me say anything of that sort?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I heard you make the insinuation.

Mr. BENTON. No; you did not.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. BENTON. You misunderstood; you are just out of humor. You heard me say that it was charged by the people of St. Louis, Prohibitionists, Populists, and Democrats, that such was the fact, and that I distinctly said, not having lived there for thirty years, I did not know the truth of it.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Did you mean to create that impression here in this House?

Mr. BENTON. I meant to create the impression that that has been stated, and that that story went to Jefferson City to the legislature, and that the legislature, believing the statements were true, determined to make an election law that would prevent it. That is what I mean.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Are you willing to tell us who made any such statement?

Mr. BENTON. Any particular person?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BENTON. Why, I do not pretend to say. I say very frankly that I believe that the records which I have read show that your vote has grown abnormally, and that, in my opinion, is dishonesty, and that the legislature believed it proved dishonesty and determined to make a law that would permit persons to vote who were entitled and no others.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Does the gentleman not know that while the State of Missouri, outside of the city of St. Louis, was a silver State, the city of St. Louis is a sound-money city?

Mr. BENTON. Well, how does it come, then——

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. That is how it comes.

Mr. BENTON. How does it come, then, that we increased our vote 15,000 over the vote of 1892, which was a big increase, and yet your increase was more than double ours, with a less vote cast previous to that time?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I say that accounts for the large Republican vote there.

Mr. BENTON. Do you pretend to say that the fight as between Valliant and Marshall on one side and the Republican candidates on the other was a contest as between the gold and silver standards?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. But you are speaking of 1896. That was the vote that you read here.

Mr. BENTON. Well, I read the vote of 1898 too. It seems that the gentleman's ears are only open for one statement at a time. I am covering both elections.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. You have been reading from the statistics of 1896.

Mr. BENTON. I read from 1898 too.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. And I say the vote of 1896 and 1898 in the city of St. Louis was owing to the fact, which is well known through this country, that the city of St. Louis is a sound-money city.

Mr. BENTON. Well, great guns, Mr. Chairman, we increased our vote normally. We increased our vote almost 50 per cent.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. And by reason of the fact that the free-silver heresy prevailed outside of the city of St. Louis in the rest of the State of Missouri.

Mr. BENTON. But that does not account for our great increase in St. Louis.

I beg the gentleman's pardon for anything personal, but I was talking of the city vote, where you say sound money caused your big vote. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am willing to confess that some two thousand Democrats in the Twelfth Congressional district, more than came to us from the Republican side, went to the Republican column in 1896, and that that is the cause of the Twelfth district being represented by the gentleman [Mr. PEARCE of Missouri] on this floor, as far as I know. That is the reason I assign for the gentleman's election twice from a Democratic district, but that does not account for your increase of nearly 100 per cent in four years, while the Democrats had a fully normal increase of 30 per cent.

I was not undertaking to say what I knew about the city of St. Louis, but I said to you what the charges were that were made by people in St. Louis. Now, the gentleman knows they came to the legislature in streams. He wants me to individualize. I was not there. I read in the public prints what the charges were, made by Democrats, Populists, and Prohibitionists. I have just read from the election returns of the State and of the city, for twenty years back, to show that the growth of the Republican vote and the Democratic vote had been normal up to 1896; that the growth of the Democratic vote in 1896 was still normal, and even a little in advance of it, and yet the Republican vote had increased from 35,000 to 66,000 in two years, and that, in my opinion, I said, was an abnormal growth, and that in my opinion, following, it was not an honest growth.

Now, it will not do to say that the tremendous Republican vote came from the Democratic party and swelled that vote from 34,800 to 66,000 when at the same time the Democratic vote was increased 15,000 in the same four years. That does not meet the question. I say that is the reason why the Democratic legislators from the mountains, the prairies, and the valleys of Missouri determined to go in and make an election law that would be absolutely pure and straight and clean, and that a man under that new law should live in the State of Missouri twelve months, and should live in the city of St. Louis sixty days, and in the ward or precinct where he desired to vote twenty days. And this very law would help him, because if he wants to move after he has been registered he can go and have his registration changed. If he is not 21 years old at the time of registration, but will be 21 years old on election day, they must register him in the precinct where he lives.

I never was on an election committee from the legislature that went to St. Louis. I never was an attorney in an election case. I do not know. I have read and heard the charges only, but I do say and I challenge the radicals from Missouri to read to this Republican House this Nesbit election law. Read it all. And then if you can honestly damn it, you damn your own performances in the great city of St. Louis. No honest Republican can object to this law, not a word of it. After the election, when the votes have been polled (and every party has a challenger at the polls in St. Louis as well as outside), it is made the duty of one of these judges of election to string these ballots when they are called, they being called by one and strung by another, in the presence of those who watch for us, and when it is over the ballots are put in the box and it is sealed up and the names of the judges of election are written upon it and the boxes are not permitted to be tampered with. If a box is tampered with, it can be seen. Then it is locked up and kept there and not reopened unless on a contest before the courts of the State.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that when any man attacks the present election law of our great State of Missouri or of the city of St. Louis he does it in the face of the fact that he has the right, if he does not believe that law is constitutional, to go before the courts of the State, and there is not a Republican on this floor who would have the hardihood to challenge the supreme court of the State of Missouri as being dishonest. If he does, and the story gets back to Missouri, he would have to prove it or himself be pilloried as a dishonest man.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. BENTON. Yes.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. May I ask the gentleman if he does not know that there is a case now pending in the supreme court of the State of Missouri to test the constitutionality of the Nesbit law?

Mr. BENTON. Exactly. And it was the duty of your colleague [Mr. BARTHOLDT] to have sat still and let the great State of Missouri pass upon it, through the supreme court of the State, and not make the Nesbit law an excuse to attack our laws and our people.

If the Nesbit law is unconstitutional, if there is one line of it unconstitutional, you can rest assured that the old Democratic supreme court, one member of whom has been on the bench for nearly thirty years, will give you the benefit of your constitutional rights.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I hope so.

Mr. BENTON. That is an insinuation that is unjust, coming from a gentleman who knows that the supreme court of Missouri has never been attacked for unjust or unconstitutional decisions. I need not defend the supreme court of Missouri. Men may crawl around the feet of our judges as vermin and attack them as they please, but the splendid records of men who have set upon our supreme court bench for thirty years are a part of the history of this great Government, and no small-bore, two-by-four, radical politicians can hurt that great court. [Applause.] The decisions of the supreme court of Missouri are read and cited in the great States of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, with approval, as well as in Georgia, Texas, and Virginia; and the supreme court of Missouri stands as high in rank for legal ability and personal character as any court in America. With that grand old Missourian, Sherwood, at its head, that court is above attack. Our judges are not politicians. The judges of the supreme court are not now to be nominated in a political convention. This is given over to the legal fraternity, and the high character of our supreme court can not be successfully criticised by the gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. PEARCE] by any insinuations he may make. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. BENTON. I have no objection to yielding, if I had all day to talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope I will never have again, while I am a member of this Congress, to defend my State. I hope no man from Missouri will ever have to do it. We were invited by the Representative from the Tenth Missouri district [Mr. BARTHOLDT], to use his own language, "to raise the curtain" and look at Missouri. I can say to him that a man of more ability and greater brilliancy than he, as the Republican nominee for governor in 1892, presumed to raise the curtain of Missouri since 1865 and invite scrutiny. He had one round of it at Sedalia, and it satisfied him for all time. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I have been driven into this debate. My Republican colleague has the curtain up, and we must see more of it.

Shortly after the war, when 75,000 people of Missouri who had been the owners of the soil—I had nigh said the aristocracy of the State, but that would have been wrong, because in Missouri we have no aristocracy of the blood; we know of no other aristocracy than that of individual merit and personal accomplishment [applause]—when the best element in the State under the Draconian constitution were not permitted to vote, county courts were organized, not with the votes of the people, but were given whole and complete authority to put their slimy hands into the pockets of the people and burden the resources of our bleeding State, and they fastened a railroad bonded debt on about 35 different counties, many of which never saw a foot of railroad, and yet had bonds of from two hundred thousand to twelve hundred thousand dollars fastened on them.

When the people of the State got control and elected their own county officers, they found bonds piled up on them, made by these midnight caucuses of Republican county officers. They had been sold to innocent parties for a valuable consideration without notice—that usual plea set up by a scoundrel who wants to collect a dishonestly contracted debt. They came to our people and said: "We have got $400,000 of bonds against your county." They asked that they be paid, and the county officers replied, "Where is the railroad?" "Oh," they said, "we do not know anything about that. You issued the bonds for it." Our people replied, "We can not pay for these bonds; the people did not know that these bonds were being issued; no authority was given for the creation of these bonds; we had not the usual notice of the bonds being issued." There were fifteen or twenty million dollars of these bonds issued.

The bondholders appealed to the Federal courts, and they took the county judges and put them in the jails of Kansas City, Springfield, and St. Jo when they refused to make a levy to pay these fraudulent bonds. There they lay with felons and criminals of every class. They forced the counties to compromise these debts in all but three counties in the State, and in these the judges of the county courts have been for years fugitives, although the unanimous choice of their counties for the judgeships they hold. And in this way the Republican party, in city, township, and county indebtedness, put $32,000,000 upon the people of the State, when a large number could not vote. The great State of Missouri had just prior to 1860 loaned its credit to five great railroad corporations for $31,000,000 to help develop the State. When the war was over, not having been able to pay the accumulated interest on these bonds, they rose to $36,000,000, with interest.

The State was not able to pay them, but we had a first-mortgage lien on every line of railroad in the State, and the appraisers appointed by a Republican governor of the State reported the cash value of the roads on which we had a mortgage at $37,000,000, and probably $15,000,000. Here another dark chapter begins. The Republican party, by its legislature and its governor, then in complete control of the State, by virtue of disfranchisement, sold the liens on these railroads, amounting to $31,500,000, and on railroads worth not less than $37,000,000, and probably $15,000,000, for the pitiful sum of $6,131,000, when there was no sort of necessity for it.

They collected a large amount of money from other sources. The Government paid them a great deal of money; altogether they collected $19,582,000, and only $6,131,000 was from the State's mortgage on the railroad; and with that $19,000,000 they paid $14,000,000 of the State debt in four years. Mark you, the first-mortgage lien on these railroads belonged to the sovereign State. We had a right to foreclose our mortgage and get our bonds paid out first, but the Republican party, through its administration of State affairs, sold the lien of the State worth forty millions for the paltry sum of six millions and a fraction, still leaving more than thirty millions of debt; and then by collections from the Federal Government and by enormous taxation that ran as high as 90 cents on the hundred dollars, besides occupation tax and poll tax, they only paid $14,000,000 in that time.

And when we came into power in 1873 we found fastened on us the enormous debt of $21,000,000. And what for? Because of the fact that the Republican administration, and legislature behind it, had sold our mortgage liens, which would have paid the debt and had millions left, had sold it for six millions and a fraction, and the people of Missouri had to assume the balance. We were then paying 50 cents on $100 taxation, and our legislature, under the constitution made in 1875, brought down the tax levy of the State to 20 cents for general purposes and 10 cents for interest, and made it obligatory that when the great State should reach an assessed value of $900,000,000 the assessment should be 5 cents less. And so it is that while we have reduced the taxation one-half in that time, while we have added to the great school fund of the State $3,640,000, making the grand total of $4,393,000, the actual money for which the State issued certificates, I say, after having cut the taxes in half, we have reduced that indebtedness from twenty-one million until, on the 1st of January, 1900, there is the paltry sum of $2,800,000 of that awful debt left upon us by the Republicans when we came into power.

One more term of Democratic government in Missouri will wipe out the whole State debt. The gentleman [Mr. BARTHOLDT] refers to the time when the Republicans, good and true men of the State, will come again to their own and be in possession of the State government of Missouri. In view of the fact, my fellow-countrymen, that in the township, city, county, and State debts which these people piled up on us, amounting to $70,000,000 in the five years in which they controlled the State, his hope will be long deferred. As long as these men live who were not permitted the right of suffrage, who were not permitted to practice law, were not permitted to practice medicine, were not permitted to preach the gospel of Christ, were not permitted to teach school in their neighborhood; as long as the men who have come to America, and their sons after them, the men who have come from the North and who have learned the story from the public prints and from their friends of what the Republicans did when in control, so long will it be impossible for the dream of the gentleman from the Tenth district of Missouri to be realized; so long as we keep our memory there will not be a Republican administration in the great State of Missouri. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The State of Missouri's record for financial integrity is as high as any State in this American Union. Nature has been wonderfully good to us; she has blessed us beyond belief. We were a border State when the war came up. Unfortunately, our people did not think alike on the subject, and 89,000 of them joined hands with their brothers in the South, and 109,000 were loyal to the flag of the Union. It made a bitter and disagreeable state of affairs in that great State. It was a battle ground, a fight between the militia and the guerrillas, to say nothing of the great armies of the contending forces passing across her borders. At last peace came, and at last the people made up their minds that the way to have lasting peace was for every man to be permitted, white or black, Republican or Democrat, whatever his politics might be, to vote at every election, and vote once and only once, and the people of Missouri have with great cheerfulness accepted the results of every election held in the great State of Missouri.

It is wonderful what this great State has done since the people got in possession of their own property and their own elections. She had a fraction over 1,000,000 people thirty years ago. I think I can promise you that the census of 1900 will give us three and a half million people. Thirty years ago, or twenty-seven years ago, when we took control of the State, the assessed valuation of that State was something like $400,000,000. It has mounted at the rate of one hundred millions every quadrennial period, and to-day, with an assessed valuation at the rate of about 62 cents on the dollar of its real value, we have an assessed valuation of twelve hundred million dollars. We are also superlatively blessed by nature. The State of Missouri can, perhaps, come nearer making a Chinese wall around herself than any other sovereignty in the Government and live within herself. She has all the great things within the borders of the earth, except gold and silver, that you can get out of the earth.

It has a splendid climate, a magnificent people—with here and there an exception in the shape of a croaker as a member of Congress from St. Louis. [Laughter.] And let me say to you that that great State under Democratic control has prospered in spite of national laws that bore down upon her people and tied the hands of her great industries. The bulk of our industry in the State of Missouri is farming and stock raising; and there has been no legislation in favor of the man who follows the plow and wields the hoe. Yet in spite of that, in spite of adverse legislation, in spite of legislation which has been hurtful to the people of that sovereign State, her growth has been marvelous. We are filling up with people. We have got there the adventurous Yankee from New England, the German, the Englishman, the Irishman, the Frenchman. These people from other localities have settled within our borders, become good citizens, have bought and cultivated our lands; and when Germans have settled themselves there, they have not called themselves "German-Americans." [Laughter.] When they have become naturalized, they regard themselves as American citizens and Missourians.

Mr. Chairman, I hope I may never have to say another word in defense of the State of Missouri. I hope these old, bad memories will be allowed to rest and that men of all parties may live at peace in Missouri. I think her history will speak for her. But while I am not to that State "native and to the manner born," I claim to be as good a Missourian as he who was born there, because after I had attained my majority I chose that State from among all the States of the Union for my permanent home. I have made my home there. I brought there the wife of my bosom. I have buried my dead there. My children were born there; and the time will never come when I shall undertake to foul the nest that for thirty-odd years has given me a home. The State of Missouri will take care of herself; and the attacks of gentlemen here will make no difference. If the Nesbit election law is as vile as gentlemen here say it is, the Supreme Court, if it find one improper line, will cause its repeal.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I hope so.

Mr. BENTON. If that election law is permitted to stand, as I hope it will be, you will have a fair and honest election in St. Louis; and then, in my opinion, the gentleman's prophecy made in the caucus of his party, that no other Republican will darken the doors of this House from Missouri, will be fulfilled. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has four minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is guilty of the charge which he hurled at me. He said that I was putting up a straw man to knock him down. No word, no syllable has been uttered by me or by my colleague to-day assailing the honor or the integrity of the State of Missouri or her people. No word nor syllable has been spoken here by us to assail the honor or integrity of the supreme court of the State of Missouri—not one word. When it comes to a question of loyalty to the State of Missouri, I say, although my friend characterizes me as a newcomer, having lived in the State but twenty-seven years, I am his peer and certainly second to no Democrat from that State.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid some of the statements which the gentleman has made are misleading. I believe you gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House to be fair, well-meaning men. You are desirous of knowing the facts in relation to the election laws of Missouri. My friend has assuredly mixed up and confounded the law as applied to the State and the law as applied to the city of St. Louis. It is true that the law now in force in rural Missouri is a good law, and that is the very reason why we want its operation continued in the city of St. Louis. If it is a good law, why, then, was it changed and the change to exclusively apply to the city of St. Louis?

If the growth of Republicanism alarms the gentleman, I merely point him to the fact that under the old election laws, which provided for a Democratic register of voters and for none but Democratic or so-called Republican judges and clerks of elections, the Republicans of my city had to cast 20,000 Republican majority before they were credited with 1,000 when the result of the election was announced. After that a fair election law was enacted by a Republican house and a Democratic senate and signed by a Democratic governor, and under that law, for the first time in the history of the city of St. Louis, we received our dues. The votes cast were honestly counted, and the result revealed a tremendous Republican majority. That is just what is nettling our Democratic friends. They put their heads together and said that "that condition must be changed; we will have to make St. Louis Democratic; honestly, if we can, by an unfair election law, if we must."

So they put this law upon the statute books, and, Mr. Chairman, I stand by every word I uttered in denunciation of that infamous piece of legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PUGH. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PEARCE].

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. It has been my habit since I have had the honor of being a member of this House to treat all of my associate members, whether they agree with me in politics or whether they do not, with perfect personal courtesy.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has gone a long way out of his track to make some personal attacks upon me, for what reason I do not know and care less. A man who resorts to that sort of procedure in the course of debate is certainly weak, if he is not cowardly, and that is all I have to say on that subject.

The gentleman has given us here some history as to the condition of things in the State of Missouri, and he has told us about the constitution of 1865. It is true. I notice that whenever a Republican criticises or debates the correctness of things in the South our Democratic friends immediately say that we are flaunting the bloody shirt, and I also notice that if there is any mistake or unfortunate condition of things chargeable to the Republican party, at any time in the history of the land, a Democrat never fails to bring it to light at the first opportunity, especially if it grew out of the civil war.

In 1865, gentlemen, we were right after the close of the war. Blood was hot, men were savage, but the constitution of Missouri of 1865 provided one condition only, and that was that a man in order to enjoy the immunities of that State must have been a loyal man. No man was ever subjected to the penalties of that constitution unless he was chargeable with disloyalty.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not true that Gen. Frank Blair, after fighting for four years in the Union Army and commanding a corps, was refused the privilege of voting under that Drake constitution?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. The cause——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute. Was he not refused the right to vote and did he not sue the judges and bring that case to the Supreme Court of the United States and "bust" the Drake constitution?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Yes; because that constitution provided a test oath, which General Blair refused to take, for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of that provision.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask another question. I will have the gentleman's time extended. Did not General Blair state, when they wanted him to take that test oath, that he fought four years to put down the rebellion; that he would be willing to fight four years more, but that he could not take that test oath without swearing to a lie, because he did sympathize with his blood relations and his friends who were in the Confederacy, and he would not take it on that ground? Is not that the truth about it, and did not that oath require a man to swear that he not only did not abet the rebellion, but that he did not sympathize with any soul that was in the rebellion?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Well, my good friend is not correct; but I am not defending that constitutional provision. I am simply giving to this House the historical condition of the thing; that is all. I went to the city of St. Louis in 1866, and from that hour to this I have been campaigning upon the skirmish lines of the Republican party. In Democratic territory I have been rotten egged; I have had stones thrown at me; I have been fired at; I have been driven off the stump in Democratic counties in that State, time and time again from 1866 to 1874, by Democratic thugs and Democratic heelers. That was the condition of things that prevailed there; and yet in 1872, despite those facts, I am one of the men who voted to repeal that constitutional inhibition, and to entitle all the voters of our great State to the right of suffrage.

It seems to me that it was foreign to this discussion to lug in the constitution of the State of Missouri of 1865. What in the name of conscience has that to do with the Nesbit election law?

It happens that the city of St. Louis is a city which is living at this time, and has been for twenty years, under a separate charter; and the election law which applies to the counties of the State, and even to the city of Kansas City, does not apply to the city of St. Louis.

Mr. ROBB. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. ROBB. The gentleman asked what certain matters had to do with the Nesbit election law. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think the State of Missouri is fully capable of taking care of its own election law?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I suppose so. It has the right, I believe, to take care of its own election laws. I do not see the point of the gentleman's question.

Mr. ROBB. Then, as the gentleman does not see the point, I should like to ask him what point is there in this discussion if the State of Missouri is capable of taking care of her own election laws, as we all believe she is?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Possibly before I get through the gentleman may be able to discover the point. I am speaking here in my own time and not by virtue of the sufferance of the gentleman, I believe.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman refers to the Kansas City election law, which I understand the gentleman to heartily indorse. I wish to ask him if his colleague [Mr. BARTHOLDT] did not condemn that law in the same terms in which he condemned the St. Louis law?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I am not responsible for the utterances of my friends.

Mr. COWHERD. I will ask the gentleman if the Republican party did not condemn it when it was passed?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I am responsible only for what I say; and I say, with a full knowledge of the responsibility which I have in saying it, after a careful study of the Nesbit election law, that it is the most disgraceful piece of election legislation that was ever written upon a statute book—worse in its administrative features than the law enacted in Kentucky and known as the Goebel law. Here is an election law that provides that the governor of the State of Missouri shall appoint an election board. It then vests in that election board the absolute power—without the power of review by the courts of our State—the absolute power to institute and control all the machinery of politics in the city of St. Louis, and that law was passed and made applicable to St. Louis, not in specific terms, but made applicable to cities of 300,000 population. And as there is but one such city in the State of Missouri, it was therefore designed and enacted for the purpose of stealing the city of St. Louis from the Republican party by whatsoever means were appropriable to that nefarious undertaking, and the courts have no power of review. The gentleman talks about the growth of parties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the gentleman ought to have five minutes more. I took up some of his time.

Mr. CANNON. If I can be recognized in my own time, I should be glad to yield some time to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized more gentlemen than will occupy all the time that has been assigned, provided each gentleman demands the balance of his hour. The Chair will of course recognize the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], but the Chair desired to make that statement so that there might be no misunderstanding to-morrow when gentlemen who have been recognized can not obtain a full hour's time.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, did the Chair include my name among those recognized for to-morrow?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not. The gentleman has not yet been recognized. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PEARCE].

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. BENTON], from what motive I do not know, undertook to put into my mouth an innuendo against the supreme court of my State.

He knows that he had no justification for that statement. I made no attack, I made no intimation of any kind that would reflect upon the supreme court of Missouri, which court I respect and honor, and before which I have practiced for nearly thirty years.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is it not a fact that while his colleague was talking, and was saying that the supreme court of Missouri would certainly give justice in considering this law, that the gentleman said with what seemed to me to be an ironical tone of voice, "I hope so?"

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I did not use the word "justice."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. When the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] was saying that the supreme court would consider that law and do justice, did not you say in a sotto voce tone of voice, "I hope so?" And was not that the occasion of the gentleman going off and saying that you had made an insinuation?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Some gentlemen here thought you did.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. That was on the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri. I said there was a case in the supreme court of Missouri between the parties contesting the constitutionality of the law, and he expressed the opinion, as I got the idea, that you can get justice. I supposed his reference was that we would get the case, and I said I hoped so. I supposed that was what he meant, and that is what I meant.

The State of Missouri is one of the imperial States of this Union. I have lived in it longer than the gentleman himself has, because I went there in 1866; and in my humble way I have tried to build up her glory and her prosperities. I have tried early and late, year in and year out, to build up those prosperities upon the only line upon which, in my judgment, they could have been built up, and that is on the line of the Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is that party that has given that State her prosperities in the development of her mines of zinc and lead, in her great forests of timber, in constructural stone, and in everything, indeed, of importance.

The prosperity in her cereals, too, has been developed, in my humble opinion, by the policy of the Republican party, and therefore I have advocated it. He cites you to the growth of the Republican party in Missouri. Yes; it has grown from small beginnings in 1866 to an imperial vote of 305,000; and if the percentage of growth of the Republican party, as compared with the Democratic party, holds for the next five years as it has for the last ten, then the prediction of my colleague from St. Louis will be verified and a Republican governor and a Republican legislature will control the destinies of that State. My friend speaks of the vote in 1866.

Mr. ROBB. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. ROBB. Suppose you had a Republican governor in the State of Missouri, do you think that you and your colleague would be so hostile to this Nesbit election law that you now condemn and criticise so severely?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. The first thing a Republican legislature would do would be to repeal the infamous statute and give the Democrats a full chance at the polls. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the policy of the Republican party. It is insinuated by the gentleman in his accusation that New Orleans negroes were imported into Missouri. I challenge the statement made by him or any other man, and I denounce it as absolutely false. I know as much about the elections of the city of St. Louis as any other man in this House; and I tell you that never in the history of that State, whether under Democratic or Republican régimes, has there ever been any such importation as the accusation intimates.

The reason for the large growth of the Republican party vote in 1896 and in 1898 was because of the fact that the city of St. Louis, with a normal Republican majority of 15,000, increased her vote largely because it was known to be and is in fact a sound-money center. The great mass of her people believe in a sound-money policy. When I was nominated for Congress in 1896 I told my Congressional committee that if I ran for Congress in 1896, I did not propose to split any hairs upon the money question. I fought that campaign, gentlemen, upon the gold standard, in workshops, among the rich men, among the poor, and I carried that Democratic district, which had been Democratic ever since 1890, by nearly 4,000 majority, and would have carried it by over 5,500 majority if I had not been swindled out of 1,500 by the Democratic management. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I never found any difficulty in arguing Republican principles in the city of St. Louis, and I never found any difficulty about arguing them in the State of Missouri, except as I have had to face Democratic rotten eggs, Democratic brickbats, and Democratic bullets.

Mr. ROBB. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to his colleague?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ROBB. I want to suggest that I think the gentleman ought to have had the other fifteen hundred for being an exception to the rule—the fact that he was honest and came out in favor of the gold standard.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I have no pretenses to make. If I do not represent properly the sentiment of the majority of the people who live in my Congressional district, I do not want to be in the House of Representatives—I have no business here—and if I thought at this hour that I did not correctly represent their sentiment on this floor, I would resign my place to-morrow morning. There is something else in the membership of this House besides the mere dignity of being here, the benefits of being here. We are here holding in our hands a sacred trust, and no man of honor would sit here an hour unless he thought he was a representative of the majority sentiment of the district in which he lived.

And so in 1898 in the State of Missouri, as is known to a great many people at least, the silver sentiment, so called, prevailed throughout the whole State. Even such counties as Jasper and Greene, counties which were heretofore Republican, went hell bent for the silver heresy; and these facts account for the large increase in the Democratic vote in the State of Missouri and of the Republican vote of the city of St. Louis.

Now, as my colleague has said, if the election laws of the State as applied to Kansas City, St. Joseph, and other communities in the State—if those are such rightful, proper election laws, I ask this House why, in the name of God, was it necessary to pass a special election law and vest this whole election machinery, the registration, the polls, and the returns, in a Democratic board of commissioners from whose decision there is no appeal under the law?

Now, we are not frightened. I do not agree with my colleague from the city of St. Louis about the results of this law. I have had to face Democratic legislation before that I did not like. I have never hesitated to fight it. I will fight this law on the hustings, in the courts, at the polls, everywhere and at all times, because it is an unrighteous, impolitic, unfair, un-American device to prostitute the sacred privilege of the ballot box to the nefarious ends of a political party, the results of which you have seen in the occurrences of a sister State only a fortnight ago. Shall we have more of it? Has the time come when our ambitions for party success are so great that we must needs be unfair and dishonest in our relations to our fellow-men? If that be so, gentlemen, then I give you warning that you will live to see the day when you will bitterly regret it. It does not scare anybody. The city of St. Louis is a Republican city by 15,000 majority, and she will remain so despite all your election machinery, backed up by 400 new Democratic policemen put into office for the purpose of giving force and effect to a nefarious election law.

Mr. COWHERD. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I want to ask him a question. Is not the Republican election commissioner in St. Louis, appointed by the governor, one of the most reputable citizens of that city and a lifelong Republican?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I do not know; I was not there when the appointment was made.

Mr. COWHERD. Well, the gentleman knows by the press.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. No; I do not. Who is he?

Mr. COWHERD. He is one of the best known manufacturers there, Mr. Cobush.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I am not acquainted with him. I have been absent from St. Louis for some time. I simply say this, if my colleague will permit me, that an appointment of an opposite party official is not, in my judgment at least, a safe trust to vest in the hands of another party man. Heretofore under the old election law the governor appointed two of the election commissioners, and the mayor of the city of St. Louis appointed the third. Why was it changed? They had the majority then. It was changed simply for the purpose of enabling the governor of the State to put into that board somebody who would answer his purpose rather than somebody who would not. I do not mean that remark to apply to this appointee. I do not know the gentleman who has been appointed, as I have been absent from St. Louis a long time, but I am speaking of the possibilities of the law. The thing is wrong on its face and a fraud in its intent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. PAYNE, having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2356. An act extending the powers and functions of the Court of Private Land Claims to June 30, 1902—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

S. 79. An act to construct a road to the national cemetery at Dover, Tenn.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. R. 36. Joint resolution to carry into effect two resolutions of the Continental Congress directing monuments to be erected to the memory of Generals Francis Nash and William Lee Davidson, of North Carolina—to the Committee on the Library.

S. 1356. An act for the relief of Edwin L. Field—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2366. An act to authorize the establishment at some point in North Carolina of a station for the investigation of problems connected with marine fishery interests of the middle and south Atlantic coast—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 1535. An act to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Navy and to regulate promotion therein—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 1632. An act to amend "An act authorizing certain officers of the Navy and Marine Corps to administer oaths," approved January 25, 1895—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 2147. An act to place Lieut. Col. and Bvt. Maj. Gen. Alexander Stewart Webb on the retired list of the United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 726. An act for the relief of Alice Walsh—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2324. An act to authorize Hon. Arthur S. Hardy, at present envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Greece, Roumania, and Servia, to accept the decoration tendered to him by the Shah of Persia while he was minister of the United States to that country—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 2022. An act to authorize Rear-Admiral William T. Sampson, United States Navy; Capt. Henry C. Taylor, United States Navy; Capt. Francis A. Cook, United States Navy; Capt. Charles D. Sigsbee, United States Navy; Capt. French E. Chadwick, United States Navy; Capt. Caspar F. Goodrich, United States Navy; Commander William W. Mead, United States Navy; Commander James H. Dayton, United States Navy; Commander Frederick M. Symonds, United States Navy, and Commander Chapman C. Todd, United States Navy, to accept orders and decorations tendered to them by the Government of Venezuela—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 630. An act for the relief of Mrs. Harriet D. Newson—to the Committee on Claims.

S. R. 60. Joint resolution granting permission for the erection of a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of Gen. Francis E. Spinner, late Treasurer of the United States—to the Committee on the Library.

S. 2681. An act for the establishment of joint light-houses and fog-signal station on the coast of Alaska—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 1289. An act to provide for the construction of an additional light-ship for use on the coast of California, Oregon, Washington, or Alaska, as exigencies may determine—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 983. An act for the relief of Lindley C. Kent and Joseph Jenkins as the sureties of Frank A. Webb—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 165. An act for the relief of Robert J. Spottswood and the heirs of William C. McClellan, deceased—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 945. An act for the purchase and construction of a launch for the customs service at and in the vicinity of Astoria, Oreg.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 557. An act for the relief of Thomas Rosbrugh—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

S. 76. An act for the relief of the University of Kansas—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1749. An act for the payment to Joshua T. Roberts of balance due for surveying public lands—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 188. An act for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Roberts, deceased—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2840. An act for enlarging the public building at Portland, Oreg., situated between Morrison, Yamhill, Fifth, and Sixth streets, in said city—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Senate concurrent resolution 26:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to have a survey made, and submit a report and an estimate for deepening and properly improving the channel through the outer bar in the Gulf of Mexico near the mouth of Mobile Bay—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3718. An act for the preservation of the frigate Constitution.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. R. 83. Joint resolution increasing the limit of cost of the new building for the Government Printing Office, to meet the increased prices of building materials, and to permit of making the south end of the power-house extension of the same height as the main building.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 8582) making appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to reserve all points of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama reserves all points of order. The bill, with the accompanying report, will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. HEMENWAY (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue relating to readjustment of salaries of collectors of internal revenue throughout the country—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 15, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

SOUTH CAROLINA STATE CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 7th instant, a report of the Auditor for the War Department relative to the account between the United States and the State of South Carolina growing out of the claim for moneys expended by that State for military purposes in the Florida war of 1836 and 1837; which, on motion of Mr. TILLMAN, was, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

GETTYSBURG NATIONAL PARK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 22d ultimo, a report of the Gettysburg National Park Commission relative to the acquisition of lands in the vicinity of Gettysburg not exceeding in area the parcels of land shown on the map prepared by Maj. Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, now on file in the office of the Secretary of War, which were occupied by the infantry, cavalry, and artillery on the 1st, 2d, and 3d days of July, 1863, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Commercial Club, of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Minnesota State Veterinary Medical Association, praying for the establishment of an Army veterinary corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented memorials of Local Union No. 74, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Poughkeepsie, of Local Union No. 311, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Auburn, and of Local Union No. 81, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Peekskill, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the admission of cigars free of duty from the Philippines, Puerto Rico, Cuba, or any other territory; which were referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 74, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and a petition of Local Union No. 57, Metal Polishers, Buffers, and Brass Workers, of Elmira, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to limit the hours of daily service of laborers, etc., upon public works or works done for the United States, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of D. M. Osborne & Co., of Auburn; Wadsworth's Sons, of Auburn; the Wegman Piano Company, of Auburn; H. A. Mayer, of Syracuse; the Frontenac Manufacturing Company, of Syracuse; Meyer & Co., of Throopsville; the Merritt Manufacturing Company, of Lockport; Miller & Van Winkle, of Brooklyn; the National Lead Company, of New York City; Richardson & Boynton, of New York City; the Vose & Cliff Manufacturing Company, of New York City; Masury & Son, of New York City; the Roessler & Hasslacher Chemical Company, of New York City; C. H. Childs & Co., of Utica; F. Linke & Co., of New York City; the Standard Harrow Company, of Utica, and the Savage Arms Company, of Utica, all in the State of New York, praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a new fireproof Patent Office building; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Terre Haute, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Thomas H. Boyd & Co., and sundry other druggists of Laporte, Ind., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax upon proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Dodge Manufacturing Company, of Mishawaka, Ind., and a petition of M. Rumely & Co., of Laporte, Ind., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a new fireproof Patent Office building; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SIMON. I present a petition of the Columbia River Fishermen's Protective Union, of Astoria, Oreg., praying that all the remaining public lands of the United States be held for the benefit of the whole people and that no grants of the title to any of these lands be made to any but actual settlers and home builders on the land. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASTORIA, OREG., February 7, 1900.

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas one-third of the entire area of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, is comprised within the domain and still belongs to the people; and

Whereas the reclamation and settlement of this vast territory would give employment and a chance to get a home on the land to a multitude of American workers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Columbia River Fishermen's Protective Union, First, that all the remaining public lands of the United States should be sacredly held for the benefit of the whole people, and that no grants of the title to any of these lands should ever hereafter be made to any but actual settlers and home builders on the land;

Second, that the public grazing lands should be leased in limited areas to settlers on adjacent lands, title to remain in the Federal Government until actual settlement, and the revenues from rentals to go to the States to be used for the reclamation of the irrigable arid lands;

Third, that the Federal Government should build storage reservoirs to save the flood waters that now are wasted, and should wherever necessary build the irrigation works required for the reclamation and settlement of the arid public lands; and

Whereas the foregoing policy is advocated by the National Irrigation Association, as embodied in its constitution, and the object of said association is to bring about its adoption by the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

Further resolved, That we believe it would be enormously beneficial to the interests of labor that said policy should be adopted, and that all labor organizations should cooperate with the National Irrigation Association to accomplish this result.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of the directors of the Latin-American Club and Foreign Trade Association, of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation to enable competing cable companies to lay and operate submarine cables from the United States to Cuba; which was referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

He also presented a petition of sundry members of the Missouri State Militia, praying that they be granted pensions the same as the regulars and volunteers of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PERKINS. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of California, relative to the survey of public lands in that State. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Assembly joint resolution No. 5. Introduced by Mr. Knowland, February 8, 1900. Referred to the committee on Federal relations.]

Assembly joint resolution No. 5. Relative to the survey of public lands in California.

Whereas from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office it appears that during the year ended June 30, 1899, there were added to the surveyed area of public lands in this State no more than 8,387 acres, while the amount so added to such areas in other States was vastly more, and nearly 2,000,000 acres in one State; and

Whereas it is important for the welfare and development of California that the public surveys here should be pushed as rapidly toward completion as they are in other States, in order that our settlers on new lands can obtain their titles with the same facility as elsewhere; and

Whereas it is unjust that settlers in California should be less favored than in other States:

Resolved by the senate of the State of California and the assembly jointly, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to urge the completion of the public surveys in this State and prompt filing of plats in the local land offices, to the end that the public lands be made available for settlement and improvement.

Mr. PERKINS. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of California, relative to Government lands containing petroleum, asphaltum, and other valuable minerals in paying quantities. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Assembly joint resolution No. 3. Introduced by Mr. Dale February 8, 1900. Amended in assembly February 9, 1900.]

Assembly joint resolution No. 3. Relative to Government lands containing petroleum, asphaltum, and other valuable minerals in paying quantities.

Whereas many thousands of acres of lands bearing petroleum, asphaltum, and other valuable minerals in paying quantities, situate in Kern, Fresno, and other counties of the State of California, have been returned by the United States surveyor-general as agricultural lands; and

Whereas said lands are now being developed for the minerals they contain, and are producing, and will continue to produce, millions of dollars of wealth in such minerals, and thus building up an industry of immeasurable worth to the State of California; and

Whereas certain persons are now attempting to acquire title to said lands as agricultural State lands under an act authorizing the State of California to take Government lands in exchange for State school lands under an act passed in February, 1891, and "relating to lieu lands to be selected by State or Territory," and also in exchange for forest-reservation lands under an act of June 4, 1897; and

Whereas the sole purpose of such persons in acquiring said lands for speculation, because of their value for oil and other minerals and not for development purposes, thus retarding the growth of one of the most important industries in California, thwarting the will of the people and the intent of our National Congress in granting certain rights to the locator of mining claims, and depriving thousands of miners of their holdings, the title to which has hitherto been held by the United States Government to be valid: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives be requested to use all honorable means to prevent the frauds which seem to be practiced upon the miners in this State by securing the passage of such laws by the National Congress as will preclude the use of what is known as forest reservation land scrip to acquire title to these well-known mineral lands. Be it Further resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be instructed to forthwith transmit by mail a copy hereof to our Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California.

Mr. PERKINS. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of California relative to the report of the California Débris Commission. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Assembly joint resolution No. 4. Introduced by Mr. Caminetti, February 8, 1900. Made special order February 9, 1900.]

Assembly joint resolution No. 4, relating to the report of the California Débris Commission.

Whereas the California Débris Commission has, in the report concerning débris dams and restraining works recently submitted to the Secretary of War, recommended a system which is claimed to be safe, practicable, and economical; and

Whereas, in order to secure the inauguration and construction thereof, the appropriations recommended by said commission should be made without delay: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the approval of said report and the publication thereof, and to use all honorable means to secure the appropriations required to put into execution the plans recommended therein. Be it Further resolved, That a copy of this resolution, duly attested, be transmitted to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of California.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Labor Council of San Francisco, Cal., praying that all the remaining public lands of the United States be held for the benefit of the whole people, and that no grants of the title of these lands shall ever hereafter be made to any but actual settlers and home builders on the land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Labor Council of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 5067, concerning the boarding of vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McBRIDE presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Portland, Oreg., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of Local Union No. 154, Cigar Makers' International Union of America, of Lincoln, Ill., remonstrating against the cession of public lands to the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LINDSAY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kentucky, praying for the establishment of an army veterinary corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FORAKER presented a memorial of the medical societies of Miami and Shelby counties, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for the further prevention of cruelty to animals in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of the Business Men's Association of Hampton, Va., praying that an appropriation be made to continue the work of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Iowa Association Opposed to the Extension of Suffrage to Women, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution permitting the women of the United States to vote; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

THE PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. HALE. I present a number of communications from representatives of certain cable companies in the United States, relating to the construction of a Pacific cable. I move that all the communications be printed as one document and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 3176) to provide for the erection of dwellings for the keepers of the Grosse Isle, Mich., light-houses; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 152) to provide for the erection of a house for the keeper of the Grosse Isle, Mich., light-house, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 153) to establish wind-signal display stations at South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1928) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of telegraphic cables between the United States of America and Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippine Islands, and other countries, and to promote commerce, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2788) for the relief of Wells C. McCool, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2199) for the relief of volunteer officers and soldiers who served in the Philippine Islands beyond the period of their enlistment, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 28) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James H. Waters, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 99) to establish a military post at or near Des Moines, Iowa, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 430) for the relief of Charles Wagemann, submitted an adverse report thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2883) to change the characteristic of Cape Cod light, Massachusetts, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 257) for the relief of Gilman Sawtelle, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1382) for the relief of Francis S. Davidson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4473) to authorize the Natchitoches Railway and Construction Company to build and maintain a railway and traffic bridge across Red River at Grand Ecore, in the parish of Natchitoches, State of Louisiana, reported it with an amendment.

REPORT ON COPPER RIVER EXPLORATION EXPEDITION.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. ELKINS, January 22, 1900, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. W. R. Abercrombie on the Copper River exploration expedition to Alaska, transmitted by the Secretary of War, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for distribution by the War Department.

COMPILATION RELATIVE TO THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. LODGE. In accordance with Senate resolution No. 44, passed January 9, I report from the Committee on the Philippines a brief compilation of the latest information and statistics obtainable on the numbers, areas, population, races and tribes, agriculture, exports and imports, forests, and harbors of the Philippine Islands. I move that the usual number of the report be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

QUARTERMASTERS' SUPPLIES FOR THE ARMY, ETC.

Mr. SEWELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6267) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes," to report it without amendment. I will state that these are provisions of law restrictive in their nature under which no war could be carried on. In advertising for the purchase of so many horses, mules, etc, the Department find it is an absolute necessity that the privilege shall be extended, which expires at the end of this fiscal year. It is proposed to extend it for one year, so as to continue during the next fiscal year. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read in full for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HALE. This is a very important bill and there are very important provisions in it. I should like to have an opportunity of examining it as it deals with the Army and its future. I do not want to object, although I shall have to do so, if necessary. I ask the Senator to let it stand over until to-morrow.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say that it is the provision of law now. The provisions of the old law were suspended. The old law provided for an army of 20,000, and in advertising in relation to the number of horses and things of that kind, we could not carry on a war without suspending those provisions. The Secretary of War asks that the time be extended for another year.

Mr. HALE. I will examine it.

Mr. SEWELL. We could not go on after the first of the month if those provisions were not extended.

Mr. HALE. I will examine it between now and to-morrow morning. I should like to have an opportunity to examine it. We ought to be very careful about legislation respecting the Army.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that this is nothing but a renewal of the act which we passed a year ago, which was very carefully studied in all its details. It is merely to facilitate the transaction of business in some bureaus of the War Department.

Mr. HALE. I understand that, but it is not asking very much that the bill shall go over for a day in order that Senators may examine it.

Mr. SEWELL. Is the Senator aware that it is a House bill also and that the measure went through the House?

Mr. HALE. I have a copy of it here before me. But it does not follow that it should be passed when reported because the House has passed the bill. A great many bills we put through by unanimous consent when they are reported; bills that are not of special importance; but it is not in the line of good legislation that important bills should be put through in this way. When the bulk of bills which are of a private nature have been considered by a committee, we take the say so of the committee, and we sometimes pass them when reported; but important bills, bills affecting large interests, and especially affecting the Army and the Navy, ought not to be passed without giving Senators an opportunity to examine them; and it ought not to be considered intrusive in this body because a Senator asks that a bill may go over for a day in order that he may examine it.

Mr. SEWELL. I would not object to the extension of time for the consideration of the bill except that it is absolutely necessary that this bill shall be passed within a day or two. For instance, there is one provision of law that prohibits the Quartermaster's Department from paying more than $150 a month for anybody's services. We never contemplated then that we would have a lot of transports and probably would have to pay $250 or $350 a month for first-class officers.

Mr. ALDRICH. I feel constrained to object to the further consideration of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes to the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3177) for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1891; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a bill (S. 3188) granting an increase of pension to Henry W. Walker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3189) for the relief of Leonard I. Brownson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3190) to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to taxes and tax sales in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 3191) for the relief of the estate of James Young; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3192) to provide for the erection of a public building at Jersey City, N. J.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 3193) granting a pension to Charles H. Force; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 3194) granting an increase of pension to William Kepler; which was read twice by its title, aad referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3195) for the relief of the estate of Sarah G. Smith, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims

He also introduced a bill (S. 3196) for the relief of the heirs at law of Maj. Tarleton Woodson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3197) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. KENNEY introduced a bill (S. 3198) granting an increase of pension to Fisher Ames; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3199) to correct the military record of William J. McNatt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 89) providing for the purchase of historical manuscripts relating to the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KYLE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the allowance for salary of consul at Beirut from $2,000 to $2,500 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment proposing to increase the allowance for salary of minister resident and consul-general to Siam from $5,000 to $7,500 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

LIEUT. COMMANDER R. M. G. BROWN.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 1636) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Lieut. Commander R. M. G. Brown, now on the retired list, to be a commander on the retired list, was indefinitely postponed, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, after the routine morning business, I shall call up the joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, with a view of submitting some remarks thereon.

SEIZURES IN AND NEAR DELAGOA BAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of January 17, 1900, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, showing the steps that have been taken by the Department of State to obtain the restitution of property of American citizens seized and detained by the military authorities of Great Britain in and near Delagoa Bay, South Africa.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION.
Washington, February 15, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. Is the pending question on the amendment in regard to international bimetallism?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish not to make a speech or argument, but merely to make one very simple statement before this amendment shall be voted upon. It is almost too commonplace a thing to say in the hearing of gentlemen who have been, like the members of this body, meditating upon and discussing this important question for so many years, and yet it is a thing which seems to me to be entirely forgotten in political discussions and the discussions of the press.

Whenever there is added any action in favor of the gold standard or any recognition of the gold standard as something forced upon the people by the necessities of the case, there comes up a cry from the press of both parties, and that portion of the press which likes to style itself independent, that there is an attempt to straddle, to get silver votes, or please silver communities by making some vague, worthless, shadowy promise of doing something for silver in the remote future.

When the Republican convention at St. Louis, which nominated President McKinley, stated their conviction that it was desirable that the consent of commercial nations should be obtained to rehabilitate silver, and pledged itself to do what could be done, and of course pledging the Republican party to promote that end, the cry went up, a half sneer and a half laugh, even in Republican papers that were strong advocates of the gold standard, that that was a sort of sop to Cerberus.

Now, the people of the country, it seems to me, ought to be reminded of what had been the uniform belief of everybody in this country down to the time when our finances got into confusion during the civil war. Alexander Hamilton and Jefferson, each in his own way, when the Constitution was inaugurated—Hamilton at the request of Congress, and Jefferson at the desire and with the full concurrence of Washington—investigated this question of currency down to its fundamental principles; and the result was the greatest report on finance made by the greatest financial genius in the history of the world who ever had any public administrative responsibility, Alexander Hamilton, a report concurred in by Jefferson and accepted for nearly a hundred years by the whole American people, by Washington and his associates, by Webster, by Benton, by Jackson, and the leaders of both parties and of both sections.

That belief established three fundamental principles: First, that the best standard of value was the double standard, gold and silver; next, that that could only be maintained by concert or cooperation or common action of the great commercial nations of the world; and third, that if it could not be maintained, gold, which is the most valuable metal, is the one to which it would be necessary to resort.

The two parties differed as to whether redeemable paper currency issued by the Government, or issued by banks with the authority of the Government, should be added to this bimetallic currency; but those three truths, as they were deemed, were accepted by the entire American people without any considerable question. They not only were accepted by the American people, but the double standard of gold and silver was recognized in the Constitution itself, prohibiting the States to make anything but gold and silver legal tender, and of course implying and taking for granted in that prohibition that Congress would not do this thing which no State should be permitted to do.

Now, then, the principal nations of the world had a substantial bimetallism. Though one metal would get a little ahead at one time, a few per cent, and another a little ahead of the other, still gold and silver circulated everywhere as legal standards of value, and the civilized world got along.

Now, when the destruction of specie payments and the disturbance of the war came on, we got our finances into confusion, and the fiat-money schemes, and the schemes of one sort and another for paying debts, Government debts and private debts, with a depreciated or cheap currency came up. Soon after the principal nations of the world, following England, which had started earlier, departed from the old, safe, accepted bimetallic path, and the condition of things which Alexander Hamilton thought possible and intimates in this report came about—that you could not get the concert of nations any longer to a double standard. We have been compelled, as a majority of us think, to follow other nations in the path in which they have led, of a single standard, and we are doing just what Hamilton and just what Jefferson thought we must do if that condition of things happened, namely, to take the most valuable metal and the metal which other civilized nations adopt as our standard.

But in doing that, when we say that the American people has not changed its mind, but that we still believe the double standard the best, we are only saying that we reaffirm the universal opinion of the American people for a hundred years. Whether it gain votes or lose votes, whether it satisfy discontented communities or do not satisfy them, it remains the simple truth, which every man in the Senate old enough to remember the time before the war, whether he was a special student of finance or only an ordinary intelligent American citizen, believes, to wit, that you must have the two metals if you can get the concert of other nations in doing it; that if you can not, if you are driven from that policy, you must accept the most valuable metal, and that you must get back to the double standard again whenever an opportunity comes, the double standard and not the single standard being the best for mankind and the best for us.

Now, that is all there is of it; and if it gain votes or please discontented communities or help the party in power, it is only gaining votes and pleasing discontented communities and helping the party in power by a reaffirmation of the simple truth and a reaffirmation of the accepted belief of the American people of all parties and of all sections for a hundred years. It is nothing new. There is no disguise in it; there is no pretense in it; there is no hypocrisy in it: but it is the simple fact that every American citizen who formed his opinion since Hamilton made his report down to the year 1863 believed these three truths; and that is all there is of it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the amendment now before the Senate is one of those miserable makeshifts that force themselves into financial bills to cover the wounds of those who support them against the lacerations of conscience. When this amendment is voted on the committee's substitute for the House bill, I will offer what I will now read as a substitute for that amendment:

First. That it is the fixed policy of the United States to pay and clear off the national debt as rapidly as just and equal taxation and the accumulation of other revenues of the Government will permit, with constant regard to the capacity of the people to respond to this national duty.

Second. That the specie basis, consisting of gold or silver coin, or both, is the only true, just, and constitutional basis of the issue of bank bills to circulate as money.

Third. That it is an unjust and unconstitutional burden on the taxpayers of the United States that Congress should agree to change the terms of the national obligations, with the consent of the bondholders, so as to deprive the people of the right and privilege of paying said obligations in coins of gold or silver according to their necessities or the requirements of the general welfare.

Fourth. That it is contrary to the policy of the United States that the national debt shall be made perpetual, or that it should be maintained or increased for the benefit of the national banks, or to regulate the commercial value of gold or silver bullion.

If this substitute for the amendment of the Senate committee should be adopted, I would then move to strike out the word "enacted" in the enacting clause and substitute in place of it the word "resolved," so that it would be a joint resolution.

The ground that has been covered in the general discussion of this measure is the same that has been surveyed and resurveyed in the Senate for more than twenty years. The facts, with slight additions, and the arguments, almost without change, are the same that have been presented at every session of ten successive Congresses.

All the old battles have been fought over and all the now healing wounds have been torn open to bleed afresh.

It would be an intolerable cruelty to a people who are pushing their enterprises with renewed vigor and great prosperity in the dawn of a new era, in which the strength and splendor of the Republic is developing in concert with the noblest virtues and best aspirations of benevolence and justice, if this bitter discussion was forced upon our country for purposes of party advantage in the coming elections.

This motive has something to do with this agitation, so unwelcome to the people.

The compelling power of party organizations is the chief reliance of the projectors of this measure for its passage, and the fretful protests of some distinguished leaders of the majority against its provisions and the artful introduction of provisions that are misleading and deceptive, for the purpose of quieting others, show that the bill has impressed many of its supporters with a feeling of alarm and abhorrence.

But it moves on its course with the steadiness and ease of a cloud driven by unseen winds in a summer sky. It is well directed in its course and is resistless in its progress.

It is not dealing with ratios between the money metals or questions that relate to their equality in the mints, nor does it pause to consider the sanctity of contracts or the questions of constitutional laws and rights that obstruct its progress.

The mission of the bill is to decree a higher law than the Constitution, that shall emancipate concentrated capital from all taxation, to make capital the beneficiary of the powers of taxation which were given to Congress alone for the purpose of conducting the Government, to make the bond debt of the Government perpetual, and to increase it as occasion may offer, so that the national banks, based upon it, shall rule the financial destiny of the people forever, and to give them the power to create money that the Government is bound to redeem in gold gathered by taxation, and to regulate its volume of supply to the people.

This power to increase or diminish the volume of currency at will is the inquiry of absolutism in the hands of the money power, the most potent and relentless of all despots.

This ruling and irresponsible agency of the power of money, given into the hands of 3,500 national banks, is more dangerous to the people than if 3,500 regiments were concentrated under the command of an ambitious, selfish, and cruel despot who has no regard for any rights or interests that are not his own.

No national bank has interests that are in competition with any other national bank, and they are all so subject to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury that his will as to their operations is irresistible, and therefore his power to command them is supreme.

I am not stating the facts to support these statements. I have no need to state them. They are known to the people of the whole country. They are and have been on every page of every bank book of accounts for more than fifty years, and they are written in the experiences of everybody who ever had an account in one of them. While it is a leading purpose of this bill to keep this enormous concentration power under the control of capital and credit engaged in manufacturing bills to circulate as money on the basis of the credit of the Government, and while this is a danger to the people that threatens all the sources of their prosperity and all their liberties, there is a still deeper purpose, not in the least concealed, to divide our people into two classes—one the bearer of national burdens and the other the untaxed holders of permanent mortgages on the labor, earnings, productions, and property of all the industrial classes.

The feudalism of Europe, that our Constitution was expressly designed to prohibit in our country, has been transferred largely in the British Isles from lands into consols, which represent the interest-bearing national debt. It is the purpose and necessary effect of this measure to establish this system of feudalism in the United States. Its success is assured, and I fear it is irrevocable, when this bill or the House bill is enacted into law.

To aid this plan in the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland by increasing the purchasing power of the interest paid on the bonds, gold was made their sole legal-tender money, and thus enhanced in value, its scarcity was safely relied upon to lower the price of the labor and property out of which the bondholders were to derive their interest.

This bill adopts gold as the sole money to be received for all taxes and to pay the bonds and the interest upon them, and returns us to the same dominion that we thought we were escaping from in 1776 as to the feudal system. We are now on a worse footing than our brethren, the British subjects, because in the United Kingdom all paper money is issued and redeemed by a private corporation upon a basis of specie on which the people are not taxed, while we redeem all our national-bank issues in gold taxed out of the people, and at the same time we pay the banks that issue the bills interest on the bonds upon faith of which they are issued. In England the basis of banking is specie, on which the people pay no interest, while in this country the basis of banking is the public credit, which rests alone on taxation to sustain it. We pay the national banks the interest in gold upon their capital. We allow them to convert that capital into money and use it at rates that seldom fall below 12 per cent per annum. We redeem their bills in gold raised by taxation, and exclude all landowners from borrowing money on pledges of their real estate.

The industrial classes are thus made servile, while those who create money under corporate charters escape taxation and become lords paramount in all but the name.

This bill makes this condition inevitable and perpetual.

In this debate I have pointed out already the manner in which these results are fastened upon the country, and I will only call attention now to the only creed known to the people of the United States that is opposed to this new revolution, which returns us to the dominion of the British system of finance.

That creed is the broad and historical ground upon which all Democrats have always stood. It is the payment of the national debt, not its perpetuity; that whatever banking is authorized by law shall be conducted on the specie basis; that the specie basis of all contracts, public and private, consists of gold and silver legal-tender coin. The national banks are based on the credit of the United States in the form of bonds. If that basis is removed by the payment of the bonds, they must provide for the redemption of their bills in specie or go out of business.

So that a resort to the old Democratic creed is the only plan by which the people can be saved from the destruction of their industries, the taxation that will never end, the loss of their real liberties, and their degradation as feudatories of the money power.

In doing this, by paying off the national debt, we shall also necessarily restore silver to its former equal rights with gold, and its full coinage will be then demanded by the national banks as the only means of securing a full specie basis for the redemption of their notes, and the Government will go out of the banking business.

We have but one way to enforce the will of the people in favor of silver money, so often expressed and so often baffled and disappointed by the friends of monopoly, of the national banks, and the other money corporations, associations, and combinations in Congress. It is to make it to the interest of the national banks to demand the full and free coinage of silver. This can only be done by the payment of the national debt.

That will take the foundation from beneath their banks and force them to the specie basis for the redemption of their bank notes, or they will have to go out of business. This they will never consent to, and they will at once become clamorous for the full and free coinage of silver to put into the foundations of their credit.

The object of this bill, so far as they are concerned, is to prevent this result, which is the necessary result of the payment of our national interest-bearing obligations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regrets to inform the Senator that his time has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the consent of the Senate to proceed for three or four minutes to finish my statement, as I do not expect to again take the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Alabama may be permitted to finish his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. I am much obliged to the Senate for its indulgence.

Mr. President, this bill makes the issue between the Democratic and Republican parties so deep and so broad that one or the other will fall under its decision, never to rise, if the people sustain this measure.

If they sustain this measure and vote the national debt shall be perpetual, they will thereby hand over to the national banks the whole control of their financial affairs, and will give them the power and the legal right, in cooperation with the other bondholding classes, to saddle a perpetual mortgage upon all who engage in the productive industries of the United States.

It is to save our country from this artful, quiet, cold, and almost silent revolution that I make this appeal to the old Democratic creed of Jefferson and Jackson, and implore the Democracy to take their stand upon the specie basis for the redemption of all contracts, public or private, whether made by corporations or by individuals.

If we will now adopt this true and ancient creed of the Democracy, that our national debt must be paid, and its converse proposition that the national debt shall not be made a perpetual burden on the people, and that the specie basis of gold and silver coin shall stand to redeem all money obligations, the Democrats of all the country and of all opinions as to what is sound money and what is the proper ratio between silver and gold, and as to the equal rights of gold and silver at the mints, and the necessity for gold as the money of foreign commerce, will forbear their doctrinal contentions and will gather under the old standard of Jefferson and Jackson without a man missing from the ranks.

This is our opportunity, and if we use it we can save the country from a social, moral, industrial, and political revolution that will preserve the Republic against that worst of despotisms—an incorporated monopoly of the money power, backed by the taxing power of the Government, for the benefit of the wealthy classes, at the cost of the toiling masses of the people.

Let the people denounce this measure at once, before it has had time to fasten upon them its fatal purposes and the destruction that otherwise is inevitable, and they will redeem themselves from a fate of which the class distinctions and poverty-ridden people of Europe will be only a mild example. Once we vote ourselves into slavery to the money power, the shackles will never fall from our limbs.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I rise simply to enter my protest against the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. The general impression which was doubtless left upon the minds of the Senate by his remarks was that in the adoption of the bimetallic or the double standard in 1792 our authorities conferred with the leading commercial nations of the earth. I deny that our governmental authorities up to 1873 had at any time, in planning its financial system or in enacting its financial legislation, anything to do with foreign nations or foreign systems.

Mr. HOAR. Mr President, I do not know whether I ought to ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment, but I should like a short time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. What the Senator says is entirely true, that there was no agreement with foreign nations; but what happened was this: Hamilton in his report, in determining what should be the ratio between gold and silver, goes over each nation by itself and shows substantially that the ratio ranged from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1, but was a little over 15 to 1 at that time. He treats all through the consensus, the average, adopted by foreign nations as the ratio which we should establish. Then, in addition to that, he treats that as the ratio which we were to establish. Then he recognizes and adopts foreign coins and the legislation of his time as the coinage system to be used by the United States for an indefinite period. He then proceeds to fix by law not only the ratio of our own coins, but the value of Spanish dollars and other foreign coins. So he completely affirms the doctrine which I imputed to him as the whole basis and postulate of his argument. Then he goes on to say—if I may be permitted to read one sentence more, and that is all—as follows:

> The Secretary is, upon the whole, strongly inclined to the opinion that a preference ought to be given to neither of the metals for the money unit.

A strong declaration of bimetallism. Then he goes on to say that—

> Perhaps if either were to be preferred—

He uses in his cautious way the word "perhaps"—

> Perhaps if either were to be preferred, it ought to be gold rather than silver.
> The reasons are these:
> The inducement to such a preference is to render the unit as little variable as possible—

The Senator will see how in this statement Alexander Hamilton sums up the whole argument and position of the majority of this Senate established by this bill and by the recent Republican national convention. If you had put what they said into the best words you could have got you would have taken the words of Alexander Hamilton which I have just read. Let me finish that sentence:

> The inducement to such a preference is to render the unit as little variable as possible, because on this depends the steady value of all contracts and, in a certain sense, of all other property; and it is truly observed that if the unit belong indiscriminately to both the metals, it is subject to all the fluctuations that happen in the relative value which they bear to each other. But the same reason would lead to annexing it to that particular one—> which is itself the least liable to variation, if there be in this respect any discernible difference between the two.

> Gold may, perhaps, in certain senses, be said to have greater stability than silver; as, being of superior value, less liberties have been taken with it in the regulations of different countries. Its standard has remained more uniform and it has in other respects undergone fewer changes, as, being not so much an article of merchandise, owing to the use made of silver in the trade with the East Indies and China, it is less liable to be influenced by circumstances of commercial demand; and if, reasoning by analogy, it could be affirmed that there is a physical probability of greater proportional increase in the quantity of silver than in that of gold, it would afford an additional reason for calculating on greater steadiness in the value of the latter.

In Mr. Jefferson's paper on the same subject, in his own way, he reaffirms that. It is put into the Constitution; and it is the doctrine of Daniel Webster. Mr. Webster himself always thought—in which his contemporaries and countrymen do not agree with him—that his greatest single service to mankind was his service upon questions of finance and that that was the subject he understood best—better even than constitutional law. Webster and Benton and Jackson and everybody in both parties of any sort of weight were agreed in those doctrines.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator had made his last speech first, there would have been no occasion for me making any reply. When you take his first remarks, they were that all the way along we had been guided by reference to the commercial nations of the world, and that we had agreed upon certain financial plans because they were in accord with those of the commercial nations of the world, and that finally we had drifted down to the present Republican bill as a legitimate result of all that had been done before. I controvert that statement. I say that there never has been a financial law enacted in the United States prior to 1873 where this Government, directly or indirectly, consulted any foreign nation; and in 1792, when we did not have a dollar of coin of the United States—not one—and had no mint, and had no power to coin, we adopted our monetary system after our own investigation into what were the legal—not commercial, but legal—ratios existing in foreign nations.

The only guide we had was to take those foreign coins, melt them, and ascertain the quantity of metal in them. After a thorough examination, without any consultation with France or with England or with Germany or any other nation, kingdom, or power on God's green earth, we established our American bimetallic constitutional system of the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio prescribed by Congress, and we maintained that up to 1873. During that whole time, whenever the Democratic party or the old Whig party was in power, so far as that was concerned, there was a determination to have no entangling alliances with any foreign nation; and the immortal Jefferson, in his first inaugural address, proclaimed the true doctrine, which has been adhered to from that day to this by the party to which I have the honor of belonging—"Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none." That greatest of all great men of the world, George Washington, in his Farewell Address to the people, left them a legacy, an inheritance which should be honored and appreciated and loved so long as we love to be Americans. I will read from that Farewell Address as follows:

> Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other.

Pregnant truths, which should be taken to the hearts of the gold monometallists of to-day, who are bowing their knee to the golden calf worshiped by Great Britain and adopting a foreign system, transplanted from that power which would have held us in bondage and slavery to this day if she had had the physical power to do so.

The Farewell Address continues:

Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not legally hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

Now, we are called upon to adopt this gold standard because it is in comity with the standard of Great Britain, because it is in comity with the standard of Germany, and to ally ourselves to a foreign system and be dependent upon all the changes and fluctuations and adverse circumstances which may surround that standard in foreign countries, bringing home to our own doors all the ills and ail the disadvantages which may result from that system in all the foreign nations of the world.

Why not adopt an American system—one of our own? Why cry before the world our insignificance, our incapacity, with 75,000,000 people, to do what we did in 1792 with 4,000,000 people? Then we established our system; we maintained it. To-day we can establish any system we desire; and I want nothing to do with any foreign financial system. I want our own financial system, separate and distinct from any other—an American system, which we are abundantly able to maintain, whatever it may be.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I was simply going to ask that we take a vote, but I yield to the Senator from Connecticut if he desires to speak.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, it seems to be the fashion in this discussion for each Senator, as he rises, to protest against something. I wish to protest against the assumption of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who oppose this bill—the assumption that they represent the people of the United States. I do not know where they get the right to claim that they are the representatives of the people on this question.

This question went before the people of the United States in 1896, and went before them upon the platform of the Republican party, which announced—I do not suppose I am able to quote exactly the language, but the substance of it was that the United States would maintain the existing gold standard until bimetallism should be secured by the concurrence of the leading nations of the world, which the party pledged itself to promote.

That question went before the people, and notwithstanding the suppression of some half million votes, more or less, in this country, that policy and that declaration and that pledge received a majority of the votes of more than half a million of the people. Now, I stand here——

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAWLINS. If I understood the Senator's statement of the platform, it was that it pledged the Republican party to maintain the existing gold standard.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Exactly.

Mr. RAWLINS. With the limitation and qualification——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If I did not use the word "existing," it was an oversight. I intended to use it.

Mr. RAWLINS. This is the question: Do you propose by this measure to change the system which existed at the time that platform was made?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not understand that this bill changes in any respect the gold standard as it exists before the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. It does not change it; it maintains it, as the platform says.

Mr. RAWLINS. Then what is the object of the bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, those "representatives" of the people who continually insist that they alone represent the people have been trying to delude the people during all the years since the enunciation of that platform by saying that we were not on the gold standard, and they have been shouting with the same breath that the United States was not on the gold standard, and denouncing everybody who did not agree with them as parties to the crime of 1873. What was the crime of 1873 if it did not place the United States on the gold standard? The existing gold standard was what we promised to maintain until we could get international bimetallism, and this bill is for the purpose of making it sure that we do maintain the existing gold standard and taking away from the representatives of free silver the opportunity to say that the Government is not on the gold standard to-day. If it had not been for the continual misrepresentations of those who advocate free silver coinage, there would be no occasion for the passage of this bill.

But, Mr. President, I protest that they do not represent the people. With all the suppression of the vote in the last Presidential election there was a majority of more than a half million of the people of the United States for the maintenance of the existing gold standard until we could secure international bimetallism by the concurrence of the leading commercial nations of the world; and if they wish to go to the people again on the doctrine of the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1, which I believe means silver monometallism, they will find to their cost and sorrow that that majority will be largely increased in the next Presidential election.

I am obliged to the Senator from Missouri for removing all disguise from the issue in the next Presidential campaign. I am obliged to him for proclaiming the leading doctrine of the Democratic party and its representatives in the last Presidential canvass and its representative in the next Presidential canvass. Whatever may be said about anti-imperialism and about trusts and about the money power and about corporations and about the toiling masses and the classes, it will be the same issue over again, and that is whether the United States shall attempt to change the existing gold standard in this country into a silver standard.

Mr. President, we heard when the Senator from Nevada made his speech here something about the alchemist and alchemy. There never was any such alchemy as is now proposed by the Senator from Missouri. Of all men who have sought the philosopher's stone which should transmute base metals into gold, the Senator from Missouri is entitled to a patent for the discovery. Only it does not happen to be a stone. It is a law which is to transmute silver into gold. Of all the conjurers and magicians and wizards who have existed in times past and in times present and who sought to delude the people, no one has reached the sublime height of saying that by the passage of the law and the signing of the President's name to it you could increase the value of a commodity the world over 100 per cent. Neither Cagliostro nor Hermann nor Kellar nor Frank Daniels would ever aspire to any such distinction. It remained for the wizard of Missouri to wave his magic wand or magic pen and thus raise the price of all the silver in the world 100 per cent. How much? One-half certainly, and more than one-half of the silver coin of the world, although made a full tender, passes for only 50 per cent as much as the gold of the same denomination.

Mr. COCKRELL. What did I understand the Senator to say? Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. TELLER. Make that statement again.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that the $119,000,000 in Germany, containing 3 cents less silver than ours, only pass for 50 cents?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have not said any such thing.

Mr. COCKRELL. You came very near it, I think.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did state that one-half of the silver money of the world to-day, in round numbers, passed in the countries of coinage and in all countries for not more than 50 cents on the dollar of gold of the same denomination.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask him to name any great commercial nation——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, I am not talking about great commercial nations. I am talking on an entirely different subject now. I am talking about what the Senator from Missouri proposes to do with his magic pen, when it shall have written a law; and I say that of the four thousand millions, more or less, of silver money in the world at least two thousand millions of it passes at 50 per cent or thereabouts as compared with the value of gold money of the same denomination. He proposes to make that entire stock of money, depreciated money, as in Mexico,

India, and China, and wherever it is to be found all over the world, as good as gold. A thousand million dollars of value created by one touch of the pen! And not only that, but all the silver of the world, in bullion, in ornaments, or in whatever shape it may exist, is thereupon immediately to become worth a dollar and twenty-nine cents an ounce instead of less than half of that.

Mr. President, if it were anywhere else than in the Senate of the United States, I should simply say that this proposition is too ridiculous for anybody to believe. I see that my time has expired.

Mr. ALDRICH. Question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that the Senator from Alabama offered an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from what State?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I understood that he offered an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment was sent to the desk.

Mr. ALDRICH. He read it in his place, and I understood he offered it. If it is not pending, it is all right.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I may have misunderstood the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. Before I go ahead I should like to know what he did say. I have the misfortune to sit behind him, and I could not hear. I understood him to say that the silver money of the world was circulating now at 50 cents on the dollar, nominally, with the gold in the country where it is circulating. What was it the Senator said?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I said, speaking in round numbers, that one-half of the coined silver money of the world is passing at only 50 per cent or thereabouts of gold money of the same denomination.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the same countries?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In the same countries.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say to the Senator that he is misinformed. There is no foundation for that statement. The silver money of the world, where gold is circulating with it concurrently, is circulating at the same ratio.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Would not a gold dollar, if there were one in Mexico, buy two silver dollars; and would not a gold dollar, if there were one in India, buy two silver dollars?

Mr. TELLER. In the first place, there is not any gold in circulation in Mexico.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Because silver, having depreciated to 50 cents on the dollar of gold, has driven it all out.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator there again shows his unacquaintance with the facts. There never was a gold circulation in Mexico at any time. Never at any time while the mints have been open has there been a gold circulation. The Treasury Department give them in a report which they make here more gold than silver, but that is evidently an error, because everybody knows that is not true. Take the coin of Great Britain—a hundred and eleven millions of it circulating at a limited tender. It does the same money duty, when you have 20 shillings of it, that a sovereign does. It buys as much of anything that the Englishman wants as a sovereign buys. Ten marks of silver in Germany buys as much as a ten-mark gold piece buys.

Mr. President, this is not the place for misrepresentations of that character. This is the place where facts and not falsehoods ought to be presented to the American people. There is not a country anywhere that maintains the standard of gold and silver where the silver does not do the same money duty, at the rate established by law, that it did previous to 1873.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Did I deny that silver circulated on a parity with gold in Germany or the United States or England?

Mr. TELLER. If he has denied anything at all, that is what he did deny by that statement. It was intended to go out to the American people that where they have the two moneys in circulation, one half is doing money duty at 50 cents on the dollar and the other is doing it at a dollar—a hundred cents.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to a question. I will not hear any speech from the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. You will not hear any speech from me?

Mr. TELLER. No; I can not afford it.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any country in the world having an unlimited coinage of silver where the silver dollar is worth more than 50 per cent of the gold dollar?

Mr. TELLER. I will answer you now. You can not answer it for me. I will take Mexico. I speak with knowledge, for I made a trip to Mexico for the express purpose of considering its financial condition. I stayed there six weeks, with as good an opportunity as any man who did not hold a commission from the Government could have. I interviewed merchants, I interviewed bankers, I interviewed everybody from the head of the Government down. I say to you to-day that when I was there, in 1893—there has been a little rise in things in Mexico since, not because of the money, but because of the prosperity there—a Mexican dollar would buy as much of all the products of Mexico as it would buy twenty years ago or thirty years ago. It did not buy quite as much of foreign imports, but I can go to Mexico to-day with silver money and buy many articles that are sold in the United States upon a gold basis with less silver money than you can buy with gold.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not answer my question. Let me put it in another form.

Mr. TELLER. You can put it in any form you choose.

Mr. HOAR. If you put an English gold sovereign in your pocket and go to a banker or a money changer in the City of Mexico, will he not give you for it nearly or quite double its nominal value in Mexican silver dollars?

Mr. TELLER. Nobody denies that.

Mr. HOAR. Very, well: that is what I want to get at.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. TELLER. No; Mexico has no gold coin.

Mr. HOAR. I understand.

Mr. TELLER. When the gold of the world gets there it is merchandise. When you take your gold there in the shape of a sovereign they know that they can send it back——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator let me ask him one question?

Mr. TELLER. No. I want to get through with one at a time. You will have plenty of time.

Mexico is a country of limited circulation. How do we maintain here at a parity five hundred millions in silver, and more than that? It is because we are a great commercial nation and there is a demand for it. Mexico has never had a gold standard, I repeat. She has never had any gold in circulation. You can buy it at the brokers, you can buy it at the banks, but you buy it as merchandise. It is not in use and there is no analogy between that condition and this.

What the Senator from Connecticut was proclaiming was with respect to the circulation of the world. France maintains eight hundred or a thousand million dollars of silver, although I know that it is twice what the Treasury Department gives her, on an absolute parity with her gold, and the circulation in the common shops of France is not gold, but silver. The one hundred and eleven millions of silver money in the Kingdom of Great Britain does more money duty in the purchase of articles—except in great transactions—than the five hundred millions of gold. What I have said of England is absolutely true of Germany, Holland, Belgium, and of every other country where they pretend to have a gold circulation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut says that in 1896 this question was settled. In New England I know this party had a face of gold, but out in the West it had a face one side of which was gold and one side silver. It was a bimetallic party in all the country west of the Alleghenies. I said the other day that I made speeches in ten States. I challenge any man to show me that the Republican orators in those States stood up and said, "We are a gold-standard party." You pointed always to the bimetallic provision. You said existing conditions must be preserved. You did not say to the public, "We are going to change these conditions materially:" and the people did not vote on that subject. You got a great vote in Kansas, in Nebraska, in Minnesota, in Iowa, and in other sections from people who were not gold-standard people. They may eventually be brought into the gold-standard fold by the pressure of party prejudice and party sympathy and party pride, but they have not been there yet. The highest authority from the President's State, in one of the great places where men have influence, declared that that bimetallic provision put a hundred men in the last House of Representatives who would not have been there if it had not been in the platform. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I know you did not make a campaign upon the gold standard.

The American people have not declared for the gold standard. You may make them. It will take more money than you spent in 1896, if you do make them, to carry it, and in 1896 the party of which you boast, the party to which you belong, spent more than it ever spent from the hour it came into existence up to that time. You spent two dollars where the aggregate expenses had been one from the very foundation of the party in 1856 to the hour you nominated McKinley. You may do it again. You may close the factories or threaten to and frighten the people into voting for the gold standard. You may do what you did in all the great cities of the East. You may say to the employees, "If you vote for Mr. Bryan and he is elected, this factory closes." You did it in Chicago; you did it in all the great cities, I repeat, and in all the great manufacturing centers. You may do it again. You may get an expression of the people, but you did not get it then. The people were walked up, under the threat of starvation and discharge from their employment, and they voted for the ticket under coercion; and they did not believe then that you were a gold-standard party, and you did not dare to say you were in two-thirds of the area of the United States.

The Senator from Connecticut is nothing if he is not a prophet. I remember once here when he prophesied—and he particularly prophesied as to myself—that a position I had taken would not be sustained by the people of my State. Mr. President, they sustained me by more than 85 per cent of the vote, and so it is not worth while for the Senator to tell us what is going to happen next time. We do not know what is going to happen. We are willing to make this campaign and take the chances. If the American people say they are for the gold standard, that is the end of it. The Senator complains that we say we are the representatives of the people. I do not think anybody will accuse the Senator from Connecticut of being a representative of the people especially. I do not know that he has misrepresented the people of his State. I do not know what their sentiments are. I presume they are for the gold standard. I have no doubt the people of Connecticut are, and probably he properly represents them in that way, but Connecticut is not all of the United States by any means. There is some section of it besides which has something to say about these questions and will continue to have, notwithstanding the Senator may enter his very earnest protest.

I mean to assert, in spite of the Senator, that I stand for the American people, if I know what their sentiments are. When I shall find that their sentiments differ with mine, I shall find that I am of no further use in this Chamber—I mean on this great question. I will be ready to quit when that occurs. I do not believe that the American people are a gold-standard people. I believe the Senator from Massachusetts told the truth when he said a couple of years ago, or three years ago, that 90 per cent of the people were bimetallists. I believe they are now. I believe they want bimetallism. You are afraid they want it, and therefore you put in this childish and foolish statement in the bill that this bill is not intended as an obstacle or hindrance to bimetallism.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, we are all the while getting something new in the Senate of the United States. We are getting new definitions, and we have now what seems to me to be a new definition of bimetallism. Bimetallism as proclaimed to-day is the opening of our mints to the free coinage of silver at a certain ratio. The opening of our mints to the free coinage of silver in olden times, in the times of the Constitution, when our friends are wont to boast that gold and silver were made the money of the Constitution, meant to the coinage of gold and silver at a ratio that then represented as nearly as it was possible an equivalence in value between the two metals. Now there is no bimetallism except for the opening of the mints of the United States alone at a ratio which represents a divergence of one-half in the equivalence of the two metals.

I will say this: If I believed that we could open our mints to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and thereby bring to a parity throughout the world the value of the two metals and maintain it there, my objection to free coinage as preached by the new financiers of the United States would be largely diminished, if not entirely eliminated. But there comes the exact difference between us. We do not believe it. We do not see how it is possible for anybody, taking into consideration the history of the past, taking into consideration all the laws which govern currency and finances, to believe that silver money can be maintained in the United States at a parity with gold upon the ratio of 16 to 1.

The fathers did not believe it. Nobody believed it up to a recent period. The greatest care was taken in opening our mints to see that the quantity of silver which was coined into a dollar should equal, as nearly as possible, in all markets the value of gold that was coined into a dollar. We had that law; we had a ratio, and up to 1873, if I am not mistaken, the mints had been open to the free coinage of both, and in that year there came for the first time a divergence between the two metals as to the value of the gold or silver represented in a dollar. In 1873 there was a divergence of about 8 or 9 per cent.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In 1878.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no; in 1873 silver was at a premium.

Mr. TELLER. Silver was at a premium in 1873.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was incorrect. I intended to say that the divergence came in 1878, or shortly before that. From that day the gulf between gold and silver value has been widening. It has not been the result of law. If law has had any influence upon it, it is not entirely responsible for the widening of the gulf. Silver went steadily down from 1878 as compared with the gold in commercial value until 1890. In the meantime, between 1878 and 1890, we were coining more silver than we had ever coined annually at any previous time in our history, and yet the divergence grew.

Then in 1890 we were told that if we would only purchase 4,500,000 ounces of silver per month and coin it into silver coin it would raise the price of silver to its old price and the ratio price of $1.29 an ounce. We did it, Mr. President. We believed that. We were told over and over again that all we had to do to raise the price of silver from what it was then to $1.29 an ounce the world over was to buy and coin 4,500,000 ounces per month, and we carried that on for three years. I do not remember now how much it was annually that we coined.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Fifty-four million ounces.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We coined 54,000,000 ounces annually, but the number of dollars was much greater, and still the price of silver went steadily down; the divergence grew wider and wider. Then we repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, and still the price of silver has gone down as compared with the price of gold, but not so rapidly as it did from the years 1890 to 1893, when we were purchasing the four and a half million ounces per month, which we were told was going to elevate silver to the price of gold.

And now we have come to this, that there is no bimetallism except free coinage at 16 to 1; that no one believes in bimetallism who does not believe that we can take silver, now worth 47 cents on the dollar as compared with gold commercially, and raise it to the parity of gold by just opening our mints at that ratio.

If a man believes in another ratio he is not a bimetallist. If he believes in the ratio which represents the real parity of value between gold and silver that man is not a bimetallist at all. He must believe what is beyond belief, what it is incomprehensible to suppose that any man believes, that we can take these two metals with all this divergence, one being worth half as much in the market as the other, at the ratio of 16 to 1, and make them equal in the market the world over.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I protest against the assertion, so far as I am concerned, that I insist that every bimetallist must believe that we are capable of coining silver at 16 to 1 ourselves and sustain it. I myself know men whom I regard as as good bimetallists as anybody in the world who do not believe that, and I have never accused them of inconsistency or anything else. One of the best bimetallic men that I ever knew, and one of the most intelligent, was General Walker, who never believed that we could do it alone. He was a bimetallist, he was an intelligent man, a man for whom I had great respect and great affection.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Well, Mr. President, we have parties and parties in this country, and we have representatives and representatives of parties. I am rather pleased to see that the Senator from Colorado, who represents one party, does not quite agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who represents another party. This is what the Senator from Missouri said:

> Mr. President, this country, with the people inhabiting it, can make any laws on the financial question it desires, and it can maintain them. It is a disgrace to our people and our race to say we can not maintain a financial system at the ratio of 16 to 1 or 15½ to 1.

That is the bimetallism of the Senator from Missouri, at any rate.

Mr. SPOONER. He went further and stated that he did not want international bimetallism.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He said that he does not want any international bimetallism; that he does not want any change in the ratio. He wants that old thing which has been inscribed on the banners of the Democratic party of this country for the last ten years to delude the people of the country—16 to 1 or nothing.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I was delighted with the beautiful imagery that the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] cast over me when he spoke about my attempting to wave the wand and by the pen give value to a commodity. Prior to 1873 throughout the world the commercial value of gold and silver was their coining value at the ratio of 15½ to 1. Why was the commercial value then equal to the coining value? Because law gave to that silver bullion free and unlimited coinage into full legal-tender money at that ratio, and that law fixed that commercial value and nothing else.

Mr. ALDRICH. What law?

Mr. COCKRELL. The law giving to silver free and unlimited coinage into full legal tender.

Mr. ALDRICH. Whose law?

Mr. COCKRELL. In France, in the United States, in Germany, that was upon the silver standard alone after 1857 to 1871, and in other countries.

Mr. ALDRICH. You mean international bimetallism, in other words?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not international bimetallism at all; each nation independent of every other, and no nation belittling and degrading and dishonoring itself and its people by asking a foreign nation to come and help it establish its monetary system.

Mr. ALDRICH. But all substantially on the same basis.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut says that I am trying by the magic of the pen, the wave of the wand, to make the commercial value of silver bullion equal to its coining value and equal to gold. The Senator says that the depreciation began in 1878. In that the Senator is mistaken. There was no divergence between silver and gold prior to 1873. On the contrary, the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains weight, nine parts fine, as a commodity was worth 3 cents more than gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. How could that be, in the face of the law the Senator spoke of?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I corrected myself. It was a slip of the tongue, Mr. President. I corrected myself. I was talking about 1873 when I meant 1878.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, when did the depreciation of silver commence? It commenced in 1873. What caused it? Now, I appeal to the Senator to lay aside his inveterate prejudices against silver and look at the facts of history. What caused the divergence in the commercial value of silver relatively to gold and in its divergence from its coinage value? It was law. Law. The mysterious wand of law was drawn and the legal-tender power and free coinage were taken away from silver. What was the effect of it? It began to depreciate. It was law that caused the depreciation of silver. No intelligent man can deny it. If it had not been for law, there would have been no depreciation of silver, and every sane man knows it. It was the law of Germany, passing from a single silver standard to a single gold standard; it was the law of the United States demonetizing silver; it was the law of the Latin Union closing the mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Every man who has ever pretended to have any knowledge of the facts of history admits that it was legislation which caused the divergence between silver and gold; and the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who sits before me time and again has said that if that legislation had been directed against gold and in favor of silver, that gold would have depreciated as silver has done. The Senator from Rhode Island can not deny that proposition, that if the legislation enacted against silver in 1873 and subsequently, and in favor of gold, had been in favor of silver and against gold, gold would have depreciated commercially, as silver has done.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand——

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I put the question. I have only ten minutes. Say yes or no. Was it legislation that caused the depreciation or not? I dare you to say yes or no. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. I will answer your question in my own way.

Mr. COCKRELL. Answer the question. It needs no explanation. I assert that it was legislation which caused the depreciation of silver relatively to gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. What legislation?

Mr. COCKRELL. And I will say that if——

Mr. ALDRICH. Whose legislation?

Mr. COCKRELL. If that legislation had been directed against gold and in favor of silver, gold would have depreciated just as silver did, and I challenge the Senator to deny it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Whose legislation was it that depreciated gold?

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not make a bit of difference whose legislation it was. Do not dodge it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not dodging it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Come square up and toe the mark. Say yes or no. I dare you to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. I say that the same legislation which demonetized silver can rehabilitate it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then you say that if the same legislation had been directed against gold and in favor of silver it would have caused the depreciation of gold?

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably. Then why did you not answer it at the beginning? [Laughter.] Mr. President, it is only then a question of power. They admit that legislation can bring it up, and the arguments of my distinguished friend from Connecticut have been swept away. It is legislation that caused the depreciation, and legislation can restore and cause the appreciation. It is only a question of how much legislation is necessary.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not how much, but whose legislation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have heard him answer a question once flatfooted, and I will yield to him almost any time now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I always answer questions.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is so refreshing. Now, Mr. President, legislation caused the depreciation of silver. Had it been directed against gold and in favor of silver, gold would have depreciated and silver would have appreciated. Now, what we propose is by legislation to restore silver to its former status.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now wait.

Mr. ALDRICH. But you take one single country.

Mr. COCKRELL. Wait. It is only a question of power. The Senator admits that by cooperation with other nations we can do it. Then it takes a certain quantum of power; and now the question is, Has the United States that power?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now wait. What power is necessary? We will get down now to the logic of it. How much power is necessary to maintain the commercial value of silver bullion equal to its coining value? A power sufficient to accept and utilize as money all the silver that can be offered at the mints of that nation. That is all; no more, no less—that is all. Whenever you can show a nation or two nations or three nations or four nations that by opening their mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a fixed ratio relatively with gold, can take and coin and utilize as money all the silver that is offered, then you have the commercial value of silver bullion equal to its coining value.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Wait a moment, now. I have got him cornered. [Laughter.] It is a question of power; a question of power pure and simple; a question of capacity to take and utilize all the silver that is offered. Now, that is the only question.

Now, the Senator says we can not do it alone—that that will drive us to silver monometallism—but that we can do it by combination with other nations. I say that we can do it alone. I say that this great nation, the greatest in the world, with resources far beyond the capacity that the whole of Europe had when Europe maintained the equality of gold and silver at the ratio of 15½ to 1, when we have infinitely greater power of consumption and assumption and assimilation——

Mr. ALDRICH. Assumption, yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. And of products to exchange for silver the world over, we can by our open mints take and utilize every ounce of silver that will ever come to our mints, and we will still cry for more. It is only a question of power, a question of capacity to coin and utilize all the silver that will be offered; nothing more and nothing less and nothing else.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to get him to make a speech just by himself so we could get at him.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am trying to——

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator interrogates me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island must be recognized by the Chair before he can proceed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri yields to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he thinks that if France and the other States of the Latin Union had continued to coin silver, had kept their mints open to the free coinage of silver at a ratio of 15½ to 1, and if the other nations of the world that were then using silver had maintained its use, the act of 1873 by itself would have depreciated silver?

Mr. COCKRELL. The act of 1873?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes. Would the act of 1873 have depreciated silver, the mints of France and the States of the Latin Union and all the other countries of the world having gone to a coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio——

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it have depreciated silver?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes. Would the act of 1873 have depreciated it?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not of itself, it would not.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the whole of it; that is the whole question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Because the other nations——

Mr. ALDRICH. Then, how can we by an act restore it?

Mr. COCKRELL. The other nations had the power to consume all that was offered.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator's answer was sufficient for me.

Mr. COCKRELL. How easily satisfied the Senator is! He will just take almost anything.

Mr. ALDRICH. If an act of this country could not have depreciated silver, how can an act of this country appreciate it?

Mr. COCKRELL. We were not on a coin basis then; we were not using gold and silver; and that had all on earth to do with it. We never could resume specie payments until 1879.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Missouri and all of the people who agree with him have always contended that the fact that we were not upon a coin basis had nothing to do with what they call the crime of 1873.

Mr. COCKRELL. The crime of 1873——

Mr. ALDRICH. There was no crime about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was a crime against God and humanity and civilization and Christianity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for a moment to put some figures in the RECORD which I intended to do when I was up before?

Mr. STEWART. Very well; but I do not want it to come out of my time, because I have some remarks to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There was a great increase in the production of silver in the years from 1866 to 1895 and continuing until the present time. I think that that increase had something to do with the depreciation of silver, and I want to put in the figures.

From 1866 to 1870, a five-year period, the production of the world in fine ounces was 215,257,914;

For the next five-year period, 1871 to 1875, it was 316,585,069;

For the next five-year period, 1876 to 1880, it was 393,878,009;

For the next five-year period, 1881 to 1885, it was 460,019,722;

For the next five-year period, 1886 to 1890, it was 544,557,155; and

For the next five-year period, 1891 to 1895, it was 787,906,656 of fine ounces of silver, as compared with the period of five years from 1866 to 1870 of only 215,257,914 ounces: and the production has been going on substantially in that ratio ever since.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the assertion is often made that this bill is for the purpose of maintaining the existing gold standard. Inasmuch as that is the pledge in the platform of the Republican party, which no doubt will be observed by the Republicans everywhere with great fidelity, I propose to suggest a modification of the bill that will prevent a palpable, plain, unmistakable, bold violation of that pledge.

I give notice that at the proper time I will offer an amendment striking out from the substitute bill of the Senate committee the word "gold" wherever it appears in that bill. In every case where it appears it appears as a qualification of coin. In all the legislation previous to this time that word was omitted. The term "coin" was used in the act of July 14, 1870, when the public debt which now exists was provided for, and as to all of it issued under that act, it provides for the payment of that debt in gold and silver coin of the then standard value.

The resumption act of 1875 provided for the resumption in coin, not in gold coin. In purchasing bonds to get coin for redemption the act provided for the purchase of the same kind of bonds defined in the act of July 14, 1870. It has been admitted all the time, in every debate for the last twenty years, that all our obligations were payable in coin.

It is true the Secretary of the Treasury has been giving them gold when they wanted gold, because his friends were on that side, but not because it was the law. No man ever claimed that the obligations of the United States were payable in gold coin as against silver coin. All the Secretaries admitted that that was the law, but they had a higher policy than the law. There was never anybody who denied that that was the law.

Now, this bill strikes from the statute books coin of gold or silver and substitutes gold coin alone. That is not the gold standard which has existed. The gold standard which existed at the time of the meeting of the St. Louis convention and that now exists is the gold standard of usurpation of the Treasury Department, not the gold standard of the law. I do not wish to have the usurpations of the Treasury Department incorporated into law, particularly under a false assertion that that has been the law all the time.

Now, if you strike out the word "gold" and leave the standard as it was, you will have some consistency; but you propose to change the coin which you said you would maintain, the standard which you said you would maintain, which was in the law.

I deny that we have ever had the gold standard in this country, for every dollar of silver coined had the same purchasing power as every dollar of gold. Nor have they had the gold standard in France. Silver is there doing duty as money, and it is not depreciated one hair's breadth. It is as good as it ever was. They have about $100,000,000 or thereabouts in Germany, which is a full legal tender, as good as gold, because it has not been debased or degraded.

Now, here it is proposed in this bill to degrade the silver coin that we have and say that it shall not be received in the payment of public dues; that the public debts shall be paid in gold; that the reserve shall be gold. It is changing the standard. It is going back on the pledge. It is a plain violation of the pledge when you claim that it is the same standard. It ought not to be put forth to the country. It ought not to deceive anybody. It is false that the same standard is provided in this bill that has been in existence in this country from the beginning. It is false to make such a statement. I hope those who maintain the truth of that statement will prove that I am wrong and show me any statute where an existing obligation is made payable in gold. It is true that gold certificates and silver certificates have been deposited to take it out; but where is there a debt to be paid, where is there full legal tender, where is there coin to be paid, that silver coin will not pay where gold coin will, by statute?

Before you say that you are maintaining the existing gold standard, tell me why it is that you deny to silver the function that it has enjoyed by statute all the time since the foundation of this Government. Tell me why you do that, and then I can understand you: but I can not understand a law which says we are maintaining the present gold standard. If you are acting in good faith with regard to this matter, you will strike out the word "gold" and leave it "coin," as it has stood from the beginning. Let it stand as it has stood. Do not change it. Be consistent with yourselves. Let the Treasury Department make the standard by usurpation, but do not legalize that usurpation nor enact into law a declaration which is false. I hope that those who think they are maintaining the same standard by this bill will hurry to strike out the word "gold" and leave the statutes for the payment of all obligations as they now are, in either gold or silver coin, at the option of the debtor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER. I offer a substitute for the committee's amendment:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the substitute offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the amendment proposed by the committee, and insert:

The people of the United States are in favor of bimetallism and desirous of an international agreement with the great commercial nations of the world that will admit of the use of both gold and silver at such an established ratio as will maintain the parity between gold and silver coin, and the efforts of the Government are hereby pledged to endeavor to secure such international agreement as speedily as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I do not see the chairman of the committee in his seat; but after his effusive declaration for bimetallism I presume the chairman will accept the amendment I have offered. If he does, it will simplify matters very materially.

Mr. ALDRICH. I see no reason why the chairman of the committee should accept that amendment. All these amendments are simply offered to embarrass the committee and to embarrass this side of the Chamber who intend to support the bill. There is no amendment which could be put on it that would secure the vote of the Senator from Colorado. That is very well understood. They are all antagonistic amendments to this bill.

Mr. TELLER. I agree to that last statement. I do not believe that you could amend it in this Senate so that I could vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have not offered that amendment as an embarrassment to the bill, though I should not vote for it if it was put on, I will admit. But if the proposed amendment of the committee means anything at all, if it is to have any influence itself, I certainly think my amendment is an improvement on it, because this is a virile and live provision. The other is negative; this is affirmative.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no doubt my friend from Colorado thinks he could improve every section and every line of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. He could.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume he could, as the Senator from Nevada says, but the committee prefer their own language.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would tell me what objection there is to the phraseology I propose.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have tried to state it as frankly as I could. I should not care to reenact the Ten Commandments on this bill, however much I might be in favor of them.

Mr. TELLER. I do not wish to enter upon any discussion of the amendment. I will call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado as a substitute for the amendment of the committee will be read.

Mr. VEST. Read both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the committee will be first read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will now be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The people of the United States are in favor of bimetallism and desirous of an international agreement with the great commercial nations of the world that will admit of the use of both gold and silver at such an established ratio as will maintain the parity between gold and silver coins; and the efforts of the Government are hereby pledged to endeavor to secure such an international agreement as speedily as possible.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, if I could frame the language of this side of the Chamber respecting an amendment which reiterates and reaffirms the principles and policy of the Republican party as to the restoration of bimetallism, I should make it strong and vigorous and unqualified and earnest. I should probably add many phrases to the declaration as it appears in the amendment reported by the committee. But, Mr. President, I can not make the language for the Committee on Finance; I can not frame the language for this side of the Chamber. In good faith I accept the declarations of honorable Senators belonging to a party whose record is one of honor and not of dishonor; and when, to a man, they state on the floor of this Senate that they are believers in the principles of international bimetallism, that they stand ready to assist in bringing about the accomplishment of that beneficent result, as an honest man I accept that statement and am grateful for that admission and that appendage to this bill respecting the currency.

I accept it, Mr. President, because I know it is made in good faith. It may be, in the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], puny and futile; it may be, in the opinion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], humiliating and disgraceful; but it is enough for me and it is enough for any man who wants to be a Republican and is a bimetallist and wants to believe that the Republican party will not agree to the reopening of the American mints at 16 to 1 without considering the wishes of any other country, but do stand ready to assist in bringing about, with the consent of the leading nations of the world, the restoration of the bimetallic system at some fair ratio. And because I believe that I accept it, and I am not going to be driven from my earnest desire as a Republican to stand with the committee and stand with the party by changes of phraseology, however specious or however attractive they may be.

It may be true—I hope it is, Mr. President—that the people of the United States are in favor of bimetallism and desirous of an international agreement; but I do not conceive it to be my duty as a Senator of the United States to enact upon the statute books of our country a statement as to the beliefs of the people of the United States.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I hardly know how to interpret the situation on the Democratic side of the Chamber and the attitude of the Democratic party toward international bimetallism. I am a firm believer in international bimetallism; but I find that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is violently opposed to it. In order that I may do him no injustice, I wish to read from the RECORD what he said yesterday in the debate on the financial bill. He used this language:

I do not want any international agreement.

How does that sound to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], a great light and leader also in the Democratic party, who has just introduced and is pressing earnestly an amendment favoring international bimetallism? The Senator from Missouri says further:

I would not bind the United States in any agreement of a financial character in any shape, manner, or form.

It seems to me the Senator from Missouri is bound to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. Again, the Senator from Missouri said, in speaking of an international agreement:

I do not want any alliance with any other nation. I do not want any assistance from any other nation.

Mr. President, I take it that the Senator from Missouri speaks by authority for his party, as he is its acknowledged leader on the floor of the Senate and stands next to Mr. Bryan in prominence in his party.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow a question there?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does not the Senator from West Virginia know that immediately after the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] so expressed himself he was the only Senator who voted with the Republicans in favor of the then pending proposition?

Mr. ELKINS. Who did?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Missouri who made that statement is the only Senator on this side of the Chamber who voted with the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Arkansas is mistaken.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not understand the politics of the other side of the Chamber. [Laughter.] No one else can from the differences and confusion that exists to-day on that side on the question of finance.

Mr. VEST. I did not use the language which the Senator from West Virginia has read, but I did vote with the Republicans yesterday, and gave my reasons for the vote I cast.

Mr. ELKINS. And I congratulate the Senator upon his vote, but not upon his reasons. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. It was my colleague [Mr. COCKRELL] who made the statement which has been read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I beg pardon. I find I was misinformed. I thought it was the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. ELKINS. No, Mr. President; I distinctly stated that I read from the speech of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and in doing so I took occasion to say I wished to use his own language, as he stood the acknowledged leader of his party on this floor. I do not want to misrepresent the other side in the approaching campaign, and I was very glad to have the explicit statement of the Senator from Missouri, who speaks for the Democratic party in this Chamber, that he was opposed to international bimetallism. No one denies this.

Mr. TILLMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are you in favor of any alliance with any European nation?

Mr. ELKINS. I am in favor of an arrangement with European nations to increase the use of silver as money throughout the world, because I do not think we can do it by ourselves.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would you limit your agreement or your alliance or your arrangement to money only; and if so, why?

Mr. ELKINS. We have the money question up now. That is one thing, and let us deal with one thing at a time. I would first get an arrangement about money and then decide about other things when and as they come up; I cross one bridge at a time and not until I get to it; but I am not opposed to any alliance with other countries that will be helpful to the development of our trade and commerce and in the interest of our people.

Mr. President, this world is fast becoming a vast neighborhood. The nations of the world are more closely connected than were counties in States sixty or seventy years ago. Every morning we know what goes on in every part of the world; we know the changes in the markets and the movements in business and commerce, and the idea that we can set up for ourselves, that we can be a part of the great world of finance and business, leading the world in both and declare at the same time that we will use only our kind of money, no matter what it is, and not agree with other nations on a uniform standard, is a great mistake.

Every Senator must admit that the best thing that could happen in the financial world in the interest of trade and commerce would be an agreement among the nations of the world as to the standard of value and the use of the same kind of money, so that we could have one common standard of value for the entire commercial world. Everybody must admit that this would be a wise arrangement, because nations are so closely linked together in financial and trade transactions. We can not stand alone, we can not have bimetallism alone, any more than we could expect one State or one county to have one measure of value with a different measure in another State or in another county.

Mr. President, it seems to me if we are to take the Senator from Missouri as the proper authority, as the leader on this floor of the Democracy in the approaching campaign, that his party are the real enemies of silver, as I have always claimed. Notwithstanding all the charges of the Republican party being an enemy to silver, there is no greater enemy to silver, it seems to me, than the Senator from Missouri and those who stand with him. They want no assistance; they want no aid; they want no international arrangement as to the use of silver, although such an arrangement might lead to the use of all the silver that could be produced as money. I had supposed that all parties were agreed that an international arrangement would be the best thing for this country and for the world; but to-day the Democratic party declares its opposition to any arrangement that will permit the use of all the silver in the world as money while Republicans heartily favor such an arrangement.

I wish to say that, in my judgment, if there is a little patience about the money question it will settle itself. You can not legislate values; you can not legislate what value Europe will put upon our money any more than you can by legislation fix the prices in Europe of products on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and compel Europe to accept our valuation. Therefore we should agree on a common standard of value.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ELKINS. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. I ask if the question will settle itself, why pass this bill?

Mr. ELKINS. It will settle itself, and sooner than the Senator thinks.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think so, and so I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator knows that the world is producing gold so rapidly and we are getting so much gold for our exports, that in a few years we shall have enough gold to make all the money we may need; and if so, this will settle not only the silver, but the currency question. That is what Senators on the other side are afraid of in the approaching campaign. The Democratic party do not want the money question settled, even if it will give the people and country all the gold needed to carry on business, and the use of all the silver that can be safely used.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, our currency amounts now to about two thousand millions of dollars. We all know that every dollar of it is good, and the volume of good money is increasing rapidly. We are all satisfied, and the world is satisfied; we are doing very well; we are carrying on trade and commerce in volume that simply startles the imagination. Who is making this complaint about money?

The only fear the Democratic party has, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, is that in the next ten years we shall have enough gold to do the business of the world. Silver will continue to be used as money as much as may be needed for all purposes in the business world, but the money of the future will be some form of paper or certificate of deposit, which will be represented by gold or which will be redeemable in gold. We will also have silver certificates maintained equal in value to gold so far as they can be used with safety.

It seems to me the rapid increase of gold will settle the currency question without any legislation of the kind proposed and advocated by Senators on the other side of the Chamber. The time is at hand, owing to the rapid increase in the production of gold, when we can confidently believe that anyone having gold dollars or gold bullion can deposit the same and get certificates for the same redeemable in gold, making the best money in the world.

This will be far better than establishing a national bank, buying bonds, and taking out note circulation. Under this arrangement there will be no need of a public debt or bonds as a basis to insure a safe and sound currency. Going directly to the Treasury with gold will be the shortest and best way to get certificates of deposit. These certificates will take the place of national-bank notes without injury.

Of the two thousand millions of currency we have only two hundred and seven millions of national-bank notes, or about one-tenth. If the banks do not find note circulation profitable, as they do not, then instead of putting out a bond that can not be redeemed in thirty years as a basis for national-bank notes, why not let gold certificates take their place? This would allow us to go on paying off our national debt instead of perpetuating it in order to furnish a basis for national-bank note circulation when it may not be needed, because gold certificates or paper redeemable in gold issued directly against gold deposited in the Treasury will be far better.

I am very glad to hear from so great an authority as the Senator from Missouri the emphatic declaration that the Democratic party do not want any international arrangement; do not want any aid or assistance; and I want to make this statement so strong that it will not be denied in the next campaign.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is unjust to my colleague [Mr. COCKRELL] and myself for the mistake to be made that I made his declaration upon yesterday and that he voted with the Republicans, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. I voted with the Republicans, and gave my reasons for doing so.

When the proposition was made here some years ago to send a commission abroad in order to bring about an international conference as to bimetallism, I did not vote for it. I was absent from the Senate upon a sick bed at the time, and I did not pair upon that question. If I had been here, I should have voted against it then, because I believed then, as I believe now, that such a project is utterly impracticable.

I supposed when the Democratic party announced in their platforms, national, State, and county, that they were for the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1, without regard to what might be done by foreign nations, that we meant it, and that we were prepared to do what must be done in order to save bimetallism and take our position behind silver and defend it, as France did for nearly seventy years.

Why, Mr. President, it would seem from what is said now upon this floor that there is a unanimity with foreign nations in regard to this question of gold and silver. I had occasion in 1893 to read from the reports of the Herschel commission, showing that there were all sorts of differences in the systems of the nations of the world as to the question of gold, silver, and paper. I will ask the Secretary now to read the conclusion arrived at by the Herschel commission in regard to the monetary systems throughout all the nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

(a) With little or no gold coin, as in Scandinavia, Holland, and Canada;

(b) Without a mint or gold coinage, as in Canada and the Dutch East Indies;

(c) With a circulation consisting partly of gold, partly of overvalued and inconvertible silver, which is legal tender to an unlimited amount, as in France and other countries of the Latin Union, in the United States, and also in Germany, though there the proportion of overvalued silver is more limited, the mints in all these countries being freely open to gold, but not to silver, and in some of them the silver coinage having ceased;

(d) With a system under which the banks part with gold freely for export, as in Holland, or refuse it for export, as in France;

(e) With mints closed against private coinage of both silver and gold, and with a currency of inconvertible paper, as has been temporarily the case in Austria;

(f) With a circulation based on gold, but consisting of token silver, which, however, is legal tender to an unlimited extent, as in the West Indies. The case of Holland and Java is very remarkable, since in that case the gold standard has been maintained without difficulty in both countries, although there is no mint in the Dutch East Indies, no stock of gold there, and a moderate stock of gold in Holland; whilst the currency consists of silver and paper legally and practically inconvertible into gold, except for purposes of export. The case of Canada, which maintains a gold standard without a gold coinage, is also very remarkable.

The case of Austria-Hungary is also interesting, and presents a remarkable contrast to that of India.

It will be seen that a country with a silver standard, and a currency consisting partly of overvalued silver, but chiefly of inconvertible paper, has been able, by closing its mints against private coinage for a series of years, and whilst still continuing to coin silver on Government account, to maintain a fairly steady rate of exchange with gold-using countries for a considerable period preparatory to adopting a gold standard.

Mr. VEST. Those were the conclusions of the Herschel commission, appointed by the British Parliament to investigate the question of closing the mints of India. It will be seen that there is no systematic and uniform arrangement of this money question throughout the world. The exports of every country determine the value of its legal-tender money. That is an axiomatic rule from which there can be no variation.

We have heard a great deal here about the silver of Mexico being depreciated. Mexico exports a few hides, some coffee, and a considerable amount of silver. In 1899—and I have the official report before me—Mexico exported in round numbers 70,000,000 pesos or Mexican dollars' worth of domestic merchandise. The valuation of a peso in 1899 in American money was 46 cents on the dollar, and in American money the amount of exports of that country was about $34,000,000.

As the result of this, when the Mexican dollar is outside of the territorial limits of Mexico it sinks to the value of silver bullion commercially. But how is it with the silver dollar of the United States? It is as good in Europe as the gold dollar. I had occasion in the debate of 1893 to state that when I happened to be at Carlsbad, in Austria, a banker there had offered to give me gold or Austrian money for any amount of the silver of the United States, either silver certificates or silver dollars, because, as he expressed it, the silver dollars of the United States, being full legal tender, could equally with gold purchase any of our salable products. After all, then, it is a question of exports as to the value of the legal-tender money of any country.

The Mexican dollar has nearly 6¼ grains more of standard silver in it than the dollar of the United States; and yet our dollar is worth all over the world 100 cents, because we exported at the end of the fiscal year 1899 one billion two hundred and sixty-odd million dollars of domestic merchandise, excluding gold and silver. That is the reason why our legal-tender money, no matter whether it be greenbacks or silver, is equal to gold anywhere.

Mr. President, if the time ever comes, as predicted by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] who has just spoken, that by reason of gold discoveries this country will be flooded with gold, we shall have exactly the same condition of things that we had in 1850 and 1851, after the discovery of gold in California. I remember distinctly when the bankers of the United States in 1850 called for the demonetization of gold. They were under the impression that this country would be flooded and inundated with gold; and they then declared for silver and against gold distinctly and emphatically. The only motive they have or ever will have is to have the money of the United States in that coin which will purchase more than any other, and which will increase the income of the wealthy classes.

The whole struggle now, as it has been from the time when money was first invented, is between the money changers and capitalists, who want to make money dearer and higher, with a larger purchasing capacity, and the people without money, who are dependent upon their labor in order to obtain even the necessaries of life. To-day we see the United States in the same struggle which has occurred in all the nations of the world. In the Old World, where there are privileged classes, where there are men living from year to year upon fixed incomes, as in England and in some nations of the Continent, the struggle is to establish the gold standard, because they believe that gold is scarcer than silver.

We, being the largest producing and exporting country in the world, can sustain silver as France sustained it. If we abandon it, it is as certain as anything can be in the future that the last struggle for bimetallism has been made, and that the capitalists and money changers have triumphed.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, I believe it due to my colleagues and to myself that I should make a few observations on the pending bill.

Mr. President, the position that I have heretofore taken on kindred measures, is well known to every Senator in this Chamber. When I addressed the Senate in 1893 on the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, I conscientiously believed that the United States alone could establish and maintain the parity between gold and silver by opening its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. With the changed conditions which soon thereafter followed, I became apprehensive that this was too great an undertaking for a single nation. I have, however, steadily adhered to bimetallism.

Mr. President, admitting that we have heretofore been unsuccessful in making an agreement with other countries, I am in favor of again negotiating with foreign nations with a view of agreeing upon a parity between gold and silver, and in my judgment the day is not far distant when the principal nations of the Old World will invite the United States to join them in a conference for the purpose of establishing an international ratio of bimetallism. The bill reported by the Committee on Finance, and upon which we will to-day record our votes, provides for such a conference for the purpose of establishing a ratio.

The platform of the national Republican party adopted in convention at St. Louis in 1896 contained a similar provision. The delegates in that convention not in harmony with that provision vacated their seats and retired from the convention. Believing then, as I do now, that the St. Louis platform provided all that this nation could hope to accomplish for silver and bimetallism in the absence of an international agreement, I remained with the convention. Supplementary to this view, I wish to add that in my judgment there are other principles advocated and incorporated in Republican platforms which are of great moment and importance.

In order that my position at the time of the last Presidential campaign may be better understood, I beg to quote from an address I issued to the Republicans of Idaho shortly after the St. Louis convention:

> Realizing that the integrity of the Republican party in this State is endangered by a conflict of views upon the subject of bimetallism, a principle long cherished and advocated by a majority of the Republican party, but respecting the best method of accomplishing which there has always been a diversity of opinion, it is deemed wise and patriotic at this time to set forth a few facts, which may serve to direct the conduct of unwavering Republicans and inspire in the hearts of the faltering a renewed loyalty to the grandest political organization known to the history of this Government.
> No political party has ever yet succeeded in formulating a creed which in all particulars met the unqualified approval of every member of the organization; and no party is likely to arise within the lifetime of this generation that can hope to attain to that degree of perfection. Therefore each individual citizen, sensible of the imperfection of all human contrivances, should associate himself with that political party which in its aims, professions, and achievements reflects most nearly his own views of correct and successful government.
> The question which confronts the Republicans of Idaho to-day is this: Ought we to sever our connection with the national organization because it is not in strict accord with many of us as to the best method of establishing bimetallism? This is the sole subject of difference between the national party and the Republicans of Idaho. Is this difference sufficient cause for alienation? I believe not; and, moreover, I am firmly convinced that within the Republican party rests the best promise for the cause of bimetallism. On the other hand, what assurance have we that abandonment of the Republican party will contribute anything toward the desired result? * * *
> It is my profound conviction that when the intelligent Republicans of Idaho have carefully and calmly considered the situation in this State they will conclude that they can not afford to make the sacrifice required; can not afford to incur the risks which abandonment of the Republican party at such a time as this involves, but will continue in their unfaltering allegiance to the party which has given the country all the sound and beneficent legislation it has enjoyed during the past thirty years. In this connection I am impelled to the declaration that an independent financial system must be coupled with the enactment of a law protecting all our industrial and commercial interests, which can only be accomplished through the Republican party. * * *
> Forty years ago the Republican party first raised its standard. Under its folds were arranged all that was purest in American citizenship and best in American statesmanship. To its triumphs on many fields not only our country but the civilized world owes a debt of gratitude for its achievements in the cause of progress and humanity. That standard has not yet been lowered, and will not be until the beneficent mission of the Republican party, identical with the Republic itself, has been accomplished.

By the declaration in favor of international bimetallism as provided for in the pending bill the position of the United States is reiterated to the world and in a manner to admit of no question as to our sincerity.

Mr. President, the people of the State of Idaho in 1896 saw fit to cast the electoral vote of the State for the Democratic candidate. They were told that the election of Mr. McKinley would result in prolonging hard times, low prices, and want of confidence.

On the contrary, the dominance of the Republican party has brought to our State, in common with the rest of the United States, a period of unexampled prosperity and satisfaction with existing conditions.

The Dingley tariff law has been a source of great benefit to our people. Under it the most important industries of our State have been encouraged and developed. Business is better than it has ever been before, land values are higher, mortgages have been greatly diminished, and our people are happy and contented.

The Northwest, which so short a time ago was faltering in its support of the Republican party, is to-day in harmony with the President of the United States in his policy, both foreign and domestic.

Believing this measure does not in any way endanger the cause of bimetallism, but rather aids its ultimate accomplishment, and that when the recognition of silver comes it will be through the efforts of the Republican party, I shall vote for the committee amendment and the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and I shall vote against it mindful of the pledge which was made by the Republican party in St. Louis to promote the cause of bimetallism. I think the amendment offered by the Senator is not legislation.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he thinks the amendment offered by the committee is legislation?

Mr. SPOONER. I think the amendment offered by the committee is entirely proper to be placed in a bill which is legislation. I think the distinction between the amendment offered by the committee and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado is a very plain one. The amendment offered by the committee is an amendment declaring the intention of the body which passes the bill as to its construction. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado is an attempt to declare by Congress what the wish of the American people is upon a particular subject.

Mr. President, the pledge which was made by the Republican party in St. Louis was speedily redeemed and crystallized into law; and if any doubt has been cast or could be cast upon the attitude of the party or the attitude of the Government as to the subject covered by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado, it is such an amendment as he has offered.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate and to place upon record the act of 1897, passed only three years ago, the first section of which reads as follows:

> That whenever—
> "Whenever," at any time—
> after March 4, 1897, the President of the United States shall determine that the United States should be represented at any international conference called by the United States or any other country—

Authorizing him to call it, contemplating the fact that other countries might call it; a continuing statute, in every sense as vital to-day as it was the day the President affixed his signature to it, and speaking in unmistakable terms the attitude of the United States upon this subject—> with a view to securing by international agreement a fixity of relative value between gold and silver as money by means of a common ratio between these metals, with free mintage at such ratio, he is hereby authorized to appoint five or more commissioners to such international conference; and for compensation of said commissioners and for all reasonable expenses connected therewith, to be approved by the Secretary of State, including the proportion to be paid by the United States of the joint expenses of any such conference, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

It did not refer to any particular conference. It did not refer to any conference called by any particular government, but it authorized the President, whenever any conference is called upon this subject either by the United States or by any other government, to send commissioners, and it appropriates the sum of $100,000 for the payment of the expenses, and $75,000 of that appropriation, under this continuing act, lies in the Treasury of the United States and can be used for that purpose.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Eighty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. SPOONER. Eighty-five thousand dollars. Section 2 was a special provision:

> That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in the name of the Government of the United States, to call, in his discretion, such international conference, to assemble at such point as may be agreed upon. And he is further authorized, if in his judgment the purpose specified in the first section hereof can thus be better attained, to appoint one or more special commissioners or envoys to such of the nations of Europe as he may designate to seek by diplomatic negotiations an international agreement for the purpose specified in the first section hereof. And in case of such appointment so much of the appropriation herein made as shall be necessary shall be available for the proper expenses and compensation of such commissioners or envoys.

The President saw fit to exercise not the general and continuing power conferred by the first section, but to appoint special commissioners and envoys under the second section, and he appointed a commission. It may be that the special power given by the second section is spent. He appointed a commission, admirable in every way, headed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], known all over this country to be a firm and sturdy friend of international bimetallism, able in every way, if there is any man in this country to accomplish it, to present by argument the cause of bimetallism, and I think no one in the country will dispute that every proper resource which could be employed by men was employed by him and his associates to bring about that result. No greater glory in this world could have come to him than to have brought back from Europe an international agreement.

The President never acted under the first section. He appointed the special envoys under the second section. Very likely he could still act under the second section. The only possible argument, and that would be purely technical, which could be made as to his power to act under the second section is that he has once exercised the power.

Mr. TELLER. He could act again.

Mr. SPOONER. I rather agree with the Senator from Colorado, that he could still act under the second section, but I take it that no lawyer can deny, and no one has here denied, that he can act under the first section, and that there is a law then upon the statute book authorizing him to call a conference and authorizing him at any time when any government calls a conference to appoint commissioners to attend it.

Mr. President, there would be no necessity whatever for the amendment offered by the committee, I am frank to say that there would be no particular appropriateness in it, although it is a legitimate method of legislation, but for the fact that it has been said over and over again, I think here and I know elsewhere, that this bill is intended, if enacted into law, to put an end, so far as the United States is concerned, to any effort for international bimetallism—in other words, to change the statutory status of the United States upon that subject. Therefore we reported from the committee, what is often done, a declaration that it is not the intention of the Congress which passes the bill to lay by its provisions any obstacle in the way of international bimetallism.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we have charged more than that. We have charged that the bill itself would do it without any reference to its intention. The committees deal with the intention only, I notice. I am free to say that I think the act which the Senator from Wisconsin has read is in force and the President can appoint a commission under it if he sees fit, so far as that is concerned.

The Senator says that this is not good legislation which I have suggested. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the act of 1893, and it is about all I do want to say on the subject.

> And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of the dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts.

The majority of the Republican members of this body voted for that law. I did not vote for it; not because I was opposed to the declaration that was made, but because in voting for it I would have had to vote for the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, which I did not choose to do.

Mr. President, I know Senators are anxious to get a vote; I have no desire to discuss the matter, and I will refrain from saying anything further on this amendment. I am willing to have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute for the committee's amendment, offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TELLER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when Mr. MALLORY'S name was called). My colleague is ill and necessarily absent. He is paired on this question.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who is absent. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SULLIVAN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BATE. I wish to state that the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is ill and can not be here. He is paired as announced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE].

Mr. TELLER. I wish to state that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] is sick and is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]. If the Senator from South Dakota were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg to say that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] is absent on account of illness and if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER. In accordance with the announcement just made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], while I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], he is paired on this bill with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]. That leaves me free to vote on all questions connected with the pending bill without any further announcement. Before I vote, however, I wish to state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is absent from the Chamber, and on all votes on this bill he is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I vote "yea."

Mr. KENNEY. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] is detained from the Chamber by sickness. He has a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Were he here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MASON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN]. He is absent, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. PROCTOR. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS. Under that arrangement I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 45; as follows:

So Mr. TELLER'S substitute for the amendment of the Committee on Finance was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay a vote, as I know everybody wants to have a vote and dispose of the bill. There are some propositions I should like to make, but as on the votes which have been taken the entire Republican membership of this body with one exception have voted against the amendments, I think I will submit to the chairman of the committee, who seems to have the power of excluding all our amendments, the question whether he will accept certain amendments if I offer them. If not, I do not propose to ask the Senate to take a vote on them.

I should like to know whether he should allow this to go in. I want to tell the Senate, before I offer it, what it is, because it is very evident that the Senate has forgotten. It is an extract from the platform of the Republican party of 1892. I am sure it will not be recognized by at least some of our friends on this side of the Chamber if I do not make that statement:

> The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal.

I should like to know whether the Senator will accept that or whether, if I call for a vote, he will insist upon voting it down?

Mr. ALDRICH. Read what is proposed in all, and I shall be very glad to answer, or do you want an answer to this?

Mr. TELLER. I want an answer to this. There is one other to which I will call the attention of the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say to the Senator from Colorado very frankly that I shall resist, and I shall ask the friends of the bill to resist any declaratory recital of the nature he has suggested, without any regard to my personal opinion or the opinions of Senators upon this side of the Chamber as to the declarations themselves. It is no part of the purpose of Senators in supporting this bill to incorporate into it the various Republican platforms which have been adopted since the party first had existence.

Mr. TELLER. This is a proper amendment which I propose to offer to the pending amendment. I do not desire to take the time of the Senate unnecessarily. The Senator has been frank in saying he is opposed to it. Will the Senator be embarrassed if I ask him——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am in favor of the platform. It was the platform of the Republican party, and I voted for the candidate of that party upon it, but I think it would be manifestly improper to incorporate that platform into this bill.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has got a sort of platform in this measure, and I think this would be a great improvement on it. I want to ask the Senator—if it will embarrass him he need not answer it—whether he thinks the Republican majority in this Chamber, with the exception of one Senator who voted for my proposition, will all vote against this?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; under these circumstances.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will not offer it, because it is as good as offered. But there is another one to which I wish to call the attention of Senators. I have a declaration of political faith that came to the people in the spring of 1896 with a great deal of satisfaction, I think, the declaration made in the State of Ohio, the State which was about to present, as everybody knew, a candidate who was reasonably sure to be successful at least in securing the nomination, whatever doubt there might have been about his election. I will read it and ask the Senator whether he objects to it as an amendment to the pending amendment:

> We contend for honest money, for a currency of gold, silver, and paper, with which to measure our exchanges, that shall be as sound as the Government and as untarnished as its honor, and to that end we favor bimetallism and demand the use of both gold and silver as standard money, either in accordance with a ratio to be fixed by an international agreement, if that can be obtained, or under such restrictions and such provisions to be determined by legislation as will secure the maintenance of the parities of value of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal.

Mr. ALDRICH. We have crystallized that platform into a bill and propose to legislate on that subject. I have been perfectly frank in answering the Senator from Colorado the question he asked me, and now I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. TELLER. You can do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will he and the Senators who vote with him on this subject agree, now or hereafter, to support this Republican platform that he is reading? Is that their purpose? Is it their purpose, too, to express confidence in and to approve of the platform that he is reading it in this presence?

Mr. SPOONER. Would he vote for the bill if it were put on?

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator vote for the bill if this platform is put on?

Mr. TELLER. No. I will not. The Senator need——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will any of the Senators who are acting with him vote for it?

Mr. TELLER. I hope not.

Mr. President, I supported, to the best of my ability, the candidate under the first proposition that I read. I could support a candidate on that proposition if it was made in good faith. I shall never have an opportunity again to support a Republican candidate on a bimetallic platform that means anything. They may put in the next platform some foolish and useless provision for the purpose of deceiving the public, as they did in 1896, which did not deceive me; but if they would make either one of these the basis of an honest declaration there are thousands of men who did not support Mr. McKinley who might then support the Republican candidate, but there is no probability of their doing it. The Senator says that this has not any place there. It has as much place in the bill as the declaration that he has got there.

Mr. President, I knew if we got a vote we could not vote this in. I knew that when the party dictated by its caucus action every man, no matter what his personal and private opinions might be on this subject, had to stand up to the dictates of the Indiana junta, and that there was not any practical use of moving any further amendments. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall move no further amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course all legislation is ultimately put in shape by the conference committee. I do not rise to move an amendment, but to make a suggestion to the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator from Rhode Island is chairman, and he will be the chairman of the committee of conference. It is that when this amendment is considered in conference he oblige some of us by putting six more words into it, so that it will read:

> That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, which we pledge ourselves to promote, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

To hold out a little inducement to the Senator, I will say that if he will get that in in the conference, I will vote to concur in the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TELLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when Mr. BACON's name was called). I will state that on this bill and all the amendments my colleague [Mr. BACON] is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]. My colleague is unable to be in the Senate during the votes to-day.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). As I stated before, I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. I neglected to state when I was on my feet before what would be his vote and what would be mine. I understood from him before leaving the Chamber yesterday that his vote would be against all amendments offered by the committee and against the Senate bill, and would be for such amendments as were offered upon his side. That would be exactly the opposite of my position; and I declare now, so that I may not repeat it, that I should vote, were I at liberty, "yea" upon this amendment, and that I would vote for such amendments as are offered by the Committee on Finance and vote in the affirmative upon the bill itself. Having made that explanation, I will not refer to it again, but simply announce the pair.

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], who is also absent, and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. I wish again to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] is sick, and would vote "nay" if present. He is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON].

The result was announced—yeas 45; nays 30.

So the amendment of the Committee on Finance to the substitute reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment just adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what does the Senator offer an amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the committee as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can not be done now. That amendment has just been adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment of the committee as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a substitute for the entire committee amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. As a substitute for the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that it is not in order at the present moment until the amendment is perfected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order if no other amendments are to be offered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Arkansas has an amendment to offer.

Mr. MORGAN. I offered this amendment on the 31st day of January.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask if it is not in order to offer this as a substitute for the committee's amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; not at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order in time; but if Senators desire to propose any amendments to the amendment reported from the committee, they would take precedence of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, because the amendment offered by the committee is entitled to be perfected, but any amendment proposing to strike it out entirely is in order.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very clear.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire if the bill has been reported to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; then the Senator's amendment will be in order when the bill gets in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HOAR. Because then the question will be on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following——

Mr. CULLOM. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is open to the same objection now.

Mr. STEWART. I have an amendment to offer to the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Amend by striking out the word "gold" wherever it occurs in the committee's substitute.

Mr. STEWART. That will leave——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. In several instances in the bill gold certificates are mentioned. How would the Senator designate them in his amendment?

Mr. STEWART. I will say "except as to gold certificates."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then I suggest that he change his amendment so that it shall not exclude all mention of gold certificates.

Mr. STEWART. No; I propose to strike out "gold" except where gold certificates are referred to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to have it so that we could understand just where we are, Mr. President.

Mr. STEWART. I propose simply to continue the law as it now stands, and to say "coin" where "gold coin" is used in the bill. "Coin" was formerly used and my amendment substitutes coin again for gold.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I call attention to the first two lines of the substitute to show how it would read if this amendment should be adopted:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section, etc., continue to be the standard unit of value.

Strike out "gold" it would read this way:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of nine-tenths fine shall, etc.

[Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. That declaration is false any how. That would suit me exactly. I want to bring up the question of restoring silver. Any little phraseology can be arranged if you put back silver where it was. If you are going to maintain the gold standard as it was, you will strike out "gold" wherever it occurs in this bill, except where reference is made to certificates or something of that character.

In the first place, gold resumption is in this bill. It is not in the gold-standard law as it now exists. In the second place, gold bonds are in the bill. It is not in the law. In the law all the bonds now outstanding are payable in gold and silver coin, at the ratio that existed July 14, 1870; and so on, wherever it relates to obligations. If there is anything as to the phraseology of certificates, that can be ascertained afterwards.

The question is whether the Republican party are willing to maintain the gold standard as it existed in the spring of 1896, which they pledged themselves to do until they could get an international agreement. The question is whether they intend to do that, or whether they are dissatisfied with it and are going to change it and destroy the full legal-tender power of the silver dollar as a reserve, as resumption money, as bond-paying money, as interest-paying money. The question is whether they are going to take that power away from the silver dollar, and if it is the intention to change the gold standard. They call it the gold standard. I call it the double standard, so far as the use of money is concerned, up to this time. It is now the double standard,

The only gold standard we have ever had in this country was the usurpation standard of the Treasury Department, which has been denounced again and again for twenty years here and never defended except on the ground of expediency, that the bondholders ought to have gold, and the Treasury had to pay it to them. Nobody ever contended that it was the law. That never was contended. Now it is proposed to change the law, and I want it understood that it is changed by deliberate vote, so that people may not be deceived by the declaration that they are maintaining the gold standard as it existed in 1896, when they are changing it and substituting a legal gold standard for an usurped gold standard. If you are going to make that change, I want it done by a deliberate vote, and I want the yeas and nays on this amendment. Perhaps the phraseology can be changed as to the gold certificate, if that be the opinion of the committee, and I will modify it so it will not apply to the first clause in the first section.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator that if he wants a test vote on the general question——

Mr. STEWART. The general question is whether obligations can be made payable in gold alone which are now payable in silver, and I want a vote on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nevada please modify his amendment as he desires to have it presented to the Senate?

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that a viva voce vote be taken on this question.

Mr. STEWART. I want the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well; we might as well dispose of it at one time as at another.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada desires to modify his proposed amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator that if he will except from that general sweeping provision in the first section of the committee's amendment——

Mr. STEWART. The last part of the first section relates to the redemption in gold. I can not do that.

Mr. TELLER. Well, the provision as to the unit.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume the Senator's purpose would be accomplished as well by moving to substitute silver in place of gold wherever it appears in the bill.

Mr. STEWART. Not at all. Coin means both gold and silver. I will modify the amendment so as to strike out "gold" wherever it occurs, except in the first clause of the first section, where it relates to the unit, and in any other sections where it relates to gold certificates. In all other cases I ask that the word "gold" be stricken out.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is intelligible.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not understand what effect this will have on the bill, and I for one will have to insist on having the bill read as it would be if the amendment were adopted before I am ready to vote on a proposition of this kind. I am perfectly willing to vote for what the Senator declares as his purpose to declare that the bonds of the Government of the United States shall not be payable in gold. If he will make the amendment so as to apply to them, I shall vote for it with pleasure; but I want to see what sort of effect a sweeping proposition of this sort will have on the entire bill.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the simplest way, and the only way which is in order—as the Senator can not, if anybody object, make a motion to strike out a certain word wherever it occurs in the bill—is to move it as a separate and independent amendment in each case. If he does that, it will take a very short time, and the Senator from Arkansas will then see without reading the bill what the proposed change means.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I quite agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts says.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Nevada wishes a test vote on the question of gold.

Mr. STEWART. In order to bring it out I will make my motion specific. I move to strike out the word "gold" in line 22 on page 10 of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That will not do. That is not what the Senator wants.

Mr. STEWART. That is one of the places where I should like to have the word "gold" stricken out.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suggest, in view of the utterances of the Senator from Arkansas, that some Democrats should be added to the subcommittee of which Senator STEWART is chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. I will offer my own amendment now. I want it to apply to the redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes. Wherever the law is changed I want to have my amendment apply. On page 10, line 22, I move to strike out "gold." In line 2, page 11, after the word "in," I move to strike out "gold;" on the same page, line 8, after the word "any," strike out "gold;" on the same page, line 15, after the word "the," I move to strike out "gold," leaving it "coin" in each instance; on page 12, line

3, after the word "in," I move to strike out "gold" and leave it "coin;" on page 12, line 6, after the word "the," I move to strike out "gold," leaving "coin" to stand, and on the same page, line 13, after the word "the," I move to strike out "gold."

Mr. ALDRICH. That is enough. That will make a test vote.

Mr. STEWART. That covers all the cases I care about. That will make a test vote.

Mr. ALLISON. That, I think, is enough.

Mr. STEWART. I will state in explanation that that leaves the law where it is so far as the redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes and the payment of the public debt and the reserve in the Treasury are concerned. It leaves the law just where it now stands—"coin."

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Chair to state what the question is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. In line 22, page 10, it is proposed, before the word "coin," to strike out the word "gold."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. How will it read then?

The SECRETARY. The closing paragraph would read:

> And United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption shall be redeemed in coin of such standard.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that that proposed amendment is absolutely inconsistent with everything else in the section. It has no bearing on the section; it does not change a solitary thing in it. It is to pay the same standard coin that is provided for above in the section, which is the gold standard of 25.8 grains to the dollar.

Mr. STEWART. Well, we can modify that further and say "in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870." That is what they are payable in now.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator that if he wants to get a vote as to whether we shall make the obligations of the Government not now payable in gold hereafter payable in gold, he can get it by inserting his amendment on page 15, where it provides that the bonds shall be paid, principal and interest, in gold.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Nevada will take one place, it will do just as well as taking half a dozen places in the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I will adopt the Senator's suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada withdraws his proposed amendment and offers another, as the Chair understands.

Mr. TELLER. I make this suggestion to the Senator. In section 6, on page 15, beginning in line 3, the bill reads:

> Such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and said bonds to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value.

If the Senator moves to strike out the words "in gold coin of the present standard value," he will be able to accomplish what he desires.

Mr. STEWART. I propose to do that; and to insert "gold or silver coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870."

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me the Senator can get a vote on that without any further trouble.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I only want to say that if there were a proposition in this bill to make the existing bonds of the United States now outstanding payable in gold coin alone, I should vote against it; but this is a proposition to issue new 2 per cent bonds, into which the whole public debt is to be voluntarily funded; and, as I have said before, I am willing to vote for that if we can fund our national debt now existing into new 2 per cent gold bonds. I call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that these bonds could not be negotiated if they were not gold bonds. Therefore the Senator can accomplish what he wants in a much easier way by joining me in voting against the whole bill. That is the easiest way to do it.

Mr. ALLISON. I am afraid the Senator from Nevada has not heard the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that he join the Senator from New Hampshire in voting against the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Nevada had better withdraw his amendment.

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps it would simplify matters if I moved to lay the amendment, whatever it is, on the table.

Mr. STEWART. Let the amendment be first read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. STEWART. Wait until it is read, will you, please?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

The SECRETARY. In section 6, on page 15, line 5, after the word "interest," it is proposed to strike out "in gold coin of the present standard value" and insert "in coin of standard value of the act of July 14, 1870."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], who is absent, and I understand is not paired. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to announce that my colleague [Mr. VEST], who was unavoidably called from the Senate Chamber a few moments ago, is paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (after having voted in the affirmative). When I voted I supposed the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was present. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TELLER. I want again to announce the absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] on account of sickness and to say that if present, he would vote "nay" on this motion. I will also announce that he is against this bill and, if present, would vote against the bill and all amendments coming from the committee.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—44.

Aldrich,	Depew,	Kean,	Pritchard,
Allison,	Elkins,	Lindsay,	Quarles,
Beveridge,	Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Ross,
Burrows,	Foraker,	McBride,	Scott,
Caffery,	Foster,	McComas,	Sewell,
Carter,	Frye,	McCumber,	Shoup,
Chandler,	Gear,	McMillan,	Simon,
Clark, Wyo.	Hanna,	Mason,	Spooner,
Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Penrose,	Thurston,
Davis,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Wetmore,
Deboe,	Hoar,	Platt, Conn.	Wolcott.

NAYS—26.

Bate,	Culberson,	McLaurin,	Sullivan,
Berry,	Daniel,	Martin,	Taliaferro,
Butler,	Harris,	Money,	Teller,
Chilton,	Jones, Ark.	Morgan,	Tillman,
Clark, Mont.	Jones, Nev.	Pettus,	Turley.
Clay,	Kenney,	Rawlins,
Cockrell,	McEnery,	Stewart,

NOT VOTING—16.

Allen,	Hale,	Nelson,	Turner,
Bacon,	Heitfeld,	Pettigrew,	Vest,
Baker,	Kyle,	Platt, N. Y.	Warren,
Gallinger,	Mallory,	Proctor,	Wellington.

So Mr. STEWART'S amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. PETTUS. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting at the end of section 1 the following:

> Gold coins and silver dollars coined by the United States shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value when not below the weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single coin, and when reduced in weight below such standard and tolerance shall be a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to lay that amendment upon the table.

Mr. PETTUS. Why not have a direct vote upon the amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to a direct vote upon the amendment, if the Senator prefers that course.

Mr. PETTUS. I do; and I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], who is absent. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WARREN. I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Bate,	Culberson,	McLaurin,	Sullivan,
Berry,	Daniel,	Martin,	Taliaferro,
Butler,	Harris,	Money,	Teller,
Chilton,	Jones, Ark.	Morgan,	Tillman,
Clark, Mont.	Jones, Nev.	Pettus,	Turley,
Clay,	Kenney,	Rawlins,	Vest.
Cockrell,	McEnery,	Stewart,

NAYS—44.

Aldrich,	Depew,	Lindsay,	Pritchard,

Burrows,	Foraker,	McComas,	Scott,
Caffery,	Foster,	McCumber,	Sewell,
Carter,	Gear,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Chandler,	Hanna,	Mason,	Simon,
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Spooner,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Penrose,	Thurston,
Davis,	Hoar,	Perkins,	Wetmore,
Deboe,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.	Wolcott.

NOT VOTING—15.

Allen,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Turner,
Bacon,	Hale,	Pettigrew,	Warren,
Baker,	Heitfeld,	Platt, N. Y.	Wellington.
Frye,	Kyle,	Proctor,

So Mr. PETTUS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PETTUS. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill as a separate section the following:

SEC. —. That nothing contained in this act shall be held or construed to affect the present legal-tender quality of silver dollars coined by the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], which has just been read. [Putting the question.] The "nays" appear to prevail.

Mr. PETTUS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and that that pair has been transferred to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], who is absent. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire whether the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have a general pair with that Senator, and so I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bate,	Culberson,	Martin,	Taliaferro,
Berry,	Daniel,	Money,	Teller,

Bacon,	Heitfeld,	Pettigrew,	Turner,
Baker,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, N. Y.	Warren,
Gallinger,	Kyle,	Pritchard,	Wellington.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VEST. I offer an amendment, and ask the Secretary to read it from the copy which I send to the desk, as by some clerical error two or three words were omitted in the print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 7 the following:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared Treasury notes to the amount of $200,000,000, said notes to be in such form and denomination as the Secretary may determine, and to be full legal tender for all debts, public and private. The Secretary shall cause to be engraved upon each of said notes the words "bond note" and the statement that said note is a full legal tender, as aforesaid; and he shall loan, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, said notes to any person, persons, or corporation in sums not less than $100 on their depositing in the United States Treasury United States bonds at par value and in sums equal to the amount of bond Treasury notes issued to such applicant or applicants; said bond Treasury notes so issued shall bear the same rate of interest as the bonds upon which they are issued, and said bonds so deposited with the Treasury shall only be redeemed by the original depositors of the same or their assigns by surrendering to the Treasury bond Treasury notes or other legal-tender money of the United States of equal amount with the par value of said bonds and accrued interest.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me for a very few moments, I should like to say something about this amendment, though I frankly state that I am not very sanguine as to its adoption.

The obvious meaning of this amendment is to place all the citizens of the United States upon the same footing as the national banks as to drawing currency out of the Treasury upon the deposit of bonds. There are some good features in the national banking system, amongst which are the double-liability clause as to stockholders and the examination of the banks periodically; but I have always objected to that feature which gave to those institutions the right to contract or expand the currency of the country at pleasure.

It has seemed to me always that that was a dangerous power, and I think that our experience in the past justifies my apprehension. It is now an open secret that three or four of the great banks in the city of New York control the stock market and the prices of all securities. They can expand or they can contract the currency at their pleasure. They can go to the Treasury and put in their bonds, upon which they are drawing interest, take out money, and loan it to the people of the country at 6 per cent or more. If, upon the other hand, they want to contract the currency, they simply retire their notes and take out bonds, the interest still continuing to run in their favor.

Now, what is this, I ask in all sincerity and candor, except a moneyed monopoly of the most dangerous character? I have no personal antipathy to banks or capital; I have no desire to pull down the wealthy classes in the country, if legitimately wealthy. But human nature is the same everywhere and under all circumstances. When you put the power in the hands of any lot of directors, I care not how high their standing or charming their personality, to contract or expand the currency of a great country, it is a dangerous gift; and I am compelled to say it will always be excused. When I say excused, I mean to say they will always have the influence to make it appear to the people that what they are doing in regard to contraction or expansion is entirely legitimate and proper.

Mr. President, I intend to make some statements, in none of which I have the slightest personal feeling and in none of which shall I indulge in any criticism that is not entirely proper as to a public official in regard to his official acts. Two years after I entered the Senate of the United States—in 1881—we had an object lesson in regard to national banks which will never be forgotten. It was proposed in Congress to fund the bonded debt of the country at 3 per cent and to make the new bonds the only basis for bank circulation. It aroused the deepest resentment on the part of the banks. It cut down the interest upon their bonds and compelled them to take, at a smaller interest and as a basis for circulation, the 3 percents. Those of us who were here then will remember that these corridors swarmed with bank officers.

They came from my own State and said to me personally, "If Congress dares to pass this bill," which they denominated as robbery, "it will cause a panic in this country which will shake the entire monetary system to the center." The great bankers of New York, as they always do, led the attack upon Congress. Millions and hundreds of millions of dollars were represented around this Capitol. They said, "The idea of cutting down the interest on our bonds and forcing us to make these the basis of circulation is a felony. You dare to do it, and we will create a panic in Wall street, the effects of which will not be recovered from in years."

I am glad to say that Congress for once stood firm against these assaults, and we passed the bill. Hayes was then President and ex-Senator Sherman Secretary of the Treasury, and in one hour after that bill was passed stocks fell 40 per cent in Wall street and some of them went down to even a lower price. They made good their threat. Then the President of the United States, with the full concurrence, of course, of the Secretary, vetoed the bill, and we were unable to pass it over his veto. I have here, but I will not detain the Senate by reading it, the veto message of President Hayes in which he declared that the national banking system was the most perfect ever created by the genius of mortal man and that to pass this bill—the bill then pending—was to destroy the system, and he therefore felt it his solemn duty to interpose the Executive veto.

The bill failed, but under the Administration of President Harrison Secretary of the Treasury Windom funded the debt at three and a half per cent, one-half per cent more than we had put in the bill which was vetoed by Hayes, and there was not the slightest trouble throughout the country. My colleague calls my attention to something I have not mentioned, that on the day after the bill passed the banks retired eighteen millions of circulation in order to assist the panic which was then going on, and which affected the credit of the entire country and ruined hundreds and thousands of innocent people.

Mr. President, I came to the conclusion then that in a republican government, looking to the welfare of the entire people, no such tremendous power as this should be given to any men or any corporations. I have had additional reasons since for entertaining that opinion.

Now, I am not talking about these banks in any spirit of hypercriticism, for I have mentioned the fact that there are some good features in their organization. I take it for granted that no Senator here will for an instant pretend that any individual or any corporation in this country should be permitted to violate the law. That ought to be axiomatic. Under the national banking law a national bank, declared by the Supreme Court to be a fiscal agent of the Government, should have its doors closed the minute it refuses to pay out to a depositor his money in its vaults. If a country bank, with a capital of fifty thousand or a hundred thousand dollars, should refuse to pay my check for $5 and I had that much money in its vaults, it would be closed by telegraph from the city of Washington and put into the hands of a receiver. All the world knows it. In 1890, when the Baring Brothers failed, and in 1893, in that awful panic which shook the country all over, the great banks of New York City, with millions of dollars of deposits belonging to individuals, continued to do business, and yet refused to pay out one dollar in money to their depositors except as a matter of the highest personal favor, ex gratia.

I had friends in the city of New York who told me that they had thousands of dollars in those banks and when they would apply for money to defray their ordinary family expenses they were cooly told, "You can have clearing-house certificates, but not one dollar in currency or in gold or silver." That state of things continued for three weeks openly, notoriously, and flagrantly, in violation of the law, well known to the officers of the Government, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Secretary of the Treasury. No bank was closed. They stood there, monumental violators of the statute, with perfect impunity, and sneered at the idea that they could be closed because they refused to obey the national-banking law. Will any Senator here deny that. Can a system be right in any country, but especially in a popular Government like ours, which permits this sort of thing openly and notoriously and almost in sight of the Capitol?

But, Mr. President, I come now to a third phase of this question, which I speak of with great reluctance. I have come to that age of life and of public life when I know how easy it is to criticise a public man. It is hardly necessary for me to say that I have suffered from that sort of thing myself. If one-tenth of what has been said of me in my public life is true I ought to be in a felon's cell, and there is hardly a Senator in this body who is not in the same condition. I am no boy to be using loose words in regard to the character of men, publicly or privately. But we are all justly and legitimately subject to the criticism that must affect everybody in public life. I have the kindest feeling personally for Mr. Gage, but I have read with very great attention and reread his answer to the resolutions passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate in regard to the recent transactions with national banks and national depositaries. I am compelled to say, Mr. President, that that answer of the Secretary of the Treasury is unsatisfactory. I have been unable to understand why the Secretary of the Treasury should choose the City National Bank of New York as the distributing agency of the public money.

Mr. Gage says that he desired, in putting the money into the public depositaries from time to time, to prevent congestion in the Treasury of the United States and injury to the business of the country. With that I have no quarrel. But why does he take one national bank, even if it did have more bonds than any other on deposit in the Treasury, for the purpose of distributing to other banks the tax money of the people? Mr. Gage disposes of that question by saying that it was impracticable to use the subtreasury in the city of New York as a distributing agency. Why? Were not the vaults of that institution secure? Did it not have sufficient clerical force? Was it inaccessible to the public? Did it have no facilities for sending money to national banks? It was due to the people of the United States and the representatives of the people that Mr. Gage should say specifically and in detail what created these difficulties as to choosing the subtreasury in New York for the distribution of this large amount of money. When Mr. Gage received $58,000,000 from the close of the Pacific Railroad transaction he said it was inexpedient to put this large amount of money in the Treasury. Therefore he looked around for some distributing agency, when he had his own subtreasury in New York with every facility, as it must have had, for the distribution of this money.

Mr. President, it was not so much the money that was put into the bank that constituted this favoritism. It was the unparalleled fact that a national bank was selected to represent the Treasury of the United States. What must have been the advantage to that institution when Mr. Gage, representing the whole Government, said to all the world, "Here is a national bank that I prefer to the Treasury itself to distribute this money to other banks." Mr. Gage says no national bank charges for its services. What greater pay could it have than this? There it stands to-day, the elected agent of the greatest Government on earth, indorsed as to credit and reliability in such fashion as has never happened before.

When we were called upon under the treaty of Paris to pay $20,000,000 to Spain this bank appeared and said, as the correspondence shows, "We should like very much to handle this transaction for the Government. We have great facilities at Hongkong, and we should like to transmit this money;" because the bank knew that the fact that it was intrusted with the transmission of this enormous amount of money would be an advertisement in Europe and in this country which could not be bought with money. They did transmit the $20,000,000. Is it possible that a draft on the City National Bank of New York was worth more in Spain or anywhere else than a draft on the Treasury of the United States? The mere statement of the proposition furnishes an answer.

But, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury does not answer the inquiry of Congress satisfactorily, to me at least, in regard to the sale and leasing of the old custom-house in the city of New York. Under the terms of the law by which that sale was made the old site was to be put up to the highest and best bidder, and the City National Bank, Mr. Gage said, and I have no doubt it was the fact, was the highest and best bidder. All the purchase money could be paid down or $750,000 paid and the balance at certain times thereafter within a certain limit, as suited the purchaser. Three million two hundred and fifteen thousand dollars were left due, and that amount of money was left without any interest in the hands of the bank to be loaned to the people of the United States at interest. Mr. Gage says in his answer to the inquiry of Congress that no money was paid by the Government to the bank under the provision of the law which required the purchaser of the old custom-house to lease the building to the Government at a reasonable rent until a new custom-house could be erected. Mr. Gage states that no money was paid because Congress had made no appropriation to pay that rent.

Mr. President, the question that ought to have been answered by the Secretary of the Treasury is, What were the terms of that lease? Was there interest to be paid? Under what conditions did that lease go into effect? All the world knows that when the United States Government made that lease there must have been some terms not stated in the reply of Mr. Gage to the resolution of Congress. What sort of transaction was this in which the purchase money was left in the hands of the purchaser without interest, no deed put upon record, which exempted the property as United States property from the State and city tax in the State and city of New York? Why is it we are told coolly and deliberately that no money was paid by the Government, because no appropriation was made by Congress? The bank had the money in their vaults, and why should they require the cash to be paid down by the Government when they already had control of it?

Mr. President, not only this, but when Mr. Gage speaks of the bonds that the bank deposited to qualify, to use his expression, as a national depository, the correspondence shows that those bonds came from the Standard Oil Company, whose officers and stockholders are also stockholders of the City National Bank of New York. We find in this correspondence letter after letter from the City National Bank to the Secretary of the Treasury saying please transmit to the Standard Oil Company a million five hundred thousand dollars in bonds, or $2,000,000 in bonds, showing that as the bank needed bonds in order to get money out of the Treasury of the United States they applied to the Standard Oil Company and received bonds, which as a matter of course were afterwards returned when they had no further use for them.

Mr. President, a letter was written which has been alluded to here, and which will be alluded to very frequently in the coming campaign of course, from Mr. Hepburn, the vice-president of the bank, in which he said to the Secretary of the Treasury, "We desire to be continued as a national depository. If you will look at the list of our directors you will see how efficient was their aid in the last canvass." What was this statement except a naked, barefaced demand for official favors because favors in the recent campaign had been conferred upon the Administration by this great bank? Is that a proper condition of things? I submit to every man in this Chamber and outside of it, who wishes fairly and deliberately to consider this question, was that letter short of an insult to the highest fiscal officer of this Government when it says in words hardly veiled, "We helped you; now you must help us?"

Mr. President, this amendment simply puts it within the power of any individual citizen of the United States to take his bonds, carry them to the Treasury, deposit them, and draw out an equal amount of these Treasury notes, no interest to run upon the bonds while they are so deposited, when under the existing law and under this bill the national banks have the privilege of depositing their bonds, interest still running, and taking out the currency which they loan to their customers at 6 per cent or more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair very reluctantly calls the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that his time has expired.

Mr. VEST. I will not trespass any longer upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I venture to suggest to my friend, the Senator from Missouri, that the amendment as printed is not correct.

Mr. VEST. I corrected that. It is a misprint.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are two or three other objections which I see to this.

Mr. President, there is not a civilized country in the world engaged in large commercial transactions where there is not some sort of provision somewhere to meet an emergency in the case of a panic, except in the United States. And there is nothing here. The idea presented by the Senator from Missouri is worthy of consideration, in my opinion. It ought to be carefully considered by the Senate. We all understand conditions in this country, that when a crisis begins there is a tendency to hold money everywhere; and if there should be a deliberate conspiracy to corner money, to bring on a panic, the people are practically helpless and have no means of preventing or checking it. We heard only a few weeks ago when there was danger of a panic in New York that it was prevented by the Treasury sending a considerable amount of money and by certain individuals advancing money that went into the market and checked the panic.

Now, this proposition of the Senator from Missouri, as I understand it, is intended to be about this: That persons who own bonds may deposit them in the Treasury and be allowed to take out an equivalent amount of money in cases where they need it; that the money taken or borrowed from the Government on the bonds shall pay a rate of interest equal to the interest which the Government pays on the bonds while the money is in the hands of the persons borrowing the money on the bonds. It simply provides a means by which a holder of United States bonds may be able to get money on those bonds when there is an emergency and he can not get it at the banks, a condition that has existed a number of times here.

It is useless to go into a discussion of the conditions that prevail in England or France or Germany to provide for funds in an emergency. If this proposition of the Senator from Missouri is not in proper form, and I confess there are some points as to which I object, it can be corrected. For instance, I do not think there is a necessity for having $200,000,000 put in this fund. I think $50,000,000 would be quite enough. But I do believe it would be a wise provision to put $50,000,000 of money in the Treasury, which could be taken out of the Treasury by the holders of United States bonds, on depositing ample security for the Government, and kept for a reasonable time.

I had myself proposed an amendment, which has been printed and which I thought would reach the case better, and that proposed that 6 per cent should be paid on this money by the borrowers and that they should be required to return it to the Treasury within twelve months of the time it was borrowed, so as to tide over an emergency. I can see no reason why it should not be done. I am sure the Senator from Missouri did not mean to say, as the amendment does, on page 2, after providing for the bonds at par value—

> In sums equal to the amount of bond Treasury notes issued to such applicant or applicants; said bond Treasury notes so issued shall bear the same rate of interest as the bonds upon which they are issued.

Now, this is evidently a misprint or a mistake in the structure, as the Senator from Missouri did not intend to have the Government pay interest on the bonds and at the same time pay interest on the money borrowed on the bonds. What he meant was that the interest on the bonds should stop while the money was in the hands of the men who took it out of the Treasury Department, but he intended to express it by saying the borrower of the money should pay the same rate of interest on the money that he gets on the bonds, which is the same thing. It was clearly, I take it, not the intention to make the Government pay double interest—interest on the bonds and interest on the Treasury notes.

Mr. VEST. I did not mean that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I hope we will now have a vote on this amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, this amendment provides that notes issued by the Secretary of the Treasury up to $200,000,000, and loaned on the bonds, shall be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, yet, so far as I observe, there is no provision made for the redemption of this money at all in coin of any kind. The provision is that these notes "shall only be redeemed by the original depositors of the same, or their assigns, by surrendering to the Treasury bond Treasury notes or other legal-tender money of the United States of equal amount with the par value of said bonds and accrued interest."

The point I make is whether it is not a departure from any legislation we have ever had that we shall issue demand notes not redeemable at all in any kind of coin and make those notes legal tender for all debts, public and private. If the Government shall make them a legal tender in payment of public dues and debts, it is all very well; but to make these irredeemable notes, so far as coin is concerned, legal tender in payment of private debts is, I think, a step further than has ever been gone by any legislation.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me? My idea was that these Treasury notes should be redeemable exactly as the Treasury notes that we have already issued. But the Senator can obviate any question about it, if he makes any objection to it, by saying redeemable in coin, like the Treasury notes. I certainly meant that they were to be so redeemed.

Mr. LINDSAY. There is no description of these notes that would warrant the inference that they are to be redeemed at the Treasury in either gold or silver:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared Treasury notes to the amount of $200,000,000, said notes to be in such form and denomination as the Secretary may determine, and to be full legal tender for all debts, public and private. The Secretary shall cause to be engraved upon each of said notes the words "bond note" and the statement that said note is a full legal tender, as aforesaid; and he shall loan, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, said notes to any person, etc.

I am impressed with the conviction that some legislation in this direction is not only proper but probably necessary, but I do not think, with due deference to the Senator from Missouri, that this amendment ought to be made a part of the bill, which evidently will become a law before the end of the present session.

Mr. CAFFERY. It may be, Mr. President, that the Senator from Missouri intended that the obligation of the Government set out in the bill to maintain all its issues of money at a parity would cover the redemption of these notes that he proposed to issue upon the deposit of bonds. But it occurs to me that this adds to the evil that already cries for remedy. We have too much paper money issued by the Government now, and to add to that paper money by $200,000,000 would produce too much additional strain upon the $150,000,000 of reserve provided for in the bill.

I could wish, Mr. President, that this bill had provided at least for the beginning of a system of banking which would divorce the United States from any connection whatever with its own bonds as the redemption fund of bank notes. I believe that a healthy system of banking ought to be commenced now in this bill, and that that system of banking should contain, as the redemption fund of the notes, whatever coin money the United States issued.

One of the evils of the present banking system, as the Senator from Iowa well knows, is the tendency to congest all money in the city of New York. Ordinarily the country banks deposit their reserves and deposits in the reserve cities, which in turn deposit them in New York. In times of stringency they would draw that deposit, and the very moment when the country needs currency in a financial or industrial panic, that is the time when no currency can be had. At all other periods money is abundant in New York. A very large portion of the money of the United States is there seeking investment and loan. When the country is prosperous New York has an abundance of money to loan, and when there is a panic it has none.

So, therefore, I think that a system of banking ought to be inaugurated whereby the wealth of each community would afford a basis for such an issue of notes in every financial panic as would tide over the difficulty. There will never be any elasticity in the currency, in my opinion, until the banking system is entirely reformed and gold and silver are made the redemption fund of all issues of banks; in other words, until we go back to the ancient method, the true method, the sound method that prevailed in sound banks before the war.

As a matter of course, as at present, to have uniform Federal supervision of the banks is necessary. I do not know but that State banks chartered by the States themselves, with power to issue money, with this provision of uniformity and regulation by the Government retained, without Federal supervision, would be preferable to the present system now in vogue. I believe it would; but so far as this particular amendment is concerned I am utterly opposed to adding anything more to the burden that the United States is now compelled to bear in the way of redeeming its issues of money and providing an enormous reserve for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the text of the bill?

Mr. MCLAURIN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill add as a new section the following:

SEC. 9. That sections 3412 and 3413 and all other acts and parts of acts which impose any tax upon the circulation of State banks or State banking associations be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY].

Mr. SULLIVAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BATE (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to ask whether the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DEBOE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky has not voted.

Mr. BATE. I promised to take care of him on this vote on this particular occasion, and I will withdraw my vote. I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Berry,	Daniel,	McLaurin,	Rawlins,
Chilton,	Heitfeld,	Martin,	Taliaferro,
Clark, Mont.	Jones, Ark.	Money,	Tillman,
Clay,	Lindsay,	Morgan,	Turley,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the text of the committee amendment? If not, the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is in order, which is proposed as a substitute for the entire amendment. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

First. That it is the fixed policy of the United States to pay and clear off the national debt as rapidly as just and equal taxation and the accumulation of other revenues of the Government will permit, with constant regard to the capacity of the people to respond to this national duty.

Second. That the specie basis, consisting of gold and silver coin, is the only true, just, and constitutional basis of the issue of bank bills to circulate as money.

Third. That it is an unjust and unconstitutional burden on the taxpayers of the United States that Congress should agree to change the terms of the national obligations, even with the consent of the bondholders, so as to deprive the people of the right and privilege of paying said obligations in coins of gold or silver according to their necessities or the requirements of the general welfare.

Fourth. That it is contrary to the policy of the United States that the national debt shall be made perpetual, or that it should be maintained or increased for the benefit of the national banks, or to regulate the commercial value of gold or silver bullion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], and vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 47; as follows:

Baker,	Kyle,	Pettigrew,	Wellington.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That from and after the passage of this act the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver, and there shall be coined dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, and upon the same terms and subject to the limitations and provisions of law regulating the coinage and legal-tender quality of gold; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury certificates may be issued therefor in the manner now provided by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. BERRY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina is a very elaborate bill, proposing a new system of finance in the United States. I suggest that it be printed in the RECORD and acted upon without being read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] be printed in the RECORD without reading. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. That is satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the unit of account shall be dollar, and the fractional parts thereof shall be cent and mill; the cent shall be the one-hundredth part of a dollar, or unit, and the mill shall be the one-thousandth part of a dollar, or unit; and that all the accounts of the Government and of the public offices thereof and all the proceedings in the courts of the United States shall be kept and stated in such unit and fractional parts thereof, namely, dollars, cents, and mills.

SEC. 2. That the money of the United States shall be manufactured or coined out of gold, silver, paper, or copper. The gold coins shall be manufactured out of an alloy of which nine parts by weight shall be pure gold and one part by weight shall be copper or copper and silver, and shall be known as standard gold. The silver coins shall be manufactured or coined out of an alloy of which nine parts by weight shall be pure silver and one part by weight shall be copper, and shall be known as standard silver. The copper or minor coins shall be manufactured or coined out of an alloy of which three parts by weight shall be copper and one part by weight shall be nickel. The paper money or units shall be manufactured or coined out of paper, the character and quality of which shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That no piece of money coined or manufactured out of gold, silver, or paper shall be greater than twenty dollars or units, and each piece of money manufactured by the United States out of gold, silver, or paper shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, at their nominal or face value. The minor coins shall be a legal tender at their nominal or face value for all debts, public and private, in amounts not to exceed one dollar or unit in any single payment.

SEC. 4. That there shall be manufactured or coined out of standard gold the following coins or pieces of money, namely: Twenty dollar or unit pieces, each to be twenty dollars or units, and to contain 516 grains, troy; ten dollar or unit pieces, each to be ten dollars or units, and to contain 258 grains, troy; five dollar or unit pieces, each to be five dollars or units, and to contain 129 grains, troy.

SEC. 5. That there shall be manufactured or coined out of standard silver the following coins or pieces of money, namely: Dollar or unit pieces, each to be one dollar or unit, and to contain 412½ grains, troy; one-half dollar or unit pieces, each to be one-half of a dollar or unit, and to contain 206¼ grains, troy; quarter dollar or unit pieces, each to be one-quarter of a dollar or unit, and to contain 103⅛ grains, troy; dimes, each to be one-tenth of a dollar or unit, and to contain 41¼ grains, troy.

SEC. 6. That the minor coins of the United States shall be a 5-cent piece and a 1-cent piece. The 5-cent piece shall be the one-twentieth part of a dollar or unit, and shall contain 80 grains, troy; the 1-cent piece shall be the one-hundredth part of a dollar or unit, and shall contain 40 grains, troy.

SEC. 7. That any person may bring to the mints of the United States gold or silver bullion to be coined into money, and the same shall be coined into money for him free of charge immediately upon receipt of the same at the mint, and into pieces of such denominations as he may designate, and if he fail to inform the Director of the Mint at the time his bullion is received at the mint what denominations he desires his bullion to be coined into, the same shall be coined into such pieces as the Director of the Mint may direct. All gold and silver bullion which is now owned by, or which may hereafter come into the possession of, the United States, shall be immediately coined into money.

SEC. 8. That the minor coins shall be coined out of material purchased by the Director of the Mint with funds appropriated for that purpose, and the same shall be delivered to any person or persons who may purchase the same of the Government at their nominal or face value.

SEC. 9. That no coins other than those provided for in this act shall hereafter be manufactured at the mint to be used for money in the United States.

SEC. 10. That upon the coins that shall be coined hereafter at the mint the following devices and legends, and none other, shall be stamped or printed, namely: Upon the obverse side an impression emblematic of liberty, with an inscription of the word "Liberty" and the year of the coinage, and upon the reverse side the figure or representation of an eagle, with the inscriptions "United States of America" and "E Pluribus Unum," and the designation of the number of dollars or units or parts of a dollar or unit of the coin; as, for example, $20 or units, dollar or unit, or half dollar or unit, as the case may be; but the figure of the eagle shall be omitted from the 10-cent piece. The minor coins shall bear the same inscriptions as the other coins, except the eagle shall be omitted, and each piece shall be designated as 5 cents or 1 cent, as the case may be.

SEC. 11. That there shall be manufactured or coined out of paper, at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the United States, the following kinds or pieces of money, and none other, namely, twenty-dollar or unit pieces, each to be twenty dollars or units; ten-dollar or unit pieces, each to be ten dollars or units; five-dollar or unit pieces, each to be five dollars or units; two-dollar or unit pieces, each to be two dollars or units; one-dollar or unit pieces, each to be one dollar or unit.

SEC. 12. That upon the obverse side of each piece of paper money that shall be coined under this act the following devices or legends shall be printed or stamped, namely, the denomination expressed in numerals, the serial number (and each denomination shall be numbered separately) commencing with the number 1; the respective signatures of the Secretary and Registrar of the Treasury; the year of the coinage; the words "United States of America" and "E Pluribus Unum" and an impression of the Goddess of Liberty, with the word "Liberty" beneath it. Upon the obverse and reverse sides of each piece shall be printed or stamped the words "A legal tender for all debts, public and private," and across both sides the denomination thereof expressed in words, as, for example, "Twenty dollars or units" or "Dollar or unit," as the case may be. Upon the obverse side of each twenty-dollar or unit piece shall be stamped a vignette of George Washington, beneath which shall be printed or stamped the words "George Washington, first President of the United States." Upon the obverse side of each ten-dollar or unit piece shall be stamped a vignette of Andrew Jackson, beneath which shall be printed or stamped the words "Andrew Jackson, seventh President of the United States." Upon the obverse side of each five-dollar or unit piece shall be stamped a vignette of Abraham Lincoln, beneath which shall be printed or stamped the words "Abraham Lincoln, sixteenth President of the United States." Upon the obverse side of each two-dollar or unit piece shall be printed or stamped a vignette of Thomas Jefferson, beneath which shall be printed or stamped the words "Thomas Jefferson, third President of the United States." Upon the obverse side of each one-dollar or unit piece shall be printed or stamped a vignette of Benjamin Franklin, beneath which shall be printed or stamped the words "Benjamin Franklin, one of the first advocates of paper money." Such other devices and printing may be placed upon each piece of paper money coined under this act for the purpose of designating it from other pieces, and which may be pertinent for that purpose, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 13. That plates shall be engraved under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of printing or coining the various denominations of money out of paper as herein provided for. The engraving and the printing shall be of the highest art, and the paper shall be of the best character and quality that can be obtained for that purpose. The pieces of paper money coined under this act shall be uniform in size, and the engraving on the plates on which they shall be printed or coined shall be 6 inches and seven-eighths of an inch in length and 3 inches in width.

SEC. 14. That there shall be coined out of paper an amount of money of the various denominations herein provided for sufficient to cover the total amount of the following obligations of the United States, namely, bonds, principal and interest, United States notes, old demand notes, fractional currency, gold certificates, silver certificates, certificates of deposit, Treasury notes of 1890, and the national-bank notes. Whenever any of said obligations, except the bonds of the United States, come into possession of the United States, the same shall be retained, canceled, and destroyed, and in place thereof shall be substituted an equal amount of coined paper money, dollar for dollar, and the same shall thereafter be paid out upon the various obligations of the United States as they mature.

SEC. 15. That whenever any of the bonds of the United States shall be presented for payment at the Treasury thereof before the same shall become due, the Treasurer of the United States shall pay to the owner thereof the nominal or face value of the bonds presented, and interest thereon to the date of presentation, in coined paper money, dollar for dollar; but if when presented for payment as aforesaid, gold or silver coin be demanded, the Treasurer may pay the same either in gold or silver coin, or both, as he may elect. All bonds paid by the United States as herein provided for shall be immediately canceled and destroyed.

SEC. 16. That each national bank organized under the laws of the United States shall, within ninety days from and after the passage of this act, forward to the Treasurer of the United States an amount of money equal to the amount of notes issued and put into circulation by it; on receipt of which the bonds held by the United States as security for its circulation shall be delivered to it.

SEC. 17. That if any person, after the passage of this act, shall bring gold or silver bullion to the mints of the United States to be coined into money, there shall be delivered to him, at his option, the coins coined out of his bullion, or an equal amount of coined paper money, dollar for dollar; and there shall be coined and kept on hand a sufficient amount of coined paper money to meet any demand that may be made upon the Treasurer for coined paper money in exchange for gold or silver bullion.

SEC. 18. That whenever gold or silver bullion shall be exchanged for coined paper money the bullion so exchanged shall be and become the property of the United States and shall be immediately coined into money and used in the payment of the debts and obligations of the United States as they mature.

SEC. 19. That the Treasurer of the United States shall under no circumstances exchange one kind of money for another kind with any person, persons, or corporation.

SEC. 20. That in coining money out of paper, as provided for in this act, the following rule shall be observed, namely: For every twenty-dollar or unit piece there shall be coined 2 ten-dollar or unit pieces, 4 five-dollar or unit pieces, 10 two-dollar or unit pieces, and 20 one-dollar or unit pieces; for every ten-dollar or unit piece there shall be coined 2 five-dollar or unit pieces, 5 two-dollar or unit pieces, and 10 one-dollar or unit pieces; for every five-dollar or unit piece there shall be coined 5 one-dollar or unit pieces.

SEC. 21. That any of the money that may be coined out of paper under this act that shall become mutilated or injured so as to become unfit for use shall, when presented to the Treasurer of the United States by the owner thereof, or when the same shall come into the Treasury of the United States, be taken up and destroyed, and in lieu thereof shall be issued new money coined out of paper.

SEC. 22. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 23. That the title of the act shall be amended to read as follows: "An act to establish a unit of account and to provide for the coinage of money, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on Finance as it has been amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional section, to come in as section 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That section 5138 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5138. No association shall be organized with a less capital than $100,000, except that banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants, and except that banks with a capital of not less than $25,000 may, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 4,000 inhabitants. No association shall be organized in a city the population of which exceeds 50,000 persons with a capital of less than $200,000."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have no desire to submit any remarks upon the amendment, except simply to state the proposed change in the existing law. The only change is that under the amendment national banks with $25,000 capital will be permitted to be organized in places having a population of 4,000 or less. It is to meet an urgent want in the West that the amendment has been offered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall not object to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas and Mr. TELLER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. ALLEN's name was called). I wish to announce again, on the final passage of the bill, that on this bill and all amendments which have heretofore been voted upon, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If the Senator from Nebraska were present, he would vote "nay" on this question and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea."

Mr. CLAY (when Mr. BACON's name was called). If my colleague [Mr. BACON] were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). While I have had a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] on this bill and on all votes which have been taken heretofore, that pair has been transferred to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], who, if present, would vote "nay." I vote "nay."

Mr. PROCTOR (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENNEY (when Mr. TURNER'S name was called). The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] is detained from the Senate by reason of sickness. If he were present, he would vote "nay." He has a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). As announced by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. If that Senator were present, he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I again announce that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]; but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], and vote. I vote "yea."

YEAS—46.

NOT VOTING—11.

Allen,	Gallinger,	Pettigrew,	Warren,
Bacon,	Kyle,	Proctor,	Wellington.
Baker,	Mallory,	Turner,

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to affirm the existing standard of value, to maintain the parity in value of all forms of money, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes."

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD as it has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island whether the bill is not also to be printed in separate form as it passed?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; I ask also that the bill may be printed separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The bill as passed by the Senate as a substitute for House bill No. 1 is as follows:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, continue to be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard; and United States notes, and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption shall be redeemed in gold coin of such standard.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to secure the prompt and certain redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes as hereinbefore provided, to set apart in the Treasury a reserve fund of $150,000,000 in gold coin, which fund shall be used for such redemption purposes only, and whenever and as often as any of said notes shall be redeemed from said fund it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to use said notes so redeemed to restore and maintain such reserve fund in the manner following, to wit: First, by exchanging the notes so redeemed for any gold coin in the general fund of the Treasury; second, by accepting deposits of gold coin at the Treasury or at any subtreasury in exchange for the United States notes so redeemed; third, by procuring gold coin by the use of said notes, in accordance with the provisions of section 3700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to restore and maintain the gold coin in the reserve fund by the foregoing methods, and the amount of such gold coin in said fund shall at any time fall below $100,000,000, then it shall be his duty to restore the same to the maximum sum of $150,000,000 by borrowing money on the credit of the United States, and for the debt thus incurred to issue and sell coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after one year from the date of their issue, and to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the gold coin received from the sale of said bonds shall first be covered into the general fund of the Treasury and then exchanged, in the manner hereinbefore provided, for an equal amount of the notes redeemed and held for exchange, and the United States notes exchanged in accordance with the provisions of this section shall, when covered into the Treasury, be reissued as now provided for by law, and the gold coin in the reserve fund, together with the redeemed notes held for use as provided in this section, shall at no time exceed the maximum sum of $150,000,000.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury as fast as standard silver dollars are coined under the provisions of the acts of July 14, 1890, and June 13, 1898, from bullion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, to retire and cancel an equal amount of Treasury notes whenever received into the Treasury, either by exchange in accordance with the provisions of this act or in the ordinary course of business, and upon the cancellation of Treasury notes silver certificates shall be issued against the silver dollars so coined.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $20, and to issue gold certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20, and the coin so deposited shall be retained in the Treasury and held for the payment of such certificates on demand and used for no other purpose. Such certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued, and when held by any national banking association may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve: Provided, That whenever and so long as the gold coin held in the reserve fund in the Treasury for the redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes shall fall and remain below $100,000,000 the authority to issue certificates as herein provided shall be suspended: And provided further, That of the amount of such outstanding certificates one-fourth at least shall be in denominations of $20 or less: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, issue such certificates in denominations of $10,000, payable to order. And section 5193 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That from and after the passage of this act no United States notes or Treasury notes shall be issued or reissued of denominations less than $10, and all such outstanding notes of a lower denomination shall, whenever received at the Treasury or redeemed, be canceled and notes of denominations of $10 or upward shall be substituted therefor. No silver certificates shall be hereafter issued of a higher denomination than $10, and all such outstanding certificates of a higher denomination shall, whenever received at the Treasury or redeemed, be retired and canceled and notes of denominations of $10 or less shall be substituted therefor.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any of the outstanding bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent per annum, payable February 1, 1904, and any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum, payable July 1, 1907, and any bonds of the United States, bearing interest at 3 per cent per annum, payable August 1, 1908, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, in denominations of $50 or any multiple thereof, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, such bonds to be payable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years from the date of their issue, and said bonds to be payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the present standard value, and to be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That such outstanding bonds may be received in exchange at a valuation not greater than their present worth to yield an income of 2½ per cent per annum; and in consideration of the reduction of interest effected, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay to the holders of the outstanding bonds surrendered for exchange, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum not greater than the difference between their present worth, computed as aforesaid, and their par value, and the payments to be made hereunder shall be held to be payments on account of the sinking fund created by section 3694 of the Revised Statutes: And provided further, That the 2 per cent bonds to be issued under the provisions of this act shall be issued at not less than par, and they shall be numbered consecutively in the order of their issue, and when payment is made the last numbers issued shall be first paid, and this order shall be followed until all the bonds are paid, and whenever any of the outstanding bonds are called for payment interest thereon shall cease three months after such call.

SEC. 7. That upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, by any national banking association, of any bonds of the United States in the manner provided by existing law, such association shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, equal in amount to the par value of the bonds so deposited; and any national banking association now having bonds on deposit for the security of circulating notes, and upon which an amount of circulating notes has been issued less than the par value of the bonds, shall be entitled, upon due application to the Comptroller of the Currency, to receive additional circulating notes in blank to an amount which will increase the circulating notes held by such association to the par value of the bonds deposited, such additional notes to be held and treated in the same way as circulating notes of national banking associations heretofore issued, and subject to all the provisions of existing law affecting such notes: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to modify or repeal the provisions of sections 5167 and 5171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to require additional deposits of bonds or of lawful money in case the market value of the bonds held to secure the circulating notes shall fall below the par value of the circulating notes outstanding for which such bonds may be deposited as security: And provided further, That the circulating notes furnished to national banking associations under the provisions of this act shall be of the denominations prescribed by law, except that no national banking association shall, after the passage of this act, be entitled to receive or to issue or reissue or place in circulation any circulating notes of a less denomination than $10: And provided further, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time of its capital stock actually paid in. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this section are hereby repealed.

SEC. 8. That every national banking association having on deposit, as provided by law, bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum to secure its circulating notes, shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States in the months of January and July a tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent each half year upon the average amount of such of its circulating notes as are based upon the deposit of said 2 per cent bonds, and such taxes shall be in lieu of existing taxes on its circulating notes imposed by section 5214 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

SEC. 10. That section 5138 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5138. No association shall be organized with a less capital than $100,000, except that banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants, and except that banks with a capital of not less than $25,000 may, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 4,000 inhabitants. No association shall be organized in a city the population of which exceeds 50,000 persons with a capital of less than $200,000."

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. My motion is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CHANDLER. Pending which motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THURSTON. Will the Senator yield to me for morning business?

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw his motion until the Hawaiian bill can be placed before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it seems to me it is not worth while at this late hour, after a somewhat tedious day, to undertake to determine now what business the Senate will proceed to take up to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. There is a full Senate present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the vote may now be taken on the question of proceeding to the consideration of the Hawaiian bill, the title of which has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PETTUS. If it be in order, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like, if I may be permitted, to say to the Senator from Alabama that there are a large number of post-office nominations, as to which requests have been made by many Senators that they be reported to-day.

Mr. PETTUS. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 16, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 15, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7739. An act to amend an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899.

H. R. 5288. An act relating to lights on steam pilot vessels.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMALL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 4006.

The bill (H. R. 4006) authorizing the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River was read, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. McRAE. I would like to know whether the bill has the approval of the War Department.

Mr. DALZELL. The bill is in the ordinary form of such bills; it has been approved by the Secretary of War and unanimously reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ANNUAL CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. BULL. I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to present a privileged report. I report back favorably the resolution which I send to the desk.

The following resolution (introduced by Mr. LOUDENSLAGER on the 5th instant) was read:

Resolved, That a clerk to the Committee on Pensions is hereby authorized, at an annual salary of $2,000, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until such salary is provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BULL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANT CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. BULL. I am also directed to present another privileged report. I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that there are several resolutions, for which the committee report a substitute. Does the gentleman wish to have the substitute read?

Mr. BULL. The report covers the whole ground. It is very brief. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolutions numbered 60, 63, 93, and 119, for the appointment of assistant clerks to the Committees on Public Lands, Claims, District of Columbia, and Rivers and Harbors, have considered the same, and beg leave to report as follows:

Your committee appointed a subcommittee to consider these and other propositions calling for additional clerical assistance to certain committees. They investigated carefully the work of the various committees, aided by oral and written evidence, and recommended to the full committee the allowance of assistant clerks to the committees above named, and an assistant clerk to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, at a salary of $100 per month each, during the sessions of the present Congress, in which recommendation your committee concurred.

The Committee on Claims was granted an assistant clerk in the last and many previous Congresses. That committee has jurisdiction of all civil and miscellaneous claims, and its work, which is voluminous, justifies the granting of the additional clerical help requested. The Committees on Public Lands, District of Columbia, Rivers and Harbors, and Merchant Marine and Fisheries have never had assistant clerks, but we think the work of those committees warrants the allowance at this time, and we therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution in lieu of resolutions numbered 60, 63, 93, and 119, namely:

Resolved, That an assistant clerk is hereby allowed to each of the following-named committees during the sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $100 per month, to wit: Public Lands, Claims, District of Columbia, Rivers and Harbors, and Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask whether the original resolutions have been returned?

Mr. BULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I caught correctly the reading of the report, this is a privileged resolution. I understand that the salaries of these clerks are to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. Is that correct?

Mr. BULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that that fact makes the resolution privileged, and therefore I can not object to its consideration. But I do protest against the adoption of this resolution. As I understand, it provides for the appointment of five additional assistant clerks to committees of this House—five different committees. Now, I do not understand that these committees, at least some of them, have heretofore had these clerks.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. During the last Congress the Committee on the District of Columbia was honored by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] as a member of that committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is always an honor to be associated with my friend.

Mr. BABCOCK. And we had an assistant clerk during the entire session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and the chairman of that committee had to pay the clerk $100 a month out of his own pocket during the entire session of that Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, after what the gentleman from Wisconsin has said, I will say I did not know that the gentleman had made that contribution to the public service during the last Congress.

I know that his committee considers quite a number of bills and does a great deal of work; but, Mr. Speaker, take the Committee on Claims. This resolution gives that committee an assistant clerk. Now, that committee may have and doubtless has a number of bills referred to it. But I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that nearly three months of this Congress have expired and that committee has not even asked consideration of a single, solitary bill on a Private Calendar day.

That committee and the Committee on War Claims are given Friday of each week. They have not even asked this House to consider bills from that committee. Of course, it is in the power of the majority of this House to multiply clerks. It seems they are doing it. I see the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations there, and he is not raising his voice against this increase in the clerical force.

Mr. GRAFF rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. GRAFF. I desire to state, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, that the Committee on Claims are ready at any time that they are permitted to do so to call up for consideration the claims which are on the Calendar.

In addition to that, I will say that that committee have been holding two meetings a week, commencing at 9 o'clock in the morning, and have been devoting themselves energetically to the performance of their duty, and they have attempted to give these claims actual consideration, and we desire to have them considered in the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have made no criticism of the committee, as to what they are doing.

Mr. GRAFF. And I desire to say further to the gentleman from Tennessee, that I have been compelled to employ an additional clerk, who has been actually engaged in docketing some 700 bills which are before that committee. Every day I receive communications from the members of the House, desiring to have the different bills assigned.

In addition to the assignment of these bills to the different subcommittees and the docketing of them, proofs of the bills which are to be considered have to be supplied, and that requires a gentleman who is competent to perform the task with some intelligence. This committee has always been granted an additional clerk, at least since the Fifty-fourth Congress, since my coming to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take issue with the gentleman further than to say that this is the first time that I have heard the chairman of that committee raise his voice in this House in behalf of claims of any kind.

The gentleman knows that, under the rules, every Friday is set apart for the consideration of bills from his committee, together with the Committee on War Claims. Friday after Friday has passed during this Congress, until nearly three months have gone, one-half of the session, and I have not heard that committee undertake to claim the Friday that is given them under the rules for the consideration of their measures.

Mr. OLMSTED rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am about through. I am not here to take care of the majority, if they are determined to increase the clerical force of the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If they are willing to add these extra officers, they have the power to do so. I simply want to say, with reference to these committees that have not had assistant clerks, that we do not think they ought to be given. Committees that have had them, committees that actually need them, ought to have them, and there will be no objection to it. Now, I do not care to take any further time.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will ask the gentleman if he does not know that, instead of providing an increase, this resolution, so far as the Committee on Claims is concerned, cuts down the salary which has usually been paid to the assistant clerk of that committee from $6 a day to $100 a month?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That may be true as to that committee; but then the gentleman must notice that the resolution gives additional clerks to other committees that have never had assistant clerks before.

Mr. OLMSTED. And in every instance the chairman of that committee has come before the Committee on Accounts and stated that owing to the increased business of his committee, he was obliged to pay for additional assistance out of his own pocket.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BULL] yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BULL. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, representing the minority upon the Committee on Accounts, I desire to say that I would not have agreed to the favorable report of this resolution if I did not believe it was a proper one.

Mr. Speaker, a great many propositions have been submitted to and considered by the Committee on Accounts, and we have carefully investigated them. The Committee on Accounts are simply desirous to give to the various committees of the House having charge of the business of the House, and to the chairmen of those committees, that assistance and aid in the way of clerical help that they absolutely need. We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that all of us have private secretaries to do our own work as members, except those who are chairmen of committees having annual or session clerks.

So it happens that all of the committees for which assistant clerks are provided in this resolution, and in the resolutions passed by the House on the other day, are committees that have a great deal of work to do, and the chairmen under the law not having any secretaries to do their work as individual members, have been compelled to pay out of their own pockets for the services of the secretaries, stenographers, or clerks to do their private work.

Now, much as I am in favor of economy in the expenditures of the public money, much as I believe that we should not extravagantly expend the public money, I for one stand here to say that the members of this House in the discharge of their public duty, whether they be Republicans or Democrats, whether the House is Republican or Democratic, are entitled to receive and shall receive at my hands so long as I am upon that committee just consideration and necessary assistance where it is required for the transaction of the public business.

And, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am not in favor of having a condition of affairs where the chairmen of important committees are to be mulct out of their private pockets by the payment of money to secretaries to do their work as individual members, simply because they are prominent enough and distinguished enough to be chairmen of these great committees.

We have investigated this matter very carefully. We appointed a subcommittee to investigate the question. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, stated to us that all last year and even now he has been paying money out of his own pocket to a secretary to assist him in his business as an individual Representative. Other gentlemen, chairmen of committees, have done the same thing, and this resolution gives to these chairmen additional committee clerks only when we believe it is necessary. It simply gives to the chairmen of the committees named a clerk each at a hundred dollars a month, the same as every other member of the House gets for clerk hire during the session of Congress.

So, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Accounts are unanimous in their decision that this resolution is right, and that it does not call for an unnecessary expenditure of the public money. They believe it is an expenditure in the interest of the public business, in the effective discharge of the duty of a Representative to the House and to his constituents, and it is an effort on the part of the Committee on Accounts to put those gentlemen who are chairmen of important committees upon an equality with other members.

Mr. SIMS. I agree with what the gentleman from Georgia says, but I want to ask him this question: Is there any use in providing facilities for a committee to report bills, if those bills are never to be considered in the House?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will answer the question of my friend. Now, Mr. Speaker, because there happens to be one committee upon this list that has not been able to secure a day for the consideration of its business in the House, I do not think it just that the chairman of that committee and other committees should be denied the clerical aid to which he is entitled. Speaking simply from information which I have obtained from the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF], I believe that the assistant clerk which is provided for in this resolution should be allowed. It is true that committee have not been able to secure a day in this House, because a majority of the members of the House have voted to adjourn on Friday, or have voted to take up other business, but that is no reason why an injustice should be done to the chairman of that committee.

The committee have gone on with this work; they have undertaken the discharge of the duty; they are doing it; and the chairman appeared before the committee and said that he had paid out of his own pocket money in order to discharge his duty as chairman of that committee, and therefore asked that he be given this additional clerk.

Mr. SIMS. If the work is worth nothing to the country, why do it? Why have a committee at all, if you are not going to insist upon the rights of the committee before this House?

Mr. BARTLETT. Why, Mr. Speaker, if we are to measure the work of a committee by what we think it is worth to the country, we will in many instances not allow them any clerks. I believe in a great many instances a great many bills are reported to this House which are injurious to the country. Some of the largest committees report bills which I think will do harm to the country; but for that reason I can not deny to the committee, as a member of the Committee on Accounts, the money to do the necessary clerical work of that committee or to furnish them the necessary clerical hire, especially when they have stated to us and demonstrated to us it is absolutely necessary to enable them, with fairness and with equality and with justice to themselves and with justice to this House, to discharge their duties. As a member I am ready to vote for this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. BULL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY]?

Mr. BULL. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for one committee of which I have the honor to be a member, and that is the Committee on Claims. As all of you may perhaps know, that is a committee that has a great deal of work to do. We have over 700 bills now before that committee. We have been meeting at 9 o'clock in the morning on Tuesday and 9 o'clock on Thursday and a subcommittee meeting on Monday at 9 o'clock, of which I am a member, and we need all the work and assistance that a clerk can give us. We are endeavoring to bring the claims to a conclusion and get them out of the way, either by having them adversely reported or favorably reported and disposed of, and without an assistant clerk to that committee it can not be done.

Mr. SIMS. Do you know why the chairman of the committee does not demand his rights here every Friday?

Mr. OTEY. I suppose the chairman has demanded his rights. I do not know of any reason why he should not do so. He desires to get rid of these bills as well for the House as the patrons of the bills, and we are doing all we can to accomplish it; and the little question of whether we shall have assistance to carry on this work is a mere bagatelle. We had better have two assistants and have the work done. From one session to another these bills are favorably reported or not reported, and they go on for twenty or twenty-five years. Some of these bills have been before the House for twenty-five years; and it is the duty of Congress to get rid of them, and not let them stand on the calendars ad infinitum.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee, I desire briefly to define my own position in regard to the resolution before the House. It has become the custom of gentlemen when they address the House to say that such and such a report is the unanimous report of the committee. In many instances, I suppose, that is of the members who were present. Gentlemen must know that I never favored a resolution of this character. I was not present when it was adopted, and I do not desire to betray any of the confidences of the committee; but I would like the attention of the House for a moment in order that they may understand what the committee has had to contend with. This question has been before the Committee on Accounts for something like six or eight weeks.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We can not hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. LOUD. This question, as I was saying, has been before the Committee on Accounts for six or eight weeks; in fact, ever since Congress has met. We have adopted resolution after resolution. I think I betray no confidence of the committee in stating that, because it is a fact, some time ago the committee adopted a resolution to give all committees that had an annual clerk an additional clerk at $100 a month.

Now, I stated at that time, and I may as well do the same here, that, so far as the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is concerned, which is one of those committees, I do not need and do not ask for any clerk. I would even be willing and would urge that every committee of this House having an annual clerk have a clerk to the chairman of the committee. The committee hardly thought that was fair, and they included them all. The resolution came back and was reconsidered, and reconsidered, and reconsidered. We have since then been acting on this matter piecemeal. There are chairmen of committees in this House who are too modest to come here and ask for assistance, and the result is favoritism.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. LOUD. I will.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why can not the whole difficulty be remedied by bringing in here a resolution providing that the same clerk hire shall be allowed to all gentlemen who are members of committees during the session of Congress that is now allowed to them who are not chairmen?

Mr. LOUD. The difficulty about that is this: The committee determined on that course at one time, and we reconsidered that action and then came back and took the matter up by piecemeal and gave the Military Committee, the Naval Committee, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Judiciary Committee, and, I think, perhaps some others who were particularly urgent, clerks at $6 a day. They have taken so many out of the list for important committees of this House and given them clerks at $6 a day that it has complicated the matter, and unless you repeal the action you have taken the time has gone by for any reconsideration——

Mr. SHERMAN. Could you not except those instances?

Mr. LOUD. It is not an act of justice, permit me to say. From my experience in this House, extending over a few years, and association on several committees, I do not believe there is a committee in this House having a competent man as its clerk but what can get along with one clerk. The trouble is, Mr. Speaker, that incompetent men are appointed as clerks of committees. Now, there is a proposition contained in this resolution for a stenographer for the Committee on Invalid Pensions, because they have not got a stenographer. In the year 1900, a committee in the House of Representatives having two or three clerks and have not got a stenographer! Why, stenographers are the cheapest article in the market to-day. You can get stenographers at $50 and $60 a month. Let it be known that you want one and you will have 500 here in an hour.

Now, because the chairmen of committees propose to appoint John Smith or Thomas Jones as clerks of committee, incompetent to perform the work, they come to Congress and seek relief. Here is the Committee on Claims, and let us see what injustice is being done. While I believe this is doing well enough for the Committee on Claims, let me say that after having served on that committee four years, there is not a committee in this House, excepting none, that has the same work to do that this Committee on Claims has, and yet you give to the other committees assistant clerks at $6 a day and break through the custom which has existed here for years. And you say to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, "You can have a clerk at $100 a month," and because some one else is more persistent he shall have a clerk at $6 a day. As a rule the clerk of chairman receiving $100 a month during the recess is turned over to a six-dollar-a-day clerkship during the session of the House. This question is going to aggravate you until you settle it. We have got to the point now where you have given clerks to all standing committees having annual clerks, except three, four, or five, and you may just as well take this matter up now and dispose of it as to come in here by piecemeal and give clerks at $6 a day.

Mr. BULL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, we all know the reputation of my distinguished friend from California [Mr. LOUD] for economy, but it seems to me that, in the language of a popular minstrel song of the day, "he hasn't got his habits on" this morning. He opposes this resolution which proposes a session clerk for the 5 committees named at $100 a month, and he opposes it because we do not give clerks to the chairmen of 21 committees instead of 5. Indeed, my distinguished friend advocated giving to the chairman of each committee having annual or session clerks $100 per month for his own clerk hire during the sessions of the House. Now, there are 21 committees having annual clerks by law, and 17 committees having session clerks by law, so that my friend favored appointing 38 additional clerks at one fell swoop, and now opposes the granting of 5.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is neither truthful nor fair.

Mr. OLMSTED. I appreciate the extreme politeness of the gentleman's remark, coming from an old and distinguished member of the House. I would not have referred to what occurred in the committee if the gentleman had not already done so. I say upon my word that he did vote in favor of a resolution giving the chairman of each committee which had an annual or session clerk additional clerk hire at $100 per month during the session, making 38 in all——

Mr. LOUD. That is not true.

Mr. OLMSTED. When upon my motion that resolution had been reconsidered and defeated, the gentleman from California made the motion——

Mr. LOUD. I made a motion that the committees having annual clerks should have assistant clerks, but that applied only to 21 committees.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. This discussion is out of order. Gentlemen will proceed without disclosing the work of the committee.

Mr. OLMSTED. Let us see how unfair this would be. The Committee on Elections No. 1 has a $2,000 annual clerk. It would give that chairman an additional clerk at $100 a month during the session. How would that work as between Elections Committee No. 1 and the Committees 2 and 3, which have no annual clerk at all? The Committee on Elections No. 1 would have practically $3,200 a year for clerk hire, while the Committees Nos. 2 and 3 would have nothing. We thought—and I am proud that I was largely responsible for the defeat of the other measure—we thought it wise to take up each committee and judge of it upon its merits; so we have recommended that these 5 committees—not the whole 21 committees—be allowed each an additional clerk, at the rate not of $6 a day, but of $100 a month.

Now, the chairman of each of these committees has, under the law, while Congress is not in session, an allowance of $100 per month for clerk hire. They receive this allowance while Congress is not in session the same as members who are not chairmen of committees; so that if this resolution be adopted, each of these chairmen of these 5 committees will have, during the session of Congress, his regular allowance of $100 a month for clerk hire besides the assistance of a $2,000 clerk allowed to the committee. We thought that the $2,000 clerk now allowed by law ought to be able to do the work of the committee and that the chairman as a member of the House could get along with his allowance of $1,200 a year the same as other members. So, in the interest of economy—in the interest of the taxpayers—we recommended the adoption of the resolution reported in place of a more sweeping one granting a larger number of clerks.

The question being taken, the resolution reported by the committee was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the original resolutions for which the resolution just adopted was reported as a substitute will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. BULL. I have one more report to make. I have been directed to report back favorably the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions be authorized to appoint a stenographer for said committee, whose salary shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House and shall not exceed $100 per month.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island yield to allow the amendment to be offered?

Mr. BULL. Yes, sir.

The amendment sent to the desk by Mr. SULLOWAY was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "$100 a month" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "at $6 per day."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to say——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire only a minute.

Mr. BULL. I desire first to yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire, if he desires to be heard in support of his amendment.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I desire to say in behalf of this amendment that the resolution now pending was introduced, I think, nearly five weeks ago. At that time the committee were hopeful that they could secure a competent stenographer for $100 a month; but, developing under the Darwinian process, we have found, during these four or five weeks, that it will be absolutely impossible to secure for this amount of money a man competent for this business—familiar with the medical dictionary. In asking for a stenographer at $6 a day we are not asking any expenditure in behalf of this committee beyond what has heretofore been allowed. In the Fifty-second Congress there were two assistant clerks at $6 per day; we have but one. In the Fifty-third Congress there were two assistant clerks at $6 per day; we have but one. In the Fifty-fourth Congress there were three assistant clerks at $6 a day; we have but one. If $6 a day be allowed us to enable us to obtain a competent stenographer, we shall have a clerk and what might be termed two assistant clerks; and if you gentlemen who have bills pending in our committee, where there are 3,000 to-day, a thousand of which it has been impossible for the clerk, up to this time, to docket—if you want your bills considered and reported, then we must have this stenographer. That is all I have to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to rise in opposition to any of these recommendations of the Committee on Accounts. But I now rise for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that this committee is now asking something that no other committee has ever asked for or had.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. We have had stenographers, and we have had additional assistant clerks.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand you have now a clerk and an assistant clerk.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And you have a special man deputized from the Pension Office——

Mr. SULLOWAY. Which this committee has always had.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Thus there are now three clerks for that committee. Now, I say that when the Committee on Invalid Pensions come to this House and ask in addition a stenographer they are asking what the House has never authorized before.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would not undertake to put my recollection against that of the gentleman on a matter of this kind; but I have no recollection that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has ever had a stenographer.

There is only one other point to which I wish to call attention. Gentlemen on the other side have the right to make these increases if they want to do so; they have the power. I am opposed to giving this committee a stenographer, because they already have three clerks, and I also oppose increasing the pay, as recommended by the committee, from $100 a month to $6 a day. I believe that $100 a month will secure an efficient stenographer for that committee, if it is necessary to have one. Therefore I shall vote against both propositions, and most earnestly against the amendment increasing the amount of the proposed salary to $6 a day.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Does the gentleman know of a competent stenographer familiar with medical phrases who can be employed for less that $1,600?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I take it that the member of the committee who may be dictating to the stenographer will furnish to him such information about medical terms as he may require. Of course the member must himself have the necessary acquaintance with such terms; he can not expect to depend upon his stenographer for information of that kind.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY], the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] for a question?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Certainly.

Mr. DINSMORE. Is the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions a stenographer?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No, sir; he is not.

Mr. DINSMORE. Is the assistant clerk a stenographer?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No, sir.

Mr. DINSMORE. Neither one nor the other?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Neither of them.

Mr. DINSMORE. Could not all this be obviated by having one or the other of those clerks a practical stenographer?

Mr. SULLOWAY. No, sir; it is a physical impossibility for any two men, no matter who selects them or where they come from, to do the work in that committee, and have these bills examined, docketed, and cross-docketed.

In the first place, you can not docket a bill that comes from the Senate in less than fifteen minutes. Here are 3,000 bills, and we had no clerk up to the 1st of January. When he got here there were 2,000 bills piled up in the room for him to assort, separate, docket, and get ready so that when any gentleman in the House came down there and looked for his bill he could find it and tell him where it was. The work never was done by two men and never can be.

Mr. DINSMORE. I should like to ask the gentleman if it does not add to the efficiency of any clerk or any assistant clerk of any committee to be a stenographer?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I dare say it might.

Mr. DINSMORE. Then, may I ask, in the interest of the business of the House, not with any purpose to interfere with the affairs of the committee of which the gentleman is the able chairman, if it would not be in the interest of the business of the House to have stenographers appointed as clerk and assistant clerk instead of the people who are there.

Mr. SULLOWAY. It would not be a disadvantage, but in this particular case I do not see that it would be an advantage. The work of the clerk is different from the work of the stenographer employed in that committee room. There is a special examiner that goes through all of this evidence which is filed in these different cases and makes a condensed statement of the facts——

Mr. DINSMORE. And I believe a man is detailed from the Department to do that.

Mr. SULLOWAY. This special examiner has to go through this evidence and dictate a brief statement of it to this stenographer, and that forms a great portion of the work which a stenographer has to do.

Mr. SIMS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions a question for information only.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions if the business before that committee is increasing?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I think it is as large or will be as large as in any previous Congress. There is every reason in the world why it should be.

Mr. SIMS. There is no decrease?

Mr. SULLOWAY. As long as there are old soldiers to-day who are shivering with cold and gaunt with hunger and not on the pension rolls there is no reason why they should not come to our committee.

Mr. SIMS. There is no decrease as I understand it?

Mr. SULLOWAY. I hope not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is to increase the compensation to $6 a day, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. This is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire to the report of the Committee on Accounts.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that in the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 112, noes 44.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution as amended, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BULL. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand the situation, the resolution, if passed now as amended, provides for $6 a day instead of the recommendation of the Committee on Accounts, for $100 a month.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct in his understanding of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want gentlemen to understand it.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution as amended, on a division there were—ayes 113, noes 45.

Mr. TALBERT. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The point is made by the gentleman from South Carolina that there is no quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the gentleman did not make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. TALBERT. I meant that by implication, and I now make the point that there is no quorum present, if that will satisfy the gentleman any better.

The SPEAKER, having counted the House, announced 197 members, a quorum, present.

Accordingly, the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 7572) extending in the district of Alaska the placer-mining laws to lands reserved from sale in sections 1 and 10 of an act of Congress approved May 14, 1898, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 7572. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 10. Joint resolution providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of House Document No. 141, relating to the preliminary examination of reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado; and

Senate concurrent resolution 19:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 20,000 copies of the message of the President transmitting the treaty of peace with Spain and the accompanying documents, in one volume, of which 13,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 7,000 copies for the use of the Senate.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. R. 10. Joint resolution providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of House Document No. 141, relating to the preliminary examination of reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado—to the Committee on Printing.

Senate concurrent resolution 19:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 20,000 copies of the message of the President transmitting the treaty of peace with Spain and the accompanying documents, in one volume, of which 13,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 7,000 copies for the use of the Senate—to the Committee on Printing.

S. 68. An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing western branches of the Kansas Agricultural College and of the Kansas State Normal School thereon, and for a public park—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 41. An act to authorize the President to place Andrew Geddes on the retired list with the rank of captain—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, for four days, on account of important business.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

And then, on motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8317) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] is recognized.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Massachusetts sits down, will he, as a member of the committee, answer me a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I am not on the subcommittee which has in charge this particular bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I merely want to ask the gentleman if in this bill provision is made for the payment of salaries due to members who have died during this Congress?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am informed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] who is in charge of this bill that that subject properly belongs to the deficiency bill and is not, therefore, upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the fact that an equal distribution of the time between the two sides would leave seventy-eight minutes to the Republican side and thirty-two minutes to the Democratic side, considering the time that was used on yesterday.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] yields to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] forty-five minutes.

[Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a moment, if the gentleman from Alabama please. How much time would my colleague like—thirty minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has but three minutes remaining.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. There are others who want to speak, and I will not take further time. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-two minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thought I had thirty-eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire the gentleman from Alabama to occupy that entire time?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to him such time as he wants.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I introduced a resolution in favor of the repeal of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I do not know what fate that resolution may meet with in the committee to which it is referred; nor do I know that there ever will be an opportunity in this Congress to discuss that resolution directly on the floor of this House. I therefore take advantage of this opportunity to give some reasons why I believe the time has come when it is not only right, but expedient that the people of the United States should seriously, without partisan prejudice or political strife, consider this great question of limitations or the rights of limitations of the franchise in the United States.

In his Farewell Address to the people of the United States George Washington, in speaking of our Government, said: "Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty."

In a republic the keystone in the arch of government, above all other questions, must be a love of liberty by the citizens of the Republic, and the mental capacity and desire to discriminate between "true liberty" and personal license; for if the latter is allowed to go uncontrolled it must result in the subversion of the rights and liberties of others.

To the people of the United States belong the sovereign power to make and control the fundamental principles of government, and first among these must always stand the power to regulate and control the suffrage.

We therefore must face the problem as to how we can best grant the privilege of the ballot to those who will understand and uphold liberty in its truest and highest sense, together with the other great principles of government, and at the same time allow to the citizen the fullest share of civil liberty and freedom of action that can be given without danger to the Republic.

The only true guide that we can use in determining how to solve this vexed and difficult question is that which is the best for the greatest number of people, and we must not be misled by our sympathies and prejudices for individual or particular classes. We must never forget that the duty of preserving civil liberty in this country is intrusted to the people as a sacred heritage from our Revolutionary forefathers, and the ballot is the weapon by which it must be preserved if properly exercised, for if subverted it will become the tool of base, ignorant, or unscrupulous men, by which the liberties of the people will be finally overthrown.

It has been said "that the right of suffrage is at the foundation of our Government; that it is the moving power and first principle that puts it in motion, and sustains, operates, and gives it direction in all its parts."

It is evident that when the power of the ballot is given to unfit or unscrupulous men it will in the end corrupt both the voters and the officeholders, and produce bad laws, dishonest legislation, a corrupt judiciary, and tyrannical executive officers. It will corrupt the people because it gives greater opportunity for bad men to succeed by dishonest methods, and a greater temptation and opportunity to resort to them; and it will produce corruption because honest men will abhor the means necessary to attain success and leave those men who do not scruple as to the methods to be employed in sole possession of the political field.

On the other hand, if the privilege of the ballot is only granted to those who act from patriotic motives, with honesty and intelligence, it elevates the right of the franchise, it makes it a privilege that every good citizen will guard with care, political power will emanate from a pure and uncorruptible source, dishonest men will not dare to enter into the contest for office, and the principles of liberty and good government will become perpetuated in our political institution.

Whenever an effort is made to elevate the right of franchise or to disqualify unfit persons from the right of the ballot, the demagogue and time server is sure to at once assail you with the often misapplied and misquoted maxim "that all men are born free and equal." So they are in some respects. All men are entitled to equal freedom of action and thought; all men are entitled to stand on an equality before the law, and all men are entitled to equal protection from the Government. But it can not be contended that one who is being consumed by a hereditary disease is the physical equal of the robust young man who has never known sickness, nor can one who has been ushered into this life an idiot be said to stand the intellectual equal of the great, liberal, and just statesman who wrote the Declaration of Independence. If Jefferson had believed that all men were his mental, moral, and intellectual equals, he would have returned home and freed his slaves, and insisted that the privilege and duties of government be put in their hands; but he did not do so.

As a matter of fact, nowhere are men endowed with equal political rights to-day. Some men are exempt from jury duty, working the public roads, and serving their country as soldiers. An educational qualification is required for one to practice medicine; only those learned in the law are allowed to hold judicial positions; men are excluded from the exercise of the elective franchise on account of moral qualifications, and in most of the States women, no matter what may be their intellectual qualifications, are denied the right to vote on account of their sex; and throughout all the Union men are denied the right of the ballot until they are 21 years of age, in order to secure, to a certain extent, a constituency of matured intelligence.

When the question is raised as to who should be entitled to exercise the right of suffrage, the public safety should be the governing test. It should not be sufficient to say that a man may in time, or his descendants may ultimately, acquire sufficient intelligence and moral character to authorize them to take part in the government of the State; but the question is, Do they possess now those qualifications that justly entitle them to exercise the power of government, and can they safely be intrusted with the high privilege of governing themselves and their neighbors?

I contend that no greater crime can be committed against the people—yes, against the Government itself—than to prematurely thrust the powers of government upon a people who are morally and intellectually disqualified to exercise this high privilege. It is incompatible with the public good and has a tendency to weaken and destroy the Constitution.

I do not believe that any gentleman on this floor will controvert the proposition that the public good must determine what qualifications must be placed on the right of suffrage, and that any limitation that is placed on this right for the benefit of good government is not an abridgment of the liberties of the citizen.

With these principles to guide us, let us take up the question of suffrage as it is affected by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It reads as follows:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

In Ex parte Yarborough (110 U. S., page 665) the Supreme Court says:

> This new constitutional right was mainly designed for citizens of African descent.

As construed by this and other decisions of the Supreme Court, the negro race is given a privilege under the Constitution that is not accorded to citizens of other nationalities. You can exclude the Mongolian, the Indian, or the white man on account of his race, but you can not exclude the black man. The Indian and the Chinese are to-day excluded from the right of suffrage in some of the States, regardless of the personal qualifications of the individual citizen. This being the case, is it just to the great body of American voters to insist that the fundamental law of the land shall grant this protection to one class of our citizens when it is not granted to other races better qualified to exercise the right of the ballot.

On the 13th day of March, 1870, when the fifteenth amendment was adopted, the country had just emerged from a bloody civil war; the South was crushed by defeat and devastated by war; the North was triumphant and flushed with the success of victory; the Southern States were about to take their place once more in the councils of the nation; and it is probable that the politicians of the North feared that if political power was placed in the hands of their late foe the contentions of war might be revived and renewed, and for this reason they desired to confer the right of suffrage on a class of people whom they believed they could control and direct.

The unwisdom of their actions, viewed in the light of the past, must be apparent to all fair-thinking men, when we know that the people of the South under no terms and conditions would return to or countenance slavery in this country or any of its dependencies; when we have seen the soldier of the South fighting in the same battle line with the soldier of the North for the honor of our common country and the glory of the flag of the nation.

You have tried the experiment for thirty years, and it has failed. Instead of its becoming a source of strength to the Republican party, it has proved to be a badge of weakness. You can not by your laws contravene the laws of God. The Almighty, in His divine wisdom, has made some frail and others strong, some races weak and others great and powerful.

Ever since the day when the Aryan (or white) race came down from the Caucasian Mountains and overran Europe, though they were barbarians, no other race of people have been able to stand against them. They acquired the civilization of those they conquered, but retained the power to rule. They embraced the Christian religion and carried the banner of the cross to Palestine at the point of their swords. They have dared the dangers of an unknown ocean and cleared the path of civilization through the trackless forests of America. They are the only race who have ever known the art of self-government and who have been able to maintain the liberty of the individual citizen. In this country, whether their ancestors landed with the Pilgrim fathers at Plymouth Rock or with the Cavaliers at Jamestown, the same blood flows through their veins. They have never bowed to the domination of an inferior race and never will; and the man who seeks to make them subservient to an inferior race is not only a traitor to his own blood, but is foreordained to failure by a law of nature that the legislation of man is powerless to change.

Nothing but reckless brutality will array the weaker race against the stronger, for in the end the weaker must give away. Instead of the helping hand he should receive from the stronger toward his intellectual and moral development, it forces a strife that can only result in the further degradation of the weaker race.

In many of the Southern States immediately after the war the negro was in absolute political control. What was the result? Government became a farce; bribery stalked in the legislative halls; justice was purchased at a price, and corruption held the reins of power; the rights of property became insecure; life was endangered every hour, and anarchy reigned, clothed in the robes of ignorance.

In my State in four years a debt of twenty millions was created; negro legislators were bought and sold at the price of a suit of clothes; and the women dared not walk the streets in broad daylight without armed protection. Men of the North, would you submit to such a condition, would you have abandoned your homes and your property, or would you have snatched the brand from the burning, the government of your State from dishonor, at whatever the cost? As long as this condition remains do you expect to see anything but the solid South? Can you expect any political question to become more dominant than the right of self-preservation?

After thirty years the great bulk of the negro population of the South is no further advanced than it was when the fifteenth amendment was passed, and yet it is not because they have not had the opportunity. In the State of Alabama they do not pay 5 per cent of the taxes, and yet they have their own schools, their own teachers, and receive an equal share of the school money in proportion to population. There is not a State in the Union where the negro has a better or fairer opportunity to work at any trade or employment he may desire under the protection of the law than in Alabama.

As a race he has not advanced morally or intellectually because he has been forced prematurely into political contests with the superior white race. I do not believe the negro race can ever become the equal of the white race, because the Creator of the universe did not so intend it, but he can develop under the protection and guidance of his white neighbor to a point where he will reach a proper understanding of the rules of government and good morals, when he will respect good government and know that liberty does not mean license.

But this can only come by removing the continued political contests that now exist and by making the right of suffrage a high privilege to be attained by him, rather than a useless right that is not valued or understood.

Some may say you can accomplish this fully by an educational qualification, but I say that you can not accomplish the result in this way in the South. I have known many young negroes in the South who could read and write as a parrot can talk who had no conception of the rights of others or the necessity of good government and probably never will have. On the other hand, I have known honest, law-abiding, property-holding white men, who have not had the benefits of an education and could not read and write, who understood the theory of our Government as well as you or I, whose votes are absolutely above any price, and who are far more capable of exercising the right of suffrage than many men who have had an education.

There can be no doubt that the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution is a mistake. It has failed in its object, and it can not advance the material and moral development of the negro race. On the contrary, it has a tendency to array one race against the other, and, as I have already stated, a conflict must inevitably result in injury to both races.

Let us then face the question fairly and honestly; let us repeal the fifteenth amendment and allow the States the untrammeled privilege of regulating the suffrage without conflict with the Federal Government. The tendency in all free governments is always toward an enlargement of the franchise, and it can be depended upon that the sovereign power of the States, vested in the people, will never deprive any man of this high privilege in whose hands it can be intrusted without endangering the Government and the true principles of liberty.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CANNON). As no one addresses the Chair——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr, Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to extend the debate until 4 o'clock, thirty minutes to be used on this side and thirty minutes on the other side.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know of anyone who wants to use any time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend general debate until 4 o'clock.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. One-half of the time to be given to this side and one-half to the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the better way is to let the committee rise, because the House has made an order that debate shall close at 3 o'clock.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. HEPBURN, the Speaker pro tempore, resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that general debate be continued until 4 o'clock, one half to be under the control of the gentleman from Indiana and the other half to be controlled by this side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the general debate be extended until 4 o'clock, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana and the other half by the gentleman from Georgia. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS].

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the question of our new possessions is higher than a party question. It ought not to be a party question. In matters of fundamental policy, where the true doctrines of Americanism have been called up in our hearts, we have always forgotten that we had ever been partisans, and remembered only that we were patriots. Mr. Chairman, I am proud that I was a member of this House when, with magnificent unanimity, we voted for a declaration of American principles and to perpetuate those principles among the suffering people of the island of Cuba without fear of the result or hope of reward. Mr. Chairman, that was a glorious day in American history. I want to read again that resolution:

First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into active service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise authority, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

What a magnificent spectacle, a strong nation stretching forth its arm to protect and not to subjugate the weak. It was a magnanimous people who in the name of liberty proclaimed to the world that their brothers should be free at whatever cost and without benefits of any kind to accrue in return. Our hearts were afire with a patriotic glow, and as we returned to our homes the streets were bedecked with flags and we listened to the plaudits of the multitudes. The press, without regard to politics, applauded our act. We were Americans. We had inherited from our sires the spirit of '76. We remembered the deeds of our fathers in far-off New England and in the sunny South. The words of the Declaration of Independence were to our minds as though they had been written but the day before. All men were equal under the law; all men were, and of right ought to be, free.

We poured out our treasure of blood and gold, and the Stars and Stripes carried freedom with them wherever they floated. The cause of freedom met with not a single reverse. The boys in blue performed deeds of valor and heroism which gained for the American Army the admiration of the entire civilized world. That was true Americanism. There was no Republicanism in it, there was no Populism in it, there was no Democracy in it. It was a question which shook to the very foundation the American Republic, and I do not believe that there was then a single traitor at heart to be found in all America.

The war was fought, and at its conclusion we found ourselves bound to carry out the purposes of this resolution and provide for Cuba an independent government. We found that we had also freed, in freeing the Cubans, the other colonists of Spain. The colonies of Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands were ceded to us to do as we pleased with. Americanism had commanded of us, with respect to Cuba, that we spend millions of money and thousands of valuable lives in order to give them an independent govment. The war was successful beyond our dreams. In addition to being able to confer this boon of independence upon the island of Cuba, we were able also to confer it upon Puerto Rico and the Philippines. We had not only carried the flag of freedom across the narrow channel which divides Florida from the Pearl of the Antilles, but we had carried it 7,000 miles across the Pacific and claimed for liberty a part of the Orient where liberty had never before been known.

Mr. Chairman, this war was not fought as a business investment in order that we might make money. This war was not fought in order that we might subjugate other lands. This war was fought and America expended blood and gold in order to make other people independent and free, as we are independent and free. But, Mr. Chairman, instead of the flag we must not raise the standard of the dollar, and hold the dollar so close to the eyes that it hides the flag from view.

Have we heard upon the floor of this House any discussion as to what would better the conditions of the people of Puerto Rico or serve to enable them to establish their independence? Has anyone intimated that this bill will enable the Filipinos to form a stable and independent government? Not one word, Mr. Chairman. It is all reduced to a cold, mathematical calculation. We bought the islands of the Philippine Archipelago and paid $20,000,000 for the privilege of establishing an independent government. We paid two dollars and a half a head for men who, under our Declaration of Independence and our American system, are as much entitled to independence as we are. Shall we shoot down and kill all of the men who object to being sold to the United States for two dollars and a half?

Mr. Chairman, we hear the wails of the people from Puerto Rico. They tell us what they need in order to make them self-supporting and happy. They tell us from what financial disease they are suffering. Shall we arise to the emergency of the occasion and give them the remedy? It is a question with the House, What is the humane thing to do? It is what is best for Puerto Rico, and not what will bring the most money into the Treasury of the United States.

We hear the opinion plainly expressed that Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines will be parceled out for the benefit of individual Americans. This must not be so. As a result of the grand war for humanity, I protest against even the expression of such an opinion. If subsequent events prove the assertion to be true, it will cause the blush of shame to mantle the cheek of every true American. I make no charges, because I still hope that patriotism, which I know is not dead in any man upon this floor, will triumph. We are still Americans, but different interests incline and warp the judgment of some. The islands are wealthy, and this fact has aroused greed and avarice. Greed and avarice should never be allowed to have a place in the dictation of national legislation.

The principle upon which the American Government is founded is stated in the Declaration of Independence in the following language:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

The Declaration proceeds to enumerate the grievances against the Crown of Great Britain. The principal ones of these are that King George kept an army in the United Colonies in times of peace and that the colonies were taxed without representation. Has there ever been a consent by the people of Puerto Rico or the people of the Philippines to a government by the United States? Are we not maintaining military authority in Puerto Rico in time of peace? Is not this very provision a taxation for the benefit of the United States of the people of Puerto Rico without in any way granting them a representation? Not a word in the entire Declaration of Independence must apply to us in our treatment of the people of Puerto Pico, Cuba, or the Philippines.

The colonies had ample cause for rebellion. Every American is proud of the fact that his forefathers did rebel and that liberty was established upon the Western Hemisphere. That spirit of the equality of men and the rights of the governed to their own self-government, the spirit of liberty, breathed through every word of the declaration of war with Spain. The war of the Revolution and the war with Spain were fought upon the fundamental American principles. And now it is advocated upon the floor of this House that we abandon the American principle in our treatment of these peoples and adopt the principle Great Britain applied to us when we were her colonists. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the gentlemen in this House will pause and deliberate before they so act. There is not one of us who, if he can cast aside all consideration of money and look at this question not from a partisan but from an American standpoint, will deny these people their liberty and will vote to give these people either admission upon terms of equality or independence in the matter of their own government.

I want to read to this House a paragraph from the Farewell Address of President George Washington:

> The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your National Union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety, discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

It is a national maxim: "United we stand; divided we fall."

Mr. Chairman, President McKinley is reported to have said in a speech at Pittsburg that Puerto Rico and the Philippines were as much ours as Louisiana or Texas. Granting this to be true as against Spain, the United States could not under the Constitution sell either Louisiana or Texas by a treaty. They could not sell Puerto Rico or the Philippines. The nations of Europe deal in islands; they buy them, they sell them, and they trade them. Under the peculiar form of government we have in the United States this Government can not go into business as a real-estate speculator with a view to profit and loss. This Government is a chain of States, and it is only as strong as is the weakest link. For us to have a republican government on the continent, a despotic sultanship in the island of Sulu, a military government in Puerto Rico, a protectorate in Cuba, an aristocracy in Alaska, and possibly a monarchy in Hawaii is to entirely destroy the foundation of the Union, and it will be impossible for us to hold these discordant elements together.

I do not wish to be severe in my criticism of those who do not agree with me, but I warn them that this new policy will disrupt the Union and make the words of Lincoln in his first inaugural address apply nearly as strongly to-day as they did when spoken:

> We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

We have been termed by the press expansionists and anti-expansionists. The terms are misnomers. No one would call it expansion to add these little bits of islands scattered thousands of miles apart, the aggregate of which would not result in as much expansion as did the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the controversy concerning what is known as "No Man's Land." That decision expanded this country more than these conquests did. There was never anything said or thought about this decision. There was more expansion in No Man's Land because there was more room for expansion. It is impossible for the United States to expand in Puerto Rico, because the island is over populated now, as are the islands of the Philippine Archipelago, and in both instances there is no room for expansion, but only room for contraction.

There are no anti-expansionists in the United States. The United States have expanded in territory, wealth, and population more rapidly than any other country in the world. The settled policy of the United States has been to add contiguous territory as rapidly as such territory can be assimilated into the Union. No one is trying to overturn this wise policy. The State of Texas alone has enough unoccupied land to supply our needs for many years to come. When all of the States of our Union have become so developed that new lands are necessary the opportunity will arise, as opportunities have arisen in the past, for us to still further extend our boundaries. We want the Stars and Stripes to float over none but freemen. We want America for Americans. We don't want Americans that can not be Americanized. We want to exert our great strength in bestowing the blessings of freedom upon the people of other lands and to encourage the cause of liberty throughout the world. We have been a world-power for good ever since the Declaration of Independence was signed, and we want to continue to be a world-power for good until the end of time. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I hope that we will deliberate upon this bill as Americans, and not as partisans. I hope we will carry out the spirit of the Declaration of Independence and of the resolutions declaring war with Spain. Let us not lessen the dignity which we now have in the eyes of the world on account of our noble war for the sake of humanity by a party squabble as to how to make the most of the spoils of the conquest. I want to deal with this question under the broad principles expounded by the Declaration of Independence and perpetuated by the stars and stripes of the American flag. I do not want to wave the dollars. I want to wave the principles. I do not care whether the Philippines were worth $20,000,000 or nothing at all. If, with the expenditure of $20,000,000 or any other sum, we can carry out the principles of our just and glorious war and enable struggling people to be free, I will consider it money well spent; but to try to make a profit out of the liberties of our brethren in any part of the world is beneath the character of the American people. [Applause.]

We have no internal dissensions. The flag is revered by all. The South and North stand together, guarding the sacred charge of national peace and unity. This wonderful Republic of ours, unparalleled in its onward and upward career, has expanded from 13 States, with a population of 3,000,000, to a gigantic power of 45 States, with a population of 80,000,000. Let the blood of the heroes of the Revolution, of the war of 1812, of 1861, and of the Spanish war incite in all Americans the true spirit of the founders. Let us read anew the Constitution and the famous Declaration of Independence, and not forget the patriotic devotion which led these men to the field of mortal conflict, and emulate the spirit of self-sacrifice which animated these heroes to the strife for perpetuity of the Republic. We should always bear in mind the terse and significant saying of Jefferson: "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." It is a price which must be paid or liberty must be lost, substantially at first and formally at last. Liberty flourishes not like the weeds in the field, without labor or attention, but like the useful grain, which requires painstaking culture to maintain its life and perishes by neglect.

The new problems now upon us call for a wise and speedy solution. Casting away the bonds of mere partisan feeling and prejudice, let us apply ourselves to the task of working them out for the highest interests of our country. The nation's heroes died for it. Let us accept their legacy of honor and live for it. Let us not neglect our means of salvation. We have these at our command; the destiny of the nation is in our hands. The world is waiting the issue of their final decision.

We have a weapon firmer set
And better than the bayonet;
A weapon that comes down as still
As snowflakes fall upon the sod;
But executes a freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God.

If we employ it against the powers of evil, we can make our nation the joy of all the earth; and in every latitude and clime, whether at home or in distant lands, it will be the highest boast of every man, "I am an American citizen." [Applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHOWALTER].

Mr. SHOWALTER. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this appropriation, and, believing that there is no doubt of its passage, I will, under the rule prevailing in the House, devote my time to the consideration of another subject.

Mr. Chairman, in the summer of 1898 I was invited to make an address at a presentation of the flag, by the young ladies of my town, to the public school. I said in part: "I congratulate the young ladies upon the result of their labors. They have wrought a beautiful work. I congratulate them because of the patriotic spirit that prompted them to this service. It is the same spirit as exhibited by their mothers in earlier days, a spirit of devotion and love of country, and why not? For who has sacrificed more for the dear old flag than the mothers, wives, and sisters of our land? For it they poured out their heart's richest treasures: for it in silence and alone they endured untold anguish for loved ones battling that it might float in freedom's air. For it they have suffered, for it they have trained their sons to die if necessary in its defense. All honor to the noble women of America for their devotion to the flag of their country. That flag represents the hopes and aspirations of millions of our race. It is the emblem of freedom. It represents more to-day than ever before in its history. Under its beneficent folds has recently been fought to a successful issue the most holy war ever waged—a war for humanity. Under its shining stars the immortal Dewey and his brave sailors won the greatest naval battle ever fought and placed the flag of their country and the American eagle in the far distant Orient—there, let us trust, to remain forever.

"I for one am in favor of keeping what we have conquered, and never returning to the blighting, damning rule of Spain one foot of land wrested from her by the courage, the valor, and the blood of American heroes. When we declared war we deliberately declared to the world that we did not desire any new territory, and we meant it. But a power higher, greater, than the American Congress ordained otherwise. Without intent upon our part, we have been irresistibly swept, as by an avalanche, into a position from which we can not in honor recede. We have become a world power. The God of nations has a work for us to do. Boys and girls, prepare yourselves for the great work. No greater or more golden opportunities were ever offered to the educated, intelligent young men and women than will be offered to you upon your graduation.

"With rich opportunities at home for advancement, the acquisition of Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines waiting with outstretched arms for your coming to colonize, educate, Christianize, and govern, will give you advantages and opportunities undreamed of in times gone by. May you be ready and prepared for the high duties that await you; may you ever maintain as your fathers have the dignity, honor, and glory of the flag!"

I quote this part of my address upon that occasion that you may know that I am no recent convert to the doctrine of expansion. At that early day, long before the signing of the treaty with Spain, when few public men had expressed their views, when nine-tenths of the Republican press were opposed to the permanent retention of the Philippines, I was a firm believer that the God of nations had a duty for us to perform and that duty could only be performed by permanently retaining Puerto Rico and the Philippines.

What else could we do with these islands? We could not turn them back to Spain; we could not leave them, unarmed for defense and untried in statecraft, to the horrors of domestic strife or to partition among European powers. We had assumed the responsibilities of victory, and wherever our flag has gone, there the liberty, humanity, and civilization which that flag embodies and represents must remain and abide forever. The civilized nations of the world and wise and patriotic men of all parties in our own land now see that there is but one course for us to pursue, and that course is being pursued by our able and wise Chief Magistrate.

Once and for all time let it be known that we are in lawful possession of the Philippines, with a double title, that of conquest and that of treaty—a title as indisputable as that of California or Alaska. Let it be known that that generation is yet unborn that will ever see them abandoned to another power. America acquires territory; she never surrenders it. And how shall we govern the Philippines? Govern them as Jefferson governed Louisiana—under the Constitution, which grants the power to acquire territory or other property anywhere, and govern it as we please, the inhabitants having the constitutional guaranty of civil rights and such political rights as Congress may confer under that provision of the Constitution which says, "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States." This constitutional power is not longer seriously doubted by anyone save the "constitutional lawyer."

The preponderance of constitutional authorities, headed by Gouverneur Morris, Daniel Webster, and Thomas Benton, and an unbroken tendency of decisions by the courts of the United States for the last fifty years, from Chief Justice Waite and Mr. Justice Miller down to the most recent utterance on the subject, that of Justice Morrow, of the circuit court of appeals, sustains this power. We are in the Philippines as we are in the West Indies, because duty called us and we responded to the call. Shall we now prove recreant to the opportunities that are showered upon us? Never in all history has such opportunities been thrust upon any nation. Are we equal to the occasion? The two richest archipelagoes in the world are in our possession.

The largest ocean on the globe is in our hands—the ocean that is to bear the commerce of the twentieth century. The Philippines are the gateway or foothold for our trade with China. They command China, India, the Orient, the whole Pacific for the purposes of offense, defense, and trade. China's foreign commerce in 1897 was $286,000,000, in round numbers, of which we had less than 9 per cent. In ten years we will have 50 per cent. China only has 350 miles of railroad for her 400,000,000 people—less than a mile to the million of population. In ten years she will likely have 10,000 miles. Her trade is the most powerful commercial factor in our future.

The 400,000,000 American citizens of the twentieth century demand that we retain the Philippines and the command of this great trade for them. Shall we prove recreant to the duty that posterity imposes? Shall we yield to the demand of the unpatriotic so-called anti-imperialists and surrender this rich possession with its command of this vast trade? Shall the historian record that at this unexampled crisis in our history we were timid and short-sighted and were unequal to the duty of the hour? Shall we prefer, with the the teeming population that the century will bring us, to be a "hibernating nation, living off its own fat," a "hermit nation?" Not to do our duty now means the perpetual isolation of this continent. We will do our duty now, as we ever have in the past. Every pledge made by the Republican party has been redeemed.

Many stirring events have transpired since the 4th of March, 1897. Our party, led by its matchless chieftain, William McKinley, has gained new victories and won fresh laurels. It has proven itself, as it ever has from the day of its birth down to the present hour, able, patriotic, prompt, and fearless in the discharge of every duty. When it came into power the country was straggling for existence, handicapped, burdened, and oppressed by the operations of the obnoxious tariff law of the last Administration. Under the malign influence of that law, our mills and factories and forges were closed, 2,000,000 American workingmen were thrown out of employment and idle; every industry languishing, business of all kinds paralyzed, with the national debt increased in a time of absolute peace to the extent of $262,000,000.

The Republican party came into power and was equal to the occasion. It promptly redeemed its pledge and gave to the people a new tariff law, every line of which is American, and under the benign influence of which every industry except that of the "soup house" has revived. Work for the workingman, business for the business man, good prices for the products of the farm, with more than a sufficient revenue to run the Government on a peace basis, and prosperity for all has been the result of this wise enactment. The party redeemed its pledge on the money question and maintained the national honor. The passage through the United States Senate by the Demo-Populists of the TELLER resolution, providing for the payment of our bonds in silver, was overwhelmingly defeated in the House of Representatives by a united Republican phalanx, thus maintaining and preserving our national honor. That day, January 31, 1898, was a momentous one in the history of our country.

To the minds of many the situation that confronted the American Congress on that day was of greater moment, freighted with more evil consequences and peril, than the situation that confronted the country in the dark days of the early sixties. Then it was a question whether the Government handed down to us by our forefathers should be maintained as a single republic or whether we should have two republics in these United States. It was a question of union or disunion. On the 31st of January, 1898, it was a question of honesty or dishonesty, whether we should be honest with our own people and the people of other lands, or whether we should be dishonest with our own people or the people of other lands. It was a question of honor or dishonor. The United States Senate had passed the resolution declaring in favor of paying our just and honest obligations in 44-cent dollars. It had declared virtually for repudiation of 56 cents on every dollar of our debt. The Republicans of the House of Representatives deserve the thanks of the American people for preventing this great nation from being plunged into the vortex of national repudiation, dishonor, and disgrace.

May that policy never prevail which will sully our fair fame and make us a reproach among the nations of the earth. The Republican party established our finances on a sound and solid basis, and it intends to keep them there. The country can rest assured that as long as the Republican party is in power the national credit will be maintained, and not only will our national bonds be paid in 100-cent dollars, but also will our workingmen in factory, forge, and field and everybody else receive their pay in 100-cent dollars. The wild theories of our misguided free-silver friends find no place in our midst, and I firmly believe that when the American people again get an opportunity they will bury them under an avalanche of ballots so deep that they never again will be resurrected.

The Republicans of the House of Representatives deserve the thanks of the nation for their patriotic stand on the Cuban resolutions. From the day that our noble battle ship with her 266 brave sailors went down to death in the dark, sullen, and mysterious waters of Habana Harbor, victims of cruel, treacherous Spanish hatred, I knew, everyone who felt the public pulse knew, that nothing but armed intervention in the affairs of Cuba, to the end that the struggling patriots fighting for liberty and independence should be free, would appease the just and awful wrath of an aroused, awakened American conscience, but it was important that no false or unsound position should be taken. We were making history, we were writing legislation for the emulation of the nations of the world. To take a false or uncertain position was to create dissensions at home and annoyance and interference abroad.

How wisely the Republicans of the House of Representatives acted during the strain and excitement of many long and wearisome hours of continued session let history and a grateful people tell. We entered upon a war for humanity, the most holy war ever waged, the result of which no one ever doubted—the freedom and independence of Cuba. We entered upon this struggle to rescue and succor starving childhood and outraged womanhood, over 300,000 of whose starved and outraged bodies had enriched the soil of Cuba in the past five years. That we did right every patriotic citizen believes. We expected no recompense except the approval of our own consciences and the smiles of an approving God. That we are to be recompensed by the acquisition of valuable territory is now certain.

The proper government of these territories for the time being devolves upon the Republican party; upon its wise and patriotic leader, the President of the United States, whom to know is to honor and to love. The American people, the civilized world, are looking to us, expecting, demanding, that we restore peace and order in the Philippines, and they shall not be disappointed. Peace and order shall prevail there even though it takes our last dollar and last gun. The insurrection must be effectually crushed, so that peace, tranquillity, and freedom shall be established and maintained. Under the flag of the Republic and the honest administration of wise laws these beautiful islands are destined to become the abode of a contented, prosperous, happy people, loving and revering the Stars and Stripes, enjoying a liberty and freedom undreamed of by their wildest enthusiasts.

I deplore the attacks upon the Administration on account of its Philippine policy, because of the encouragement it gives to the Filipino insurgents, great encouragement; and hope and a determination to continue fighting has been the result of these attacks. These are well-substantiated facts, as witness the statements of the lamented, courageous Lawton, of General Wheeler, and many others in the Philippines. Every such attack coming from the Senate or House rings the death knell to an American soldier. Let us as patriots forget that we are partisan and rise above such detractions; let us support, instead of censure, until every armed insurgent lays down his arms and acknowledges the sovereignty of the United States. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seventeen minutes and a half to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I did not think twenty-four hours ago that I would ever again address the House of Representatives on the subject of the civil-service law and its administration. I have stood in my place on this floor, a good deal of the time almost alone, at other times with eloquent and able support, and have pointed out to the House of Representatives, and indirectly to the country, some of the fallacies and errors of civil-service literature and arguments. But we had a committee appointed at each Congress since 1883, nominally called "The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service," and had in the two branches of Congress introduced and referred to that committee and its kindred committee in the Senate bills running up in number to the thousands, bills for the repeal of the law absolutely, bills for every form of modification that genius and statesmanship could devise, and yet up to to-day there has never been in this House a report on a single one of those bills.

That which has suggested itself to my mind during all this period of time has been that that committee has always been so constituted that it hovered with patriarchal anxiety over this bantling of mistaken education, and was afraid to trust the representatives of the people with any measure upon which it might ingraft an amendment that would have expressed the views of the House of Representatives. And so we have had the door locked and the pigeonhole stuffed full of measures and no reports. The facts which have changed my own views about again speaking to the House happened here on yesterday, when the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, in charge of the pending bill [Mr. HEMENWAY], representing, as I assume he does, the views of at least a majority of that great Committee on Appropriations, had courage enough to tell the country something of what is going on under this beautiful administration of the civil service of a great country. [Applause.]

For once there has been some light thrown in, and the people of the country have an opportunity now to see the open door behind which there is a vast amount of information not yet brought to the knowledge of the country.

Now, in the very brief time I shall occupy I shall attempt to go back to the civil service of the country at the time of the adoption of this measure in 1883, and I shall put into my address extracts from the speeches of Governor Morton and the speech of Senator Ingalls, and from the declarations of the Secretary of the Treasury at that date, all of which I will put in, with the names and quotations properly given, in support of my proposition that at the date of the passage of this law in 1883 the civil service of this Government was a model in the estimation of every honest man and in the estimation of the people not only of this country but of the world.

I will show you that by the framers of this measure, the utterances in favor of the efficacy of the then civil service, it was so admitted on the record of both Houses of Congress. No man lifted up his voice to say that so far as benefiting the civil service of the Government there was the slightest necessity for this bill. I challenge any man on this floor to put his finger on an utterance of the character to which I have referred. Not only that, but the great leaders in the debate in both Houses, of both parties, the Secretary of the Treasury and the heads of the Departments, came forward with one voice and said that so far as their Departments were concerned they were run in the most efficient and valuable manner. What, then, was the demand? It came confessedly for a single purpose. We had had a long line of Republican administration, beginning in 1861.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me one suggestion? He will find that in the hearings before the Appropriations Committee the declarations from the War Department and other Departments were that those temporary clerks were doing just as efficient service as those on the permanent roll.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I thank the distinguished gentleman. I should have come to that. But I am very much obliged, nevertheless.

What, then, was the object? We had had, as I was proceeding to say, a long line of Republican administration, and partisanship had assumed control, in effect, of all the Departments. We had gone from 1861 to 1883 without any Democratic administration; and Mr. Pendleton, the author of this bill, frankly said that his whole object was to bring about a division of offices between the Democrats and the Republicans. Nobody thought of any other proposition.

These gentlemen who to-day are exercising a power in this Government dangerous to the very principles of the Government never had a dream at that time that there was a necessity for anything else than a division of the offices. Mr. Pendleton so declared; and further than that, he was so uncertain in his own mind as to the efficacy of his bill that he put a limit upon the number of offices that it should cover, saying that not over 10,000 at the outside in the whole United States would be covered by it; and in urging the measure he advocated it as a tentative measure, saying that he hoped it might work well, but did not know whether it would or would not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. One suggestion, if the gentleman will allow it. The gentleman from Ohio was about as much responsible for the St. Louis platform as any other man in the country.

I should like to know why he consented to put in that platform a declaration in favor of the extension of the civil-service system?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, why has the gentleman from Tennessee acted the fool a great many times in the matter of platform making? [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I confess I can not answer an argument like that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nor can I answer your question in any better way than that.

I have very often said on this floor that the details of these convention platforms make no impression upon anybody. There were two things at St. Louis that we were looking after; and when we had got those into the platform we cared but little about the declarations which might be made by the little fellows who went about "declaring"——

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman's remark, as I understand, implies that he is wiser now than then.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was as wise then as I am now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman is wiser now than then, he must admit that the platform upon which Mr. Bryan made his campaign four years ago was founded in wisdom, because that platform did not advocate the extension of the civil-service system. So the gentleman can now be welcomed to a position on the Bryan platform.

Mr. GROSVENOR. God only knows whether that will be of any avail when the next campaign comes. [Laughter.]

But I do not want to consume my time on any extrinsic matter, as I have only seven minutes and a half left.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman will remember that the President in his letter of acceptance and in his inaugural address approved this civil-service system.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That straw has been thrashed out here so many times that my friend will allow me to say it is unworthy of him to bring it up again when there is so much new straw that could be thrashed out just as well.

Now, I have pointed out that it was never claimed by the friends of the original civil-service bill, first, that it was needed because of the condition of the public service, or, second, that it was anything but a tentative measure for the purpose I have indicated. Now what is the condition? We have gone from 1883 down to the present time, and here comes this great committee of the House, and, speaking through the gentleman in charge of this bill, lays before the country a very faint and modest description of what we have come to. I heard a high officer of this Government, holding a position nearly up to a Cabinet position, say not very long ago that he would take a contract, and give bond to carry it out, to pay all the expenses of running these Departments in the city of Washington for 50 cents on the dollar of what they are costing to-day, and would grow to a millionaire's position every year that he could have the contract.

I quote the following from the debate of yesterday on this bill:

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I should like to have a little more information about the condition of the public service in the various Departments. I would ask the gentleman if he knows or can approximate the number of incompetent employees in any one of the Departments?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I should say that in the office of the Auditor for the War Department the statement shows that 10 per cent of the employees are—well, you might say, incompetent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Ten per cent?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Their efficiency is very low.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is there a like percentage of incompetency in all the other Departments?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In the General Land Office the Commissioner, Mr. Hermann, estimates that 40 out of 400 are incompetent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is 10 per cent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is 10 per cent. Here are two very competent officials whom I have selected from the list—the Auditor for the War Department and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Their estimates show 10 per cent of incompetent employees.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the chiefs of these various Departments make that admission in letters addressed to your committee, do they?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, either in hearings before our committee or in letters.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And do they confess their inability to correct that evil?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They confess their inability to correct the evil.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Under the operation of the civil-service laws are they not required to discharge incompetent men from the public service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They are, but like all of us they are human, and while I have no desire to criticise Members of the House or Senators of the United States, when a number of Senators and Members of Congress come to these gentlemen and insist that an employee shall not be discharged, the gentleman can readily understand how difficult it is.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The bill reported by the gentleman carries an appropriation for the payment of these incompetent employees, I presume.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It certainly does, because the committee has no way of ascertaining who these persons are.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And no power to discharge them, of course.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No power to discharge, and we are simply bringing this fact before the House that they may understand the conditions. The Committee on Appropriations, by inserting the provisions found in section 4, on page 124 of the bill, has undertaken, by repeating what is now the law, to call attention to this condition and to bring about the discharge of these incompetent employees.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In just a moment. I will read section 4 of the bill.

"That the appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons permanently incapacitated for performing such service."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where is that provision to be found?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is on page 124 of the bill. The committee seeks by this provision to call attention to what is now the law, and thereby to prevent the payment, out of sums appropriated by this bill, for the services of incompetent employees; but gentlemen may stand here and talk about this during this session of Congress and the coming session of Congress, and the incompetent employees will stay in the Department. If the head of a Department goes to a chief clerk and down the line to try to ascertain who are incompetent, I will say to you that he has a very hard job, because they do not try to aid him in picking out the incompetent employees. And why?

Mr. SHATTUC. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY (continuing). Because they are there together, they have been there together for years; friendships there are just as they are here; and they are not going to try to get the old incompetent fellow out that has been there for many years. We have got to have some legislation upon this question that will remedy this evil; and if we do not, it is going to keep on growing and growing until we are going to have a great civil pension list.

Mr. SHATTUC. Is it not your opinion, if the heads of the Departments should dismiss these men and put in the men that Congressmen and Senators recommend, that the Senators and Congressmen would not ask them to keep these incompetent people?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no doubt that is correct, because when you give them the right to employ another man they would recommend competent men.

Mr. SHATTUC. Would it not be better for spoilsmen to recommend men who would be competent rather than to keep the incompetent men in the way they are now being kept?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reply to the gentleman's question, I can only say, with reference to this temporary force that has been employed, it is admitted by those who favor civil service and are at the heads of the different Departments that this temporary force, placed there within the last two or three years, is a very competent force; that they are more competent than the force secured through the civil service. They are younger men, men better qualified for the particular service to which they are assigned, and all along the line more efficient than the force secured through the civil service.

Mr. PEARRE. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Does he think it likely that the heads of the Departments and bureaus will appoint more competent men to the positions than those recommended by Members of Congress and Senators; in other words——

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reply to that, I will say that when they ask for the appointment of any particular class, they designate the kind of a man they want. If they want an accountant, they say to the gentleman, "Will you furnish me an accountant?" and if they want an accountant you would not send them a laborer. It is the experience that Members of Congress and Senators, if given the opportunity to furnish a particular kind of man, furnish that kind.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That being the case, does not the gentleman think there ought to be established an age limit, on attaining which employees should be retired, just as there is an age limit in the Army and Navy?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do. Although I believe in the present civil-service system, yet I will say that if we do not do something to meet this question of superannuation the service will break down.

Mr. WACHTER. I should like to know if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] can inform us what percentage of these incompetent employees are females?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have no information on that subject.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I supposed that I was through with the gentleman from Ohio on this question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated that the Commissioner of Pensions has said that if he could only discharge 100 clerks and fill the remaining places with persons of his own selection he could thereby greatly benefit the service. Now, does not the gentleman admit that the Commissioner of Pensions can not do this under the beautiful, far-reaching administration of the civil-service law; that where the removal of incompetent employees is desired there must be a trial before a sort of court, with a prescribed set of rules, to act upon each one of these individual cases?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio I will say that I believe the provision to which he refers, but which I do not understand to go to the extent he describes, was an unwise provision. But I do not understand that there is any difficulty in the way of the head of a Department discharging any of his subordinates if he will certify that they are incompetent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there not an Executive order forbidding that identical thing being done?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not so understand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was not such a provision inserted within a year upon the demand of the civil-service organization?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not so understand. I do understand that a man can not be discharged except for cause stated, and after an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very good; that is just what I said.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. But I venture to say that if the head of a Department, who is responsible for his work, undertakes to assert that the man is incompetent, that would be a sufficient reason for discharge. If that is not so, it is time Congress should go to work and make it so.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We know they should; but they will not do it. The idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to be that if the head of a Department will only assert himself he may repeal the order of the Executive forbidding him to do what he undertakes to do.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not so understand the matter at all.

And nobody doubts that any business concern in the country could take this entire concern under its administration and for 50 cents on the dollar do all that is done now and do it in a much more satisfactory manner.

Let us see. Ten per cent in the War Department; 100 worthless clerks in the Pension Office; 10 per cent on an average throughout the entire Departments. And now comes the Committee on Appropriations. Would any of these gentlemen go upon the witness stand and testify that 10 per cent of worthless clerks is the limit? Far from it. And yet when we come to cross-examine the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Indiana we find, first, that the Departments refuse to report the names of these inefficient clerks; second, they refuse to obey the law which requires them to discharge such clerks; and third, that there is no system by which they can be discharged without a proceeding that is mortifying to the helpless clerk and disgusting to the chiefs of Departments.

The order of the Executive that compels written charges and a hearing is equivalent to a trial in every case, and he who turns off a clerk on any ground other than that violates the statute of his country. That is all there is about it, and that order was made upon the demand of the civil-service organization of the United States. I have their address, in which Mr. Carl Schurz and others declared that without that order the civil-service law was inoperative, because the heads of Departments might discharge without giving the reasons for it. And so at last that, as one of the improvements of the organization, stands across the pathway of any removal except for cause, that cause to be stated in writing and the party to have a hearing upon that question of cause.

Now, what is the answer to all this? Why do they not discharge them? For a very good reason, gentlemen. No chief of a bureau would consent, with his eyes wide open, to-day, to discharge even an inefficient clerk who had some knowledge of the routine of the office and trust to an academic competitive examination to fill the place. That is the whole of it. That is where the whole evil comes. It comes of the fact that these Departments are unwilling to hazard the result of an application to this Bureau that has the patronage of the Government by the throat and is administering it in a way that ought to be condemned by every honest man in this country. [Applause.]

That is the reason why the Departments suffer the evils that they have "rather than fly to others that they know not of." That is the whole of it, and we must come forward as the representatives of the people and abate this nuisance or we will never have it abated. What is the answer to it all? I stand upon the platform of the Evans bill of the last Congress, a measure that covered all the clerical service of this Government here, covered all the clerical force in the Railway Mail Service of the United States, covered all the great post-offices and custom-houses of the country, and simply provided for a tenure of office such as you have, a tenure of office such as the President has, a tenure of office such as the Senate has, and then provided at the end of the four or six years the young fellow might go out and go home, unless the chief of his bureau or his Department desired his retention, and provided for a bureau to examine as to his fitness.

It is true, as the gentleman from Georgia has said, that there never was a more efficient set of clerks ever put into the Departments in Washington than the temporary clerks under the Army bill. There is no more efficient service in all this country than these men have made here. Why does not the Civil Service Bureau, that has made war upon these clerks in every possible way, and tried to drive them out, tried to prevent their promotion, done everything to humiliate them that they possibly could—why do they not come forward and point out to the people of the country some failure in that service, which came upon the recommendation of Congressmen and went into the Departments to rescue the Government from the hands of the inefficiency that had cursed the Departments for lo, these many years? Why did they not point out where some of these men have failed?

I tell you, my countrymen, I shall not agitate this question very much longer. I do not care very much about it. I care nothing about it from a personal standpoint. But when I see 25 per cent, 30 per cent, 40 per cent, 50 per cent of this enormous expenditure of my country's money paid out to uphold a mere theory that has no foundation in practical justice or practical effect, I am disgusted with the whole subject of the administration of the Civil Service Bureau, and the people of this country will inquire into it some of these days, and they will inquire into it in a way much more effective than the passage of the Evans bill would have been, and the time will come when the advocates of this measure that has thus ruined the administration of these Departments will wish that they had accepted the Evans bill as a just compromise, rather than to have made war and carried on this devastation against the best interests of the country. [Applause.]

Under the permission to extend my remarks, I reproduce in support of my argument here portions of a speech which I had the honor to make upon this subject in the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fifth Congress on the 19th day of July, 1897:

THE ORIGINAL CIVIL-SERVICE LEGISLATION—THE PRESENT PRACTICE A WIDE AND UNJUSTIFIED DEPARTURE.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to discuss, in connection with the aggressions and growth of this bureaucracy the original idea of the promoters of this legislation. Had there been a suggestion to Congress in 1883 that this law would have been construed as it has been and the power of the Civil Service Commission have grown until it denounced the President and Cabinet officers and Congress, it would not have received 10 votes in either branch of the legislative body, and I make this statement in the light of the proof before us.

The original effort, following the law of 1853, was the effort of Mr. Jenckes, who played to the public galleries in 1866-67. He struggled on and on, and encountered defeat in the Thirty-ninth Congress by a vote of 72 to 66 in the House, 52 members refusing to vote. This chimerical system, which has since grown into an enactment, was spit upon by the distinguished members of Congress of that day, and it is pleasant now to consider that among the great statesmen of the hour who voted to table the whole business we find the names of Mr. Blaine, Mr. Kasson, Senator Wilson, Secretary Windom, Senator ALLISON, and Mr. Boutwell, while Conkling and Garfield refused to vote.

At that time Mr. Jenckes was challenged over and over again to bring forward any reason why such a law was to be passed. He was never able to do it, and finally, after his defeat, as above stated, he abandoned the field, so far as Washington and the Departments were concerned, and undertook to try and reach inefficiency, as he called it, in the customs and internal-revenue service. After the defeat and death of Mr. Jenckes, Mr. Schurz, who has never refused an office from any party, no matter what its principles were, brought the same bill into the Senate, but it was sidetracked by a production of Senator Trumbull, entitled "An act to prevent importunity and to maintain the independence of the Departments." "Senators wanted one thing," as has been well said by another, "but the civil-service 'reformers' wanted another, and finally they both joined hands, but for different objects, to reach the same result."

Mr. Ham, a most able and lucid writer upon this subject, has recently published a small pamphlet in which he reviews, with historic accuracy, the rise and promotion of this heresy. The Albany (N. Y.) Evening Journal quotes Mr. Ham with the following indorsement:

Mr. Ham treats the subject of civil-service reform, modeled after the English experiment, intelligently and candidly.

This candid writer says:

DENUNCIATION OF SPOILSMEN.

At this juncture the most alarming statements were made in the public press and on the stump concerning the condition of the civil service. It was alleged to be corrupt, inefficient, and wholly under the control of Congress, and the country was flooded with untrue, unjust, and most malicious allegations and insinuations. The people were told that the country had come under the yoke of an office-holding oligarchy (Grant) and that its power was poisoning the vitals of the Republic. Every man who failed to fall down and worship at the British "competitive" shrine set up in the market places by Dorman B. Eaton was denounced as a "spoilsman," and the very air was pregnant with the clamor of the demagogue and the applause of those who innocently followed in the wake of ambitious politicians cloaked in the garb of civil-service "reformers," while bells were tolled to warn the people against danger from the "officeholders" under General Grant.

Let us glance at the situation and conditions which existed about this time.

The nation had just emerged from a death struggle to maintain its own existence. To raise the needed revenue, obtain supplies, and distribute them promptly to vast armies called into the field a large number of officeholders not needed in time of peace. Contractors were a necessary evil, and coming in contact with the peace contingent in office, abuses outside the Departments may have come to infest the public service. The impetus of the war force was so great, and the peril so imminent, that the final result found the Government generously tardy in coping with evils which had crept in and attached themselves like barnacles to places invested with more or less power; millions of war and other claims remained to be adjusted, and the new system of internal-revenue taxation had become necessary.

Heavy amounts of revenue were and would long require to be raised, not only to repair losses, but to reward patriotism and to pay our indebtedness. A large force must be kept employed, and, for the reasons stated, it was not entirely clean. This abnormal situation brought to the surface a lot of theorists, ambitious demagogues—reformers, some of whom were jealous of the civil and military personnel in power—who, in Congress and at the front, had carried the nation successfully through a great war. The conditions became ripe and the moment favorable to commence an agitation for anything that promised "reform."

Only a month or two after General Lee's surrender a select committee on "retrenchment" was raised in the House to investigate matters, and there was a suggestion in the resolve that the inquiry extend to the subject of appointments to office, to the examination of persons for place, and to the policy of continuing them in office for a fixed term. That was the original idea, and, aside from Mr. Jenckes's effort, that was the starting point of the present civil-service law.

A train of abuses is the inevitable result of a civil war; they would have been gradually removed without "competitive" examinations, because the trouble was not so much in the Departments as outside of them, but "civil-service reform" was sprung upon the people who were bearing heavy burdens, and they were made to believe—by diligent efforts—that the remedy lay in this pretended reform. Petitions were circulated, editorials written, and speeches made which finally resulted in an educated clamor for the civil-service scheme that was eventually foisted upon the people. Public men who had labored hard during the war in Congress and had grown weary began to gradually favor something—anything—which would relieve them from the "importunity" of those who desired places. These men were not brought to take this elixir because they either deemed the "competitive idea" necessary or that it contained the elevating, eradicating, and purifying qualities claimed for it by the civil-service reformers. It simply furnished the machinery to relieve men from importunity."

For five years—from 1866 to 1871—the House of Representatives persistently refused to accept the civil-service idea, but the people had been plied with all sorts of statements relating to the public service, and they finally took alarm. Not one in ten thousand, however, comprehended what the "reform" meant. Some interpreted it to signify a decrease in taxation and the purifying of the public service and as much more as an active and imaginary mind could be wrought to conceive. But Congress refused to move, until finally the "competitive" idea was hitched on as a "rider" to a sundry civil appropriation bill during the last hours of the session of 1870.

To attach this scheme to an appropriation bill smacked of unfair method. The motion to lay it on the table escaped defeat in the Senate by barely 1 vote, and it was accepted by the House under protest from General Logan and by a minority vote. It is known as section 1753 of the Revised Statutes, and remains in force. It thrust upon the President a responsibility which he did not desire and in a form which he did not suggest. The President had felt the pressure of "importunity" and wished to get relief therefrom, but above all he regarded the real evil to be the careless recommendations of persons for place by Senators and Representatives almost inevitable during the war.

In December, 1870, President Grant said that in mercantile pursuits "the business man who gives a letter of recommendation to a friend to enable him to obtain credit of a stranger is regarded as morally responsible for the integrity of his friend and his ability to meet his obligations. A reformatory law which would enforce that principle against all indorsers of persons for public place would insure great caution in making recommendations."

There was assuredly no "competitive" idea conveyed in that suggestion—no indorsement in it to prevent "importunity" even; no intimation that it was necessary.

TACTICS OF THE REFORMERS.

But the scheme had obtained a footing, and the reformers became supposedly intrenched behind a law which left its success or failure to rest upon the President. They at once determined to hold him, rather than themselves, responsible for any failure of the experiment; and the work of denouncing every man who declined to accept their civil-service elixir or "competitive" compound was begun with renewed vigor, at Government expense, in reports to the President. The word "reform" had been used to thrust upon the country something which the people did not want nor understand.

JACKSON AS AN EXAMPLE.

Even the idea of using the word "reform" in the manner stated was not original. That word was just as effectually employed during the Administrations of Adams and Jackson by politicians to secure Jackson's election, and to excuse his removals from office, as the modern civil-service reformers used it to bring the "competitive" idea to the statute book.

Some modern "reformers" there were who hoped the cry would capture Republicans, tear them away from their party, build up the "Liberal" movement, perhaps make Carl Schurz President. They were simply handling the word "reform" as it had been used in the days of Benton, Clay, and Calhoun; just as Mr. Benton raised a "select committee on executive patronage" in 1826 under cover of a desire to reform the civil service. He and his friends then pretended to believe that the ship of state was about to go to pieces on the rock of "patronage," and danger signals were hoisted on every hilltop and kept brightly burning. The people were told that unless something was done the nation would surely go to the demnition bowwows without confession or prayer. The cry went up that the President had too much power; the civil-service reformer of more modern times tells us that the average Senator and Representative had too much influence.

The Jackson adherents wanted their man and their principles and policy to prevail, and they raised the civil-service "reform" war cry. Jackson came to power in 1829, and six years later, in 1835-36, Clay and Calhoun combined and raised a select committee on civil-service reform. Calhoun had fallen out of line because of his stand on nullification; and, if ambitious, he also desired to punish Jackson.

The wording of the Calhoun-Clay resolve was so similar with that known as the Jenckes resolution in 1866-67 that it seems easy to divine whence the latter came. Cursory examination will convince the most skeptical that the civil-service reformers of 1866-1883 drew all their inspiration as to pretended need and necessity for civil-service reform in this country from the reports made by Benton in 1826-27, and Clay and Calhoun in 1835-36.

The Calhoun-Clay report in 1835-36 alleged that honest and capable men were dismissed to make room for the base and corrupt; that the offices were made the spoils of victory, the reward of partisan service, and the means of substituting man worship for patriotism. To these allegations the reformers of 1866-1883 added but two ideas: That the civil service was inefficient and the importunity of constituents exasperating. Benton met the attack of 1835 by saying that it proceeded from political animosities and was unfounded; that the charges emanated from barnacles who had been removed by Jackson.

Mr. Calhoun pointed out to Benton that his position was quite inconsistent with the language of his (Benton's) report in 1826, when the latter and his friends were assailing Adams, and the point made by the South Carolina Senator was well taken. Silas Wright was on the floor of the Senate and made sport of the fears expressed in the Clay-Calhoun report leveled at Jackson. He said:

"How are most of these officeholders appointed? Upon the recommendations and petitions of the people themselves, upon certificates of character, respectability, and moral worth, made by those who are neighbors and friends of the candidate, who know him personally and intimately, and most usually on the recommendation of the Representatives here of the person appointed. Are we, then, to assume that offices are bestowed as rewards for partisan service, without respect to merit?"

William L. Marcy's familiar remark, which the advocates of civil-service reform so delight to recall from its slumbers, viz, that "to the victors belong the spoils," contained a very essential appendage, which is always suppressed. Mr. Wright added, "but I do not mean to say that the victors should plunder their own camp." A very important qualification, indeed; one that carries a complete refutation of the construction generally placed on his original remark by the civil-service people.

In other words, while the political party which succeeds has a right to the offices—in order to enforce its policy and its principles upon the country, if it can—the argument was, and is, that its appointees have generally been men of character, honesty, and merit, not only that they might best serve the public interests, but to accomplish the purpose indicated; and in the very nature of things the best, the strongest, and most positive men were, as a rule, appointed. No political party will "plunder its own camp," and thus endanger its power by selecting dishonest, corrupt, or inefficient persons to hold office in time of peace.

COLLAPSE OF THE ORIGINAL IDEA.

The original law of 1871 provided that the President might "prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote efficiency," etc. Following the passage of that act came the zealous efforts of the reformers to prepare rules and regulations to make the scheme work out their theories. They failed, and the competitive idea finally collapsed in 1875-76. The President, General Grant, said distinctly in his message of December, 1875, that—

> If Congress adjourns without positive legislation on the subject of civil-service reform, I will regard such action as a disapproval of the system and will abandon it. Competitive examinations will be abandoned.

Congress, wisely and deliberately, and with its eyes wide open, did adjourn without any "positive legislation." Now, in this connection it is important to see whether or not the allegations of corruption and inefficiency alleged against the Republican Administration of that day were true or false. This child of despotism was born of those declarations; whatever there is of it now had its birth and origin because of the declarations made that in 1875-76 there was a condition in the Departments at Washington that required an enactment of this character.

There was not one officer of the General Government, nor bureau, that did not denounce as an outrage the slanders upon which these proceedings were based, and it was not strange to the men of those days that slanders should emanate from certain of the sources promoting this alleged reform. The Third Auditor of the Treasury said that the clerks appointed by competitive examination were not superior to those appointed in the old way. The Supervising Architect said that the civil-service law had led to demoralization, rivalries, and intrigues, and that no examination was of any value compared with practical tests, and he advised the repeal of so much of the law as had at that time been passed into enactment, to wit, section 1753 of the Revised Statutes.

The New York naval officer said that the examinations resorted to under the old system were the means of introducing into the service appointees equally as efficient as any appointed under the civil-service law.

The First Comptroller of the Treasury said "the evils from it exceeded the benefits."

The Third Assistant Postmaster-General said that the law "fell short of properly or satisfactorily filling its mission;" but, as this writer has well said, this fusillade was kept up, and the words "spoilsman," "henchmen," "patronage," and "reform" were sung and echoed throughout the halls of Congress and throughout the air which surrounded politicians out of jobs, who had traded on their influence in the campaign preceding 1877.

Then came a determined effort, which unfortunately failed, to get rid of this whole business and go back to the simpler and more effective terms of the law of 1853, as amended. In 1872 Senator Carpenter, of Wisconsin, one of the great leaders of the Republican party, moved an amendment to an appropriation bill to repeal that law. It failed by a slender majority of 8. But in 1874 the House of Representatives did attach an amendment to repeal the civil-service law of 1871. The Senate refused to concur, but moved to amend by striking it out and to give $15,000 to enforce the law, and in conference the action of both branches failed and civil-service reform substantially came to a dead stop. The effect was, is, and remains that the competitive system was abandoned and denounced all along its pathway up to this date.

THE REAL OBJECT OF THE LAW.

The real object of the law, it was claimed at the time, was to make men in public stations accountable for their recommendations, and Senator Morrill said that he desired to prevent intoxication among employees; and yet, as Mr. Ham has well said:

> The average civil-service reformer of to-day will say that the one great purpose of the act of 1871 was to bring greater efficiency to the service; to destroy the patronage power of the politician. With this contrariety of ideas it is little wonder that the competitive idea of 1871 came to an untimely end. Senators did not concede that there was corruption or inefficiency in the grades which the law would reach.

No greater scandal or outrage was ever perpetrated upon the fair name of the American people than at the beginning of the civil-service law. There was no necessity for greater efficiency or purer morals in the Departments at Washington or in the great bureaus in other cities.

The Senators of 1871 made swift progress to denounce the whole business, and addressing himself to the Trumbull bill in that year Senator Morton, of Indiana, one of the great leaders of the Republican party, said:

> It is said that there are a large number of incompetent and worthless clerks employed. Is that true? I believe the clerks here are as competent and as well qualified, and men of as good character, as can be found in any country. I believe our civil service is now conducted as well if not better than at any former period of our history. We have gone on improving and reforming, and the civil service is getting better from year to year.

Senator Cameron, the great champion of the party in Pennsylvania, said:

> Take them all together, I do not believe there is a more efficient, a more honest, a more useful, and a worse paid body of people than these clerks.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Richardson, who was appealed to and who was in that year a man of courage, who was in that year a man who was not afraid of the babble and bluster of the noisy element in the country, said:

> The business in the Treasury, upon the whole, is not only done in a satisfactory manner, but it will compare in accuracy and efficiency with the business of the country generally which is carried on by corporations and individuals.

He also affirmed "that the removals were no greater than was needed to insure vigor and infuse new life in the Department."

At that time the high priest, who, I believe, had not yet deserted his political party, although he was, perhaps, making ready and looking out for later engagements, said:

> Whether the Departments at Washington are well or badly managed was an insignificant question.

Baffled and completely routed in his assaults upon the Government and upon the departmental service in Washington, he said that it was a matter of insignificance whether they were well or badly run. They were to be reformed whether there was any reform needed or not. In this connection it is well to quote what Representative Baker, of New Hampshire, said recently in a speech in this House:

Why, gentlemen, years ago I had the honor of serving in one of these Departments. I know what its personnel was from 1865 to 1874 by actual contact with it, and, by business and other relations with that Department, I have known it ever since, and I tell you that there has never been, in the history of the Treasury Department, a time when it was so well managed, when it had clerks of such ability who so honestly and faithfully discharged their duties as during that so-called "spoils" time from 1865 to 1875.

Then came a little tinkering of the law in a legislative appropriation bill of August 15, 1876, and then came the great struggle to create public sentiment, and Mr. Ham has so well stated the unjust and libelous efforts that were made in that direction that I reproduce his remarks:

This only seemed to whet the keen appetite of the reformers, who commenced a systematic siege, and for several years in public print, in conventions, meetings, and on the stump, it was sought to create a sentiment which would justify a second appeal to Congress, of sufficient proportions to terrify and bulldoze the legislative branch into passing an elaborate act. Accordingly in 1877 Mr. Hayes was prevailed upon to allow Mr. Eaton to show how "competitive" examinations had worked in England and here. That gentleman labored on a brochure of 366 printed pages about two years and four months, at a good salary, going back to the Norman invasion and tracing the rise, progress, and causes of abuses in the British Empire, desiring, of course, to have the country assume that what had proceeded from the rule of English tyrants and feudalism existed here also or was likely to be precipitated upon this country, unless the "competitive" panacea was applied at once. It was a report calculated and intended to excite and alarm, but it had no application whatever to the existing conditions of our civil service. And the suggestion which it conveyed, to wit, that the abuses in England had been eradicated by civil-service "competitive" examinations was the weakest feature of his historical effort. Mr. Eaton's report showed that Parliament was under the sway, practically, of 160,000 voters. In some districts 10, 13, or 35 persons controlled an election. The rotten borough system there was in full blast. Ninety members went up to Parliament on a total vote of but 4,500. Three lords controlled 31 members of the Commons. Of over 50 persons foisted on the Government between 1837 and 1855, several were found absolutely incompetent because of old age; titled barnacles, spoken of by Mr. Dickens.

Many others of the 50 were found entirely unqualified for divers other reasons, such as bad character, ill health, and some could neither read nor write. Of 280 persons examined under the old system in 1855 in England, 285 were rejected because of ignorance in spelling and arithmetic. There was assuredly need of education in England—even if it had to come under the guise of "competitive" examinations. But the scholastic effort to draw a parallel between the situation there and here was devoid of truth in its suggestion and lacking in true American pride. It was an insinuating libel upon the United States, printed at Government expense.

But this did not succeed, and no civil-service law grew out of it. A well-known and distinguished civil-service reformer assailed Mr. Dawes, a Senator from Massachusetts, to know why the law had not been passed, and Mr. Dawes said, "How can you expect a law to be passed by Congress when the constituents of Congress do not want it?" And one of the theorists of that day said: "Of course I know that it is true that no law which is very much in advance of the prevailing tone of public morality is ever effectually executed. It will not execute itself."

Mr. Dawes said, in that connection, "We can not get the legislation and make it permanent unless our constituents behind us will support us in it. We never rise higher than the fountain;" and thereupon a cheap-John stereotype system of printed headings and the old, old style of petitions, signed promiscuously in country stores and post-offices and everywhere, poured in upon Congress as an evidence of a growing public sentiment.

Now came the partial sanction of the civil-service-reform movement. It did not originate in the House of Representatives; it never came from any immediate representatives of the people, but it had its origin in the Senate of the United States. Its progenitor ostensibly was Mr. Pendleton. It has been well said, and is true, that the bill containing the competitive scheme was handed to Mr. Pendleton, and was reported favorably, devoid of sections 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, which really contain all of reform there is in the civil-service law.

The Senate amended the bill as reported by adding the above sections; 11, 12, 13, and 15 coming from Senator HAWLEY, who now has views on this great question, and section 14 from the late Senator Beck. Mr. Pendleton never drafted a line of the experiment. As Senator Miller said:

The bill is the joint work of a number of educated gentlemen who are organized for the purpose of promoting a reform in the civil service.

Senator Ingalls said:

This bill is not devised by either political party in the Senate; it was sent here by a self-constituted commission of exceedingly holy and wise men outside the Senate. It does not represent the sentiment of either of the political parties in this body. I know who drew up this bill; I know who sent it here, and I know the motives and the incentives that are being used to pass it.

And he added:

This bill appears to be supported by each party for the purpose of cheating the other. It is sustained by one party upon grounds that are absolutely adverse to those on which it is supported by the other, and it will end by defrauding both.

And who will say that to-day the intelligent, far-seeing, and shrewd men of all political parties do not recognize that they have and their constituents have and the country has been cheated by this bill?

Senator Logan said:

I do not protest against certain Senators constantly discussing this question, based upon the corruption of the clerical force of this country, because it has no foundation in fact.

But Mr. Pendleton then and there waved a flag of compromise which alone saved the bill, by declaring:

It has been said that the abandonment of the spoils system will retain in office the appointments of the Republican party. I do not think so. There is no proposition to extend the term of office nor anywise to limit the power of removal.

But to-day the Civil Service Commissioners demand that the power of removal shall be limited by an Executive order which the Executive has no constitutional power to issue, and in a recent article in the Forum the chairman of the executive committee of the National Civil Service Association says that the weak spots in the law as it stands to-day are, first, that there is no power of removal and, in fact and by inference, that no Presidential order can limit the power of the appointing heads of the Departments from making removals with or without cause, excepting in so far as the President can coerce the judgment and action of his Cabinet; and second, that there is no provision for the disabled; that is, there is no civil-pension list. As I have already said, that will be the next step needed. The step has already been taken by the honorable chairman of the Civil Service Committee of this House.

I shall here incorporate some of the pertinent discussions when this bill was pending. These choice excerpts are collated from speeches of HAWLEY, Pendleton, and Sherman, and has been well expressed by Senator MORGAN in the following:

Is not "importunity" the great evil against which we have to contend?

So it appears that—

The object of Senators on both occasions was relief against the importunities of those who desired places. The competitive scheme would throw all the minor office hunters upon the Civil Service Commission. It was not that competitive examinations were necessary. That idea would simply furnish the machinery which would attain the other desired result. And the consequence was that, independently of the competitive scheme, its machinery would defend men from "importunity."

That is to say, distinguished Senators who had risen upon the wave of results achieved by the working men of their party at home wanted to put a legal barrier between the importunities for reward of their constituents who had made them great. This was the declared position; but General HAWLEY, the gallant old soldier, hero, and statesman of Connecticut, has said, as stated by Mr. Ham, and I quote a considerable amount of the collation of that indefatigable writer:

Nine-tenths of those who do the headwork in the great political campaigns at home, in town and county and State committees, and who are at the polls distributing ballots, serving as counters, running out to bring in voters, and attending to correspondence are men who serve with no care for, no thought nor expectation of ever holding a political office. Nine-tenths of the men who subscribe money for the honorable uses of a campaign are of the same description. There has been a deal of unlimited and nonsensical abuse on that subject.

Why should Senators and Representatives erect a barrier between themselves and these men and the public service, seek the labor and financial assistance even of party friends, and then be able to turn about and say, in answer to a request for a position, "Oh, I can't help you; all the places are under the civil service." They ought to add—even if it is in a whisper—"which I helped to enact and now vote to continue." Ex-Senator Vilas gave the snap away when he said on the floor of the Senate April 7, 1896: "The relief which has been enjoyed by Senators and Representatives, not to speak of those intrusted with the offices of the Government, is in itself a second item of great consequence."

It may be of great consequence for a Senator to be able to turn a constituent down with the leverage of a law of his own creation, but the Senator who gloried in it has himself been retired, and the people are ready to retire more who may think as he does.

But in what way are Senators and Representatives advantaged by this law, so far as it may tend to relieve them from "importunity?" Without a civil-service law they would be asked to secure "appointments." Under the law they are importuned to keep persons in and also to secure reinstatements. We think the law increases the volume of importunity.

It is by and through political parties that this Government has worked out its greatest achievements and advances—and all before civil-service reform had an existence! By and through parties come purification, exposures of wrong, and economies. Destroy one of the incentives which a small percentage of party workers have—reward for fidelity and zeal—and a republican form of government will gradually lapse into a state of coma. Political parties are the vitalizing forces of our system. They consist in part of workers and organizers not one in a thousand of whom seek Federal positions!

The strife between the comparatively few who do develops the unobjectionable and qualified person. The assumption is that unless competitive examination is resorted to we get incompetents. The whole country is full of qualified persons! Would Mr. Gage or any other bank president wanting a teller, cashier, note clerk, or other officer go to some "competitive" school for such an officer? And why not, as well as for a clerk in the Treasury?

So now it becomes pertinent to ascertain what was the real incentive of the Senators to pass the Pendleton bill. Was the civil service inefficient? I have already more than once commented; I shall continue to comment.

President Arthur said in 1881:

I declare my dissent from the severe and almost indiscriminate censure with which the present civil servants of the Government have been recently assailed. That they are, as a class, indolent, inefficient, and corrupt is a statement which has been often made and widely credited; but when the extent, variety, delicacy, and importance of their duties are considered, the great majority of the employees of the Government are, in my judgment, deserving of high commendation.

"I protest vigorously against the extreme denunciation of the existing system of this country," said Mr. HAWLEY. "It has become a fashion very largely, among a class of men who have or claim for themselves a superior culture to the average, to speak of the whole public service of this country as corrupt. They have no right to such language. * * * I have an unutterable contempt for the man who justifies his neglect of his public duties by talking about the dirty waters of politics."

So the law was passed in fraud. It was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, for it is always iniquitous to intend to pass a law for one purpose when covertly and secretly you intend it shall operate for another purpose. It went through the House in fraud of the rights of the members of the House and the people whom they represent. It was never intended to cover anything but the Departments in Washington, and that alone in its application to the clerical force. Had any man in those days said that that law would be tortured to affect the appointment by the President himself of an assistant messenger in the White House, there would have been no vote in favor of it on the floor of the Senate. It was an experiment to be tried upon the clerks in the Departments. The whole line of debate shows it. Mr. Pendleton himself says:

I said that this was a tentative effort; that it was intended to be an experiment; and it is because it is tentative, because it is intended as an experiment, that the committee thought it advisable to limit it.

Limit it to what? Why, to the very subjects that we say to-day it is limited to. Pendleton, its author, understood it so; Pendleton, its putative father, knew what it meant.

In 1888 Mr. Cox said that when the Pendleton bill came over from the Senate the House was about to take up an important shipping bill, and he at once proposed to Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, that a vote be taken on the Pendleton bill without debate, and it was passed in that way, or, as Mr. Cox expressed it, "on the tidal wave of an emotion," and that emotion has emotioned out of office every Administration that has touched it with a single item, and its baneful effects are just being felt in this country; and here I quote from Mr. Ham what this experiment has cost the people of the United States:

As an "experiment" it has been used and abused as has no other law on the statute books. Specific details or cases to sustain this assertion will doubtless be forthcoming in due time; it is sufficient to now say that this has been done through the general rules, the special rules applicable to each Department, and the regulations, for be it known that the civil-service "trust," commission, or board of control of the Federal patronage, the three "bosses," over 87,000 places, and their predecessors, have erected a "machine" under those rules that would startle Tweed himself. Its original entrance or appointment rules, special rules for each Department, rules for transfer and promotions, and its regulations, and that delectable semipolitical "machine" in the Treasury for special or noncompetitive examinations, cover 53 pages of small type! Is it any wonder that Senators and Representatives "throw up their hands" when they attempt to discover what it all means?

The Departments were "blanketed" under civil-service reformer Cleveland to such an extent in the reach for jurisdiction that farmers and blacksmiths on Indian reservations and employees in sawmills, and cooks, even, are said to come within the rules. In fact, a doubt has arisen whether there are enough places "excepted" to satisfy even the very few remaining applicants from the State of Ohio!

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirteen minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield it to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] is recognized for thirteen minutes.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions for three years, and I desire to say during that time I have not seen in that committee one particle of partisanship. Every bill brought in there, whether introduced by a Democrat or Republican, has been fairly, honorably, and squarely treated and considered. The Democrats have received as much consideration as have the Republicans. I believe the time has come when the country should understand what we do in the House at the Friday night sessions. The newspapers of the country say: "The pension mill in the House is again at work grinding out bills."

Mr. BELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DRIGGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. I should like to know how that committee works——

Mr. DRIGGS. I will come to that.

Mr. BELL. I should like to know how it is that some of us who have introduced a number of bills and who have made the proof in the very beginning of this session have not yet got a bill on this Calendar. I made my proof before the committee in the case of 75 bills; yet I have not been able to get one bill on the Calendar. I should like to know how that occurs.

Mr. DRIGGS. It is a pleasure for me to answer the gentleman. At the commencement of this session the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions sent a notice to every member of this House that if he had any special preferences for any special bills, those bills would be given consideration in accordance with the request of the member.

Mr. BELL. Now, may I ask the gentleman again——

Mr. DRIGGS. I would rather not yield just now.

Mr. BELL. In the very beginning——

Mr. DRIGGS. I decline to yield now. I am coming to the gentleman's question.

There are in this committee members assigned to examine bills from the different States; and if any Representative on this side of the Chamber does not get his bills reported he will understand the reason. The committee meets on Monday and Friday of each week; and we go through the bills without any regard as to whether the member interested is a Democrat or a Republican. There are fifteen members of that committee when they are all present; and when the State of Colorado, for instance, is reached, the Representative having charge of bills from that State takes up those bills and gives them consideration after their examination by the pension expert sent us by the Pension Department and bases his report upon this expert evidence. I will ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] whether I have answered his question.

Mr. BELL. I think you did.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, the bills are then reported to the committee as a whole, acted upon, rejected or accepted, and placed upon the Calendar for the future consideration of the House. Each bill, sir, passes over five steps before going to the Senate, viz: Pension expert, subcommittee, whole committee, Committee of Whole House, and then the House. No bills considered in Congress pass through so devious and fair a course as those from our committee.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read this editorial from the New York Times of February 12.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE PENSION ATTORNEYS' WORK.

It is well to remember that the enormous amount of pension legislation now being pressed in Congress is not the work of the soldiers as a class, nor even of a very great proportion of the soldiers. In very large part, the persons receiving or seeking pensions now are not soldiers, but the relatives of soldiers, and these have none of the sense of pride that generally is felt by those who have been in the military service.

Another considerable number of the present applicants for pension are men who deserted from the Army or in other ways forfeited their rights, or those who were mere camp followers and never exposed themselves to any danger. Back of this army of hungry and unscrupulous persons, or persons never really connected with the service, are the pension attorneys, more greedy and unprincipled than the clients they hunt up from all corners of the land. It is this class that are hounding Congress for the passage of the flood of private pension bills, almost every one of which enacts a claim that has been carefully and honestly examined in the Pension Bureau and rejected for good cause.

The whole theory of the special legislation on this subject is wrong. There are only a very few cases in which a pension should be paid except in accordance with general laws and on grounds fixed by these laws and capable of definite proof in compliance with the tests imposed by the Bureau. There is almost no claim that can be passed on by a committee of Congress so honestly, fairly, and wisely as by the trained and responsible officers of the Bureau. We do not know that there is any way of enforcing on Congress the application of this perfectly sound principle. It is not practicable to restrict the powers of Congress by statute, and if the committees and the two Houses choose to abuse their powers, as they continually do, they can not be prevented.

But it ought to be well understood by the country that their motives are not good, and that in the great body of cases they are not acting from reckless generosity, but selfishly. The pension attorneys are the organizers and managers of the so-called "soldier vote," and they menace with it every Congressman who stands in their way. Probably nine-tenths of the undeserved pensions voted in Congress are the product of this sort of blackmail, in which the pension sharks are experts. The only check on them is wholesome public opinion, mainly that of the real soldiers, and this is not sufficiently direct and well informed at present to have a decided influence. There has never been a time when Congress was so reckless and shameless in this direction.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, this editorial of this great metropolitan daily is one of the most outrageous attacks upon Congress, upon the representatives of the people in Congress, and upon the members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that I have ever read or heard of under the head of pension legislation. It is written with the purpose to deceive and mislead the American people on the subject of pension legislation. And I do not propose, either at this late hour of this day's session or in this late year in the history of our country, to talk on the subject as to whether pension legislation is advisable or unadvisable. But I do say this: That as a Democrat I believe in the volunteer soldiery of this country, and I believe the only way that we are going to be able to maintain and keep up the volunteer force of this country in any future wars that may occur is by standing by the pension principles laid down by the fathers when they established the first act providing for pensions, some five or six weeks (August 26, 1776) after the signing of the Declaration of Independence.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the first part of this editorial states that it is well to remember that the pension legislation which is now before us is not the act of the old soldiers, but largely that of their relatives and people who have no real right to pensions under the law. I say that during the three years I have served on this Committee on Invalid Pensions every single case that we have considered has been that of an old soldier, his widow, or some one directly dependent upon that soldier—aged father or mother or helpless children. Desertion bills are not considered by us. It continues by stating that the pension attorneys appear before our committee, and that we members of Congress are pushed forward to bring about this legislation in their behalf and not of the soldier—sort of a system of blackmail.

I say now that there has never been one single, solitary pension attorney before that committee to talk to or consult with us or to ask anything about any special pension legislation; and I say now that I, for one, if a pension attorney were to ask permission to appear before that committee on any special bill, would be one of the first to vote in the committee against giving him the privilege to appear there, because the old soldiers themselves take up the time of that committee. Our fellow-Representatives of this House come before us on behalf of this soldier and that soldier; it is their duty and their right to come; it is our pleasure to listen to them as they stand up to defend old soldiers who ask nothing but simple justice and fair treatment.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DRIGGS. Certainly. I am always willing to yield to so courteous a member as my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. As a member of Congress, is it not your experience that the applications coming to you to file bills for private pensions are usually accompanied by a letter of some pension attorney, who has told the man that he can not get a pension under the law and that he must go to Congress?

Mr. DRIGGS. Most emphatically, no, sir; that is not my experience.

Mr. SIMS. That is my experience, and I have the letters which will show it.

Mr. DRIGGS. I have never received a letter like that, and I have received letters from a great many old soldiers. I do not know the experiences of other members of this House, but speaking for myself, I do not recall that I have ever received a letter from a pension attorney in reference to one of these private pension bills.

Mr. SIMS. I do not mean a letter to the member, but a letter to the applicant, which he files with his letter.

Mr. DRIGGS. That may be, but they never come to me.

Now I will go on. They say this is a system of blackmail, that the old-soldier vote is held over the head of every Representative on the floor of this House if he does not vote for liberal pensions.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to go away back to one of the early Congresses and read to you the resolution which organized and authorized the establishment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It was found away back in 1830 that Congress had not the time to consider all pension claims which came before it; therefore in this Congress—that is, the Twenty-first Congress—in the second session, it decided to do away with one committee on pensions and erect two, and thus a resolution was passed under which this Committee on Invalid Pensions was organized. In that Congress Mr. Trezevant, a member, moved the following resolution on the 5th day of January, 1831:

> That a committee shall be added to the standing committees, to be appointed at the commencement of each session, which shall be called the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all such matters respecting invalid pensions as shall be referred to them by the House.

That resolution, then adopted, has continued in force from that on to this, very nearly seventy years, and during all that time it has been the duty of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to consider—what? To consider claims where an applicant for pension, not able, through some peculiar technicality in the law or some very singular decision of the medical referee, or the impossibility of producing sufficient evidence to prove his case, was to have the right to come to Congress as a court of last resort and ask our relief for their disability thus placed upon them in the Pension Bureau; and as such a committee—committee of last resort—the Committee on Invalid Pensions has done their duty to this House, to their constituencies, to their country, and its Treasury. Were we to report a bill favorably to this House at any one of these pension sessions which we had not investigated and considered thoroughly, and considered earnestly, and considered justly, we would not be entitled to the fair consideration of this House or the nation, because we would not have been performing our duty either capably or honestly.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the members of this House find it almost impossible from the reading of the reports as they are read from the desk, to understand all the different salient features of each one of these measures. I know, and I repeat, in our committee no bill can possibly pass through unless it has first passed the eyes of the expert examiner from the Pension Bureau, and after passing his eyes it then goes to the subcommittee, and the subcommittee carefully considers the brief which the pension expert has drawn, and then we decide in accordance with the resolution which established the Committee on Invalid Pensions as to whether the applicant is entitled to relief or not.

In every case reported to this House in the Fifty-fifth Congress the committee unanimously reported, and the reports were accepted and adopted by the House of Representatives without the changing or amending of a single report, and when they went over to the other end of this Capitol there were but 26 or 27 bills that went to a conference, showing that the two committees had done their work and that the Senate and the House had agreed to pension measures almost absolutely and unanimously. No blackmail or threats here, sir, for many members have no bills before us.

I would say, in addition, Mr. Chairman, we realize that these applications to Congress for relief are increasing, that in each year there are more and more of them. I desire to show, Mr. Chairman, why it is that these applications that have been coming into Congress are increasing.

I would say first, however, in reply to the conclusion of the above-quoted editorial, that not one private pension bill has up to the present time been enacted into law during this session, although a few have passed the Senate and House independently, but have not been acted upon jointly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Clerk will read the bill by sections.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire to ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to proceed with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DRIGGS. No; I have that consent, given last Friday night. I would like to ask for five minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be done in the committee, the order of the House being that general debate should close at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that leave be extended to all who have participated in the debate, for ten days.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have participated in the debate on this bill may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

Mr. DRIGGS. To resume, Mr. Chairman, I find, according to a most carefully prepared report of the ex-chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Hon. GEORGE W. RAY, that in the Fifty-second Congress there were 217 special acts passed; in the Fifty-third Congress there were 119 special acts passed; in the last Congress there were 693 special acts passed.

Now, then, what is the reason for this great increase? It is not difficult of explanation. Shortly after (October 15, 1890) the enactment of the act of June 27, 1890, the following order, known as No. 164, was issued by Commissioner Raum:

ORDER NO. 164.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., October 15, 1890.

In regard to fixing rates of pensions under the act of June 27, 1890:

That all claimants under the act of June 27, 1890, showing a mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, and which incapacitate them from the performance of manual labor, rendering them unable to earn a support in such a degree as would be rated under former laws at or above $6 and less than $12, shall be rated the same as like disabilities of service origin, and that all cases showing a pensionable disability which, if of service origin, would be rated at or above $12 per month shall be rated at $12 per month.

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Approved.

CYRUS BUSSEY, Assistant Secretary.

This order created, as events and time proved, an extremely liberal and generous construction of the act of June 27, 1890. It is well to remember that at the date of issuance of Order No. 164 no person in or out of public life knew anything as to the probable increase of expenditures for pensions under the law of June 27, 1890. So great, however, became the increase in the pension rolls that on June 9, 1893, Order No. 225, which follows, was issued:

ORDER NO. 225.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1893.

As to adjudicating and fixing rates of pensions under the act of June 27, 1890:

1. A claim for pension under the second section of the act of June 27, 1890, can only be allowed upon proof of mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of the claimant's own vicious habits, incapacitating him for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support.

2. No specific injury or disability can, as such, have a pensionable rating under that act, nor be considered otherwise than as it affects the capacity of the claimant to perform ordinary manual labor.

3. Proof that the disability is not the result of the claimant's own vicious habits is requisite; and therefore the causes and circumstances of the origin of the disability should be shown by the evidence furnished in support of the claim for pension, so far as can be done, and by persons other than the claimant.

4. To give the claimant a pensionable status under this act the disability must be such as to incapacitate him for the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support; yet the act recognizes differences in the degree of such pensionable disability, giving $12 per month in case of the greatest and $6 per month in case of the lowest degree of such pensionable disability rendering the claimant unable to earn a support by manual labor. It also provides for intermediate ratings proportioned to the intermediate degrees of such pensionable disability. The proper ratings under this act will, therefore, be made in accordance with such rules for rating as the medical referee shall prescribe, subject to the approval of the Commissioner.

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

Approved.

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

This order continues in force to the present day. While Order No. 164 was too liberal, Order No. 225 was and is too severe, for it practically leaves all cases considered under its provisions to the judgment and almost absolute authority of the medical referee. It makes him almost in reality the absolute dictator of the Pension Bureau as far as the act of 1890 is concerned. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to attack the medical referee, but solely the great power given him, or, more properly speaking, his office under Order 225.

It is this order alone that has created the necessity for almost all the special bills introduced in Congress, and so long as it continues in force Congress will be flooded with special pension bills. It is un-American, because it is unjust and unfair to those of our people seeking relief at the Pension Bureau. It is a thorn in the side of every member of Congress, for it keeps us busy calling up cases that would otherwise have been speedily adjudicated at the Pension Bureau. Born in a Democratic, continued in a Republican Administration, it has been tried and found wanting. It should be modified, amended, or repealed, and some order, a fair, equitable, and just medium between it and No. 164, issued.

I respectfully submit in emphasis to the above the following decision of Assistant Secretary Davis, of the Interior Department, in the case of Charles Norbury (Senate Document No. 1, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, page 36):

Order 164 was an extremely liberal construction of the law as to rating under the act of June 27, 1890; indeed, it could not be consistently maintained when the terms of the act were compared with former laws. On the other hand, Order No. 225, as put into effect and as formerly construed, went to the other extreme, and in many cases resulted in great injustice to claimants. This was remedied in a large measure by a more liberal construction of said order, which on its face is not regarded as objectionable, properly construed, but much depends upon how it is construed. * * *

It will be observed that in the last clause of order 225 the question of rating is left largely at the discretion of the medical referee, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions.

As already indicated, much depends upon the construction given to the law and the order (225) now in force.

It should be borne in mind that the average age of the surviving soldiers who were in the war of the rebellion is 63 or upward. It is not an unreasonable presumption that nearly all are in some degree mentally or physically disabled. The spirit of the law and the circumstances attending its enactment certainly warrant the conclusion that a liberal interpretation should be given and relief granted, at least at the minimum rate, if an appreciable disability which impairs ability for self-support by manual labor is shown to exist.

The repeal of order No. 225 needs no additional or stronger argument.

Mr. Chairman, another reason for increase of special pension bills is that the laws as they now exist can be construed in any manner desired, and I quote from Commissioner Evans's personal statement when being examined by Senator GALLINGER (Senate Document No. 1, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, page 9):

Commissioner EVANS. In my annual report for 1898 I said:

"Since the passage of the general law of July 14, 1862, there have been numerous laws amendatory, special and general, with the many rulings and decisions interpreting the laws, until the whole system is a most complex and wonderful network or labyrinth of laws and legal opinions, to the end that a precedent may be cited for any action of this Bureau.

"The importance of the work is such and the demands upon the revenues of the Government so great, with a prospect of much greater in the future, that I am of the opinion that in order to secure reliable, intelligent, and uniform practice in the future a commission should be appointed on the revision of the laws, rules, and regulations governing the issuance of pensions."

That was the statement on that subject in my annual report of 1898. In my report of 1899 I add this:

"This should be done, especially to meet future conditions. With our present laws and established practice there can be no uniformity in pensioning. The beneficiaries are dissatisfied and there is general criticism."

Revision of all the pension laws has become essential, the sooner the better. Revision unquestionably will be a tremendous and expensive task; but is it not better to commence the twentieth century with a feeling of general satisfaction in the justice and fairness of the pension laws and their administration instead of a feeling of general dissatisfaction?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the question of civil service was so thoroughly thrashed out in the last Congress, one year ago, that I did not suppose it was necessary to touch on it in this Congress, but the words which have been spoken by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in regard to the new information given here yesterday requires a moment's answer. The gentleman from Ohio stated that, as reported from the Committee on Appropriations, there were 10 per cent of inefficient employees, and he gave as the reason that the Departments did not get rid of those employees was that they did not dare to trust an application to the Civil Service Commission for new clerks, because they would get such poor ones, and they preferred to keep the old ones.

Now, if the gentleman had listened to the statement made by the Appropriations Committee yesterday, he would have heard them say that the reason these useless employees were retained was not for the reason he suggests, but was because Members of Congress and Senators went to the heads of Departments and insisted that these men, friends of theirs, should not be discharged. In other words, the system of patronage, the old system, which the gentleman says created such a model service up to 1883, that same system of patronage, of keeping friends in office, is responsible for the very retention of these useless employees to-day. And we are asked, when studying how to get rid of useless employees, to resort to the very system which retains them. If members of Congress would not exercise patronage, these men would be discharged. My colleague made the suggestion yesterday of one case where the Pension Commissioner said he would be glad to get rid of 100 men, but the members of Congress would not allow them to be discharged. In other words, it is in this case, as I think it is almost always where the civil-service system is attacked, it is attacked, not for its inherent faults, but for imperfections which the relics of the other system cause.

If in this case of decrepit employees the patronage system was done away with, we would have no trouble in getting rid of the old clerks and getting in good ones. There is one comparison we easily make right before us. It is claimed that 10 per cent of the clerks now employed are inefficient. I remember very well in the last Congress when one of the most influential members of this House, one who knows as much about the subject as anyone, said that of the employees in this House, where there is no civil service, but all are under the service which the gentleman so eulogizes, 33 per cent were unnecessary and useless, but they were employed because of the necessity of having patronage. We have here no limitations of civil service, and so just because we want the offices we create useless offices, and there are 33 per cent useless employees in this House against 10 per cent under the civil service.

Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to another point, which he referred to yesterday and which he repeated to-day, and where I think he is obviously mistaken. He says there is not the free right of removal, but there must be a trial and hearing, and that is one of the troubles of the service. I would like to read the rule formulated by President McKinley:

No removal shall be made from the competitive classified service except for just cause and for reasons given in writing; and the person sought to be removed shall have notice and be furnished a copy of such reasons, and be allowed a reasonable time for personally answering the same in writing.

Does that put any limitation upon the officer in regard to removal? All it requires is that the charge shall be made against the man, that he shall be removed for cause, and that he shall have an opportunity to put in his answer. But after he has put in his answer, the head of the Department may remove or not at his pleasure. It is not required that the man have any hearing. The officer is under no compulsion; he has absolute and free discretion, if he wants to discharge him. Of course the reason for that rule is obvious: it is to prevent any superior clerk, on account of petty spleen or any miserable little personalities, making false complaints and causing a removal when, if the clerk complained of had a chance to answer and the truth were known, he would keep his place, and also to prevent political removals.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I move to strike out the last two words.

It appears now, Mr. Chairman, that we have come to this: That we have put a farce on the records of this country—have said that no man shall be removed unless charges are preferred against him, and until he shall have a copy of those charges, and until he shall have opportunity to disprove them; but he may be removed whether those charges are true or false.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, is not that the most monstrous position that ever was taken? Why do you require the making of charges? Why do you require a trial? The gentleman says there is no trial about it. In other words, a poor fellow may be charged with some delinquency; he comes forward and answers that the charge is not true, that he is ready to disprove it, and he does disprove it; but this does not operate in the least as a protection from the power of removal. Notwithstanding all that he may do in the way of proving his innocence of the charges, he may be turned out regardless of whether they are true or false.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman find that limitation in the law? Does he not agree to the fact of its existence?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The plain construction of the law is that if the charges are not true the persons shall not be removed. That construction is put upon it in every Department of the Government.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman give that as his construction as a lawyer?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do most clearly. Suppose I am indicted; I have a right to see a copy of the indictment, to know what I am charged with; and if I prove myself not guilty, I have a right to go acquitted.

But let us see what else was said yesterday.

Mr. PEARRE. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Does he think it likely that the heads of the Departments and bureaus will appoint more competent men to the positions than those recommended by Members of Congress and Senators; in other words——

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reply to that, I will say that when they ask for the appointment of any particular class, they designate the kind of a man they want. If they want an accountant, they say to the gentleman, "Will you furnish me with an accountant?" and if they want an accountant you would not send them a laborer. It is the experience that Members of Congress and Senators, if given the opportunity to furnish a particular kind of man, furnish that kind.

In another place the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] says:

In reply to the gentleman's question, I can only say, with reference to this temporary force that has been employed, it is admitted by those who favor civil service and are at the heads of the different Departments that this temporary force, placed there within the last two or three years, is a very competent force; that they are more competent than the force secured through the civil service. They are younger men, men better qualified for the particular service to which they are assigned, and all along the line more efficient than the force secured through the civil service.

There is a testimony that every chief of division in this great city who knows about it will make, I think, whenever the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to get the information—that that great body of clerks who did the great business of this Government, who handled the great service of the Government during the extraordinary demands of the Spanish and the Philippine war; that the service of that force has been more efficient than anything ever obtained under civil-service procedure in this country.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Do I understand that the statement just made by the gentleman from Ohio is signed by every head of a Department?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say that it will be verified by every bureau chief.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The statement just read—by whom is that statement made?

Mr. GROSVENOR. By the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] in charge of this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Then it is not the statement of any chief of a bureau.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said that it would be confirmed by every bureau chief in the city who had these men in his division.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. How do you know that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know it from constant, everyday contact with those gentlemen.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman know that the efficiency of the Railway Mail Service has increased tremendously within the last ten years since that service was protected by civil-service regulations?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That service is better now than it ever was.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is better now than it ever was; and have I not always voted to retain this system in that branch of the service?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then you are talking about something else not now under discussion.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is occupying my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. But the gentleman was arguing that the service of clerks appointed without reference to civil-service requirements was better than the service of clerks appointed under civil-service regulations. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am stating what the record shows; and the testimony of every bureau chief in this city will back me up.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That testimony is not here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This testimony is here, coming from a member of this House who has this bill in charge and who says it is the testimony of these men who know.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Was it given before any committee?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman know any better testimony than this?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I want straighter testimony than the best which the gentleman seems to be able to give.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I read the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY].

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman allow me a word? We had before us Capt. C. H. Davis, of the Naval Observatory, who called attention to the fact that he had recently sent to the Civil Service Commission for an engineer, and they sent him a Methodist parson and a negro at that. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Exactly. A happy illustration of this whole thing, and I thank the gentleman for the information.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRIGGS] is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, another reason for the increase of special pension bills is the ever-increasing misunderstanding between the medical referee and the local boards of medical examiners.

I would like to add right here that in the report of Senator GALLINGER in response to a question asked the Commissioner of Pensions by the Senator, twice repeated, so that there could be no misunderstanding, as to the desirability of omitting from future appropriation bills the provision that the ratings made by the medical board shall be considered by the Bureau in reaching conclusions, he replied that he was emphatically in favor of omitting these ratings. Mr. Chairman, these medical boards come from all of our districts. Many of them are made up of the best physicians that can be found in our localities.

Mr. SIMS. You mean the local boards?

Mr. DRIGGS. I mean the local boards, for I judge Commissioner Evans so meant. I say the local boards have the very best physicians throughout the district. The soldier appears before them, and yet the medical referee in this year's report of the Commissioner of Pensions, says that there are but very few of these boards who are able to draw an adequate pen picture as to the disabilities of the soldiers who have appeared before them. I contend that the local medical boards are far more able and competent to judge of the disabilities of the soldiers and sailors, of men entitled to a pension, than some man in the Pension Bureau who acts as a sort of referee on that case. They are the most peculiar kind of referees I ever saw or heard of. They know nothing whatever about the applicant except from the evidence which is put before them, never having seen the soldier at all, and surely the physicians who personally examined the applicant for pension are far more capable of judging the disabilities than a physician not having had an actual eye study of the case.

I contend that the local boards are as careful in their examinations as are the examiners in the division of the medical referee. Why, sir, in hundreds of cases considered by our committee during the past three years we have found local board upon local board agreeing upon various disabilities and their reports afterwards rejected by the division of the medical referee. In nine cases out of ten we would overrule the referee and allow the claim, accepting the testimony of the local board as conclusive on the questions raised.

I do not believe such language as the following, taken from page 94 of the Report of the Commissioner of Pensions for 1899, is justifiable, viz:

It is the experience of the medical examiners and reviewers of the division that too many boards have very little appreciation of their duties and very little regard for the interest of either the claimant or the Government. It is too much a question with them of the number of examinations they make and the amount of fees that may be coming to them at the end of a quarter. The whole system of employment of the members of the boards of examining surgeons is faulty in this, that it fails to guarantee the best talent for these places. And so long as influence shall alone determine who shall be appointed, the Bureau will fail to secure the best results.

This is part of report of medical referee.

I do not believe local boards are infallible, but I do believe their errors are no more numerous than those of the division of the medical referee. I desire to cite one case, and others could be shown had I the time. The case referred to is from Senate Document No. 1, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, page 37, to wit, the witness before the committee a Mr. Patrick:

But the second case was that of Born, to which I have referred. The medical examination in that case showed that this applicant was disabled to the extent of 50 per cent in the use of his right shoulder from crepitus, and the disability was rated by the examiner at nine-eighteenths. He was also reported as suffering from hemorrhoids and similar troubles, for which the medical board had rated him at six-eighteenths disability. For some other infirmities that I do not recall he was rated as having been disabled to the extent of six-thirtieths. This claim had been rejected, and it seemed to our unprofessional view that it should have been allowed had the disabilities been properly combined.

At our request the medical referee was sent for, and he came in and we discussed at considerable length the first disability which he thought did not establish a pensionable status. But when we passed to the second he very promptly stated that when combining the effects of the first and second disabilities, and taking into consideration perhaps also the third, the application ought to have been allowed. He also stated that two months prior to that time he had placed a competent and careful member of his staff in charge of such cases to overlook them after they had been passed upon by the medical examiners in his office, so as to see that no injustice had been or might be done, and that every case in which the disabilities ought to have been combined should be so rated, because these small cases did not come personally before the medical referee. He stated that this particular case had been adjudicated during the temporary absence of the official whom he had placed in charge; and I think that he expressed the opinion that but for such absence that claim would doubtless have been allowed.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in fair play, and also in the theory that there are two sides to every question. I therefore quote each of the above. I contend that in the Pension Bureau at the small salaries paid it is an absolute impossibility to obtain the best medical talent for the examination or review of cases or for the pen pictures or portrayal of the cases, and the best examinations are those made by the local boards and not by the Pension Bureau. And so long as influence shall alone determine who shall be appointed in the division of medical referee in Washington in the Pension Bureau the Bureau will fail to secure the best results.

Mr. SIMS. I understand the gentleman to say that the best medical talent is found on the local boards.

Mr. DRIGGS. Yes, I do say so.

Mr. SIMS. Now, in your city of New York can the best medical talent be obtained to work for $10 a day?

Mr. DRIGGS. By no means.

Mr. SIMS. That is all they can get on a local board.

Mr. DRIGGS. I am aware of that.

Mr. SIMS. But they can not get more than $10 a day, because if they examine more than five cases they do not get paid for it.

Mr. DRIGGS. That is the case. But they have their own private practice; they are largely not political appointees; they are all good physicians and surgeons; certainly 90 per cent of them are. I believe that a very decided reform or even a revolution of the methods of examination now in vogue in the divisions of medical examination (referee and local board alike) would be productive of very beneficial results to the pensioner, to the country, and to the Treasury of the United States.

From all the above argument taken collectively I have endeavored to show how and why a committee of Congress can pass upon a pension claim as fairly, honestly, and wisely as the trained experts of the Pension Bureau.

The pension question has ever attracted the attention of our Republic. Many debates have occurred in Congress upon the subject, and thousands of columns have been printed in the Annals, Globe, and RECORD recording for all time these debates. Why, sir, in 1820 the agitation was so great that Congress passed the famous "alarm act," which provided that "every pensioner shall exhibit a schedule of his whole estate and income, clothing and bedding excepted."

In 1830-1835 more discussion; 1850-1855 more agitation; so it has continued to the present day. How much have we paid out for pensions?

It is impossible for me to deal with more than our four great wars while considering amount of pensions paid.

I. REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

In all 278,000 soldiers served during the struggle for freedom. Of this number 37,918 received pensions amounting to $49,000,000, and to this day we see from the following table that some of their descendants are on the list. (Pension Commissioner's Report 1899, page 61.)

*Daughter; pensioned by special act.

Hiram Cronk, who served with the troops from New York, is the only surviving pensioned soldier of the war of 1812. He is 99 years of age, and resides in northwestern New York.

Daniel F. Bakeman, the last survivor of the war of the Revolution, was born in Schoharie County, N. Y., September 28, 1759; died in Freedom, Cattaraugus County, N. Y., April 5, 1869, aged 109 years 6 months and 8 days.

To the widows of the Revolution were paid about $20,000,000, making a total of $69,000,000.

II. WAR OF 1812.

Total enlistments were 527,654. Of this number 296,916 served sixty days or more, and 31,000 of them have been pensioned, and 35,000 widows have been pensioned.

III. MEXICAN WAR.

Total enlistments were 73,260. Of this number 7,560 were pensioned as invalids prior to the act of January 29, 1887. Since the passage of that act I have been unable to find any statistics showing greatest number of pensioners on account of Mexican war, but as the number of surviving pensioners is 17,379, the percentage of pensioners to enlistments must have been very great. Taking the total number of pensioners in the Mexican war, viz, 32,000, the percentage would be over 43 per cent of the enlistments. The expenditure in money, or total disbursements, is shown in the following table (page 52, Report Pension Commissioner, 1899):

IV. CIVIL WAR.

Total enlistments, 2,778,304; died in battle or of wounds, 349,944. On account of the tremendous magnitude of the civil war the pension disbursements resulting from that war have been enormous, amounting to over $2,300,000,000 since 1865, while the number of pensioners on the roll to-day is 991,519 (there were only 13,000 on the roll in 1850). Collectively there have been 2,271,705 claims filed, 1,616,391 allowed, leaving 655,314 rejected. Deducting 991,519 from 1,616,391, we find over 625,000 of those pensioned have passed over the dark river.

Number of claims pending under the acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1873.

Original invalid	26,468

Army nurses		268
Service prior to March 4, 1861		2,453
Accrued		22,059
Total		477,239

While this seems a great number, the decreases have exceeded the increases, as shown by the following table:

While the decrease is only 2,195, it is nevertheless a decrease, and I believe we have, notwithstanding our Spanish and Philippine war claims, passed hight-water mark and are now on the ebb tide. I believe, too, from figures and from the average life of man, that in 1915 the pension roll, as it now is formed and exists, will amount to less than $80,000,000 per annum.

Many people think the nation's pension roll is heavy with fraud. Strange, indeed, would it be were there not some fraud; but, all in all, I believe that that roll is honest and almost without reproach. Take, if you please, and consider this report of criminal cases in the various Departments of the Government—possibly you have not noticed the last annual report of the Attorney-General. If not, get one, and look at the subhead "Criminal prosecutions," which shows convictions, acquittals, etc., on account of violation of different laws, as follows:

	Convictions.	Acquittals.	Nol. pros., etc.
Internal-revenue laws	4,021	825	1,698
Post-office laws	770	92	344
Customs laws	136	21	59
Pension laws	109	17	88

Of the prosecutions still pending July 1, 1899, 4,889 were for violation of internal-revenue laws, 755 post-office laws, 112 customs laws, and 196 pension laws.

It occurs to me that there is food for thought in the foregoing, in view of the fact that in the papers in Washington, surely, and, so far as I have observed, in the metropolitan press everywhere, there has been but little notice of the frauds, indictments, and prosecutions generally going on throughout the country except those relating to pensions. These have been regularly ground out from day to day and week to week, as you have doubtless all noticed.

I freely confess that before my election as Representative to Congress I believed in the "pension-fraud" cry. Since my admittance to this House my views have entirely changed, for such reports as those of the Attorney-General are bound to appeal to any fair-minded person. I believe the pension roll is in many, many ways a roll of honor, and one to be respected and not universally condemned. The cases of suffering relieved are many; the cases of fraud few.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I realize that pension payments have been almost inconceivably stupendous, but the service performed has been equally great. Had it not been for the soldiers of the Revolution, we would have had no Republic; had it not been for the soldiers and sailors of 1812, we would not be to-day free upon the high seas; had it not been for the soldiers of the Mexican war, we would not have remained the great North American power; had it not been for the boys in blue of 1861–1865, we would have been a disunited Union, while the soldiers and sailors of 1898 established us firmly as a world power.

The pension roll has increased during the past seven years more largely from the fact that the soldiers of the 1861–1865 struggle, through advancing age, are less able to earn their daily sustenance by manual labor. In their days of strong young and middle manhood, when each succeeding day dawned upon continued ambition for old-age competency, their thoughts dwelt not upon pensions, but upon work. Old age has now overtaken many of them; the struggled for competency has not been poured into their coffers by Dame Fortune, and at last their thoughts have turned to Uncle Sam to make their declining years easier and a trifle happier.

Pensions are not a question of dollars alone. To carry out the letter and spirit of the pension laws should be one of the objects in their administration. Fairness, based on justice, ought to actuate the Interior Department in their execution. No worthy case should be passed over as unworthy; neither under any circumstances should an unworthy applicant be given consideration. There should be no petty quibbling and hairsplitting over minor details of no material importance, causing delay, annoyance, and bitterness.

If the case is just, grant it; if unjust, reject it. Through lapse of years, the death of comrades, or a weakened mental or physical condition the applicant for pension frequently finds it impossible to furnish all the proof required by the Department and his claim is rejected. Construe the laws fairly for the benefit of the soldier and the United States alike and no one complains; construe them differently and press, people, and soldier shout aloud their denunciation of the pension laws. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE.

For compensation of Senators, $450,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for five minutes on the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I wish to say a word regarding the statement which was made here a moment ago, coming from the gentleman in charge of the bill before the House [Mr. HEMENWAY], regarding the certification of persons for different positions in the United States Government.

I have never heard of any such experience as the gentleman has related, and I do not think any such thing has occurred in our section of the country. He stated that a head of Department asked for an engineer, and a Methodist minister—and a negro, at that—was certified. I can not understand how any gentleman who may be a Methodist preacher could pass an examination as an engineer if the examination for engineer in the particular section of country that this gentleman came from is of the same sort as is required in the New England States. I am a firm believer in the civil-service law as far as this law applies to positions above the grade of mechanics and laborers.

As I stated a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the statements made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I have seen it repeatedly stated in the public press and in the reports of the Post-Office Department that the efficiency of the Railway Mail Service has increased greatly since this department came under the civil-service law; a very small fraction of 1 per cent of mistakes are made by the clerks employed in that service compared to the large percentage of mistakes that were made before the operation of a civil-service law. I wish at this time to indicate to the members of this House how the civil-service law is carried on for positions in the United States Government departments in the city of Boston.

In the post-office department there every man who takes an examination for a position in the post-office, whether it is for the position of letter carrier or clerk or for any other position, is given his appointment in the order of the percentage that he receives.

Beginning with the administration of General Corse, under Mr. Cleveland when he served his first term, the man who passed the best examination for letter carrier and clerk was appointed.

There is a list exposed in the post-office, and if five men, for instance, have been appointed within the last few months, it will be found that the names of those five men are the names of those who are first on the list. It is the same way in the matter of the appointment of clerks. The same practice was followed by the gentleman who succeeded General Corse, Hon. Thomas M. Hart, who is now the mayor of Boston.

His course was followed by the Democratic postmaster who succeeded him, and he in turn by the Republican postmaster, so that in the appointments in the Boston post-office service—and I think the same thing obtains in the Boston custom-house—the poor boy has as much chance as the boy with political influence, if he shows from his examination his capacity and his ability to meet the requirements of the position.

I think this condition of affairs reflects the sentiments of the people of our section of the country on this question, as the different postmasters in taking this action felt undoubtedly that the people of Boston demanded that the civil-service law should be enforced in letter as well as in spirit.

Mr. Chairman, I say that I believe in that practice. In these days, when trusts are getting control of private businesses and thousands of men are thrown out of employment, it is a gratifying, and, I say, a wise arrangement, and a necessary and proper precaution, that the Government takes in giving out and apportioning the places within its gift to exact a civil-service examination for the place.

It is proper to exact an educational test and then appoint the men in the order of their merit and fitness for the position as shown in their examination.

In this way the boy and girl who, through the advantage they obtain in the great public-school systems of our country, become proficient in education and learning and fit themselves for positions of trust and responsibility in the Government service are enabled to secure positions on fitness and merit rather than through favoritism or political consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

For expenses of compiling, preparing, and indexing the Congressional Directory, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, $1,200.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 20, after the word "the," insert the word "present."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under Architect of the Capitol: For chief engineer, $1,700; 2 assistant engineers, at $1,200 each; 4 conductors of elevators, at $1,100 each, who shall be under the supervision and direction of the Architect of the Capitol; laborer, $820; 5 firemen, at $900 each; electrician, $1,200; laborer, $1,000; laborer to clean Statuary Hall and watch statuary therein, $660; in all, $16,680.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 12 and offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to return to page 12. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, after the word "each," in line 6, insert: "Document and bill clerk under resolution of February 2, 1900, $1,600;" and in line 18 strike out "eighty-six thousand seven" and insert "eighty-eight thousand three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to committees: For clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means, $3,000; assistant clerk, $1,600; messenger, $1,200; janitor, $720; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $3,000; assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,000; messenger and assistant clerk, $1,200; clerks to Committees on Accounts, Agriculture, Banking and Currency, Claims, District of Columbia, Elections, Foreign Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Indian Affairs, Invalid Pensions, Judiciary, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Public Buildings and Grounds, Public Lands, Rivers and Harbors, War Claims, and clerk to continue Digest of Claims under resolution of March 7, 1888, at $2,000 each; and for assistant clerk to the Committee on War Claims, $1,200; in all, $53,920.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, at the end of line 19, insert "pensions;" and in line 24 strike out "fifty-three" and insert "fifty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For 18 clerks to committees at $6 each per day during the session, $13,068.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, line 25, strike out "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof "seventeen;" and on page 14, in line 1, strike out "$13,068" and insert "$13,342."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture, including partitions, screens, and shelving, $30,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8347 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GAMBLE, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WHITE, for Friday and Saturday, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The Committee on War Claims was discharged from the consideration of Executive Document No. 432, being letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communications from certain officials of the Treasury relating to claims of employees for work done overtime during the war with Spain, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—PEARSON AGAINST CRAWFORD.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the resolution that was adopted at the time of filing the majority report in the matter of the contested-election case of Pearson against Crawford, giving the minority of the committee ten days within which to file their views, I desire to file the views of the minority, and ask that they be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana submits the following privileged report, pursuant to order of the House, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Case of Pearson against Crawford.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority will be ordered printed and referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Paymaster-General and draft of a bill relating to relief of Paymaster F. S. Dodge—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation relating to the estates of American citizens dying abroad—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 16, 1900.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. FAIRBANKS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

PUBLIC RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES IN CUBA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 17th ultimo, a statement showing the receipts from customs, postal service, internal revenue, and miscellaneous sources from the date of the occupation of Cuba by the military forces of the Government; January 1, 1899, to December 31, 1899, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON. I hope that motion will not be adopted. We have so many important matters that we ought to be in session to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not open to debate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4006) to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 5288) relating to lights on steam pilot vessels; and

A bill (H. R. 7739) to amend an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall ask the leave of the Senate to submit some remarks upon the various bills and resolutions relating to the Philippine Islands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOSTER presented a petition of the Sunday school of the First Christian Church, of Olympia, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquor in the Hawaiian Islands; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Homer Hill, president, and Miss M. E. Pike, secretary, on behalf of the Woman Suffrage Association of Washington, praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of United States citizens on account of sex, and remonstrating against the insertion of the word "male" in the suffrage clause of the constitution to be framed for the government of Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. QUARLES presented the petition of Henry Halverson and 40 other citizens of Dodgeville, Wis., praying for the establishment of an Army veterinary corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Nebraska, praying for the establishment of an Army veterinary corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McBRIDE. I present a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Oreg., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to veterans of certain Indian wars. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

The Chamber of Commerce of the city of Seattle respectfully presents to Congress the propriety of giving pensions to the men engaged in the early Indian wars of the nation. These men were pioneers of the country. They blazed the way for those who came later. They cleared the first land; they built the first houses, opened the first schools, inaugurated the first business ventures, and were first to make the country habitable for men and valuable for the Government. Here, in what was then Oregon, when the United States all but spurned and rejected them, they formed a little Republic of their own, made their own laws, their own money, their own postal affairs, and, in determined opposition to a great and aggressive foreign power, held the country for the American nation and people. It was a wonderful thing for such a handful of people to do. The worth of what they did was beyond calculation or estimation. The lesson of patriotism they taught was priceless, indeed.

The nation can not be too grateful nor say nor do too much in return. These people had the experience of all American pioneers. The Indian race and the white race clashed. There was war between them. In that war, or those wars, the settlements of the white men were destroyed. Their houses were burned, their domestic animals driven off and slaughtered, their own lives taken whenever and wherever possible in the merciless effort to exterminate them. The men rose in a body, and fought the savages bravely and determinedly. As elsewhere from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the fittest survived, and, as the result of the exertions of these pioneers, the country is now one of the best portions of our fair land without division or question. No men did more for their country than these first men of Oregon and Washington. That their efforts should so long have gone unrewarded—nay, been received ungratefully—is beyond comprehension and far from creditable to the Government and the people who were the real beneficiaries.

Most of them were financially ruined in the wars, and few of them ever received compensation for their losses. Even for the property taken by the Government they were generally inadequately paid, while for their services in the field they got less than half what was paid Californians similarly engaged about the same time. They fought for their country as truly as the men who fought in the civil war and in the war with Spain. The few who survive are now old men and women, from 60 to 90 years of age, most of them needy, some of them living upon the charity of the public, and all deserving of the best the nation has to give to its most honorable sons and daughters.

The Seattle chamber prays for the passage of Senate bill No. 340, to grant pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars from 1817 to 1856.

The memorial foregoing was presented to the chamber of commerce at its regular meeting February 7, 1900, and adopted by vote of all members present.

[SEAL.] THOS. W. PROSCH, Secretary.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the National Live Stock Exchange, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the National Live Stock Exchange, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called oleomargarine bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Christian Endeavor Society of Batavia, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of beer and intoxicating liquors in buildings and grounds owned by the Government, and also to suppress gambling in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

HENRY W. LEE.

Mr. THURSTON. I have here certain papers transmitted by the Secretary of the Interior to the Indian Affairs Committee, pertaining to the case of Henry W. Lee, together with a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he states that they are additional papers submitted in answer to a resolution of the Senate of January 9. A portion of the papers were transmitted and ordered printed, and were printed, and I present these papers and move that they also may be printed to accompany those formerly printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 66) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain claims of the State of Indiana, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3131) to amend section 4438 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the officers of steam vessels, to ask that that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce. The bill came from the Attorney-General's Office, where I suppose it was drawn; at any rate, it came to us from there, and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary inadvertently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHOUP (for Mr. BAKER), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2961) granting an increase of pension to Michael Lochard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. BAKER), from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2962) granting an increase of pension to William Blades, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KENNEY introduced a bill (S. 3200) granting a pension to John P. Hinsley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3201) to correct the military record of James S. Coyle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3202) to correct the military record of John Green; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT of New York introduced a bill (S. 3203) for the relief of the widow of Chaplain John R. Mathews, deceased, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER introduced a bill (S. 3204) for the relief of L. A. Davis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3205) for the relocation of certain tracks of street railways in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 3206) granting an increase of pension to Moses King, jr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 3207) approving a revision and adjustment of certain sales of Otoe and Missouria lands in the States of Nebraska and Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. THURSTON. In connection with the bill I present a letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting it to the Indian Affairs Committee, which I ask may be printed with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. QUARLES introduced a bill (S. 3208) for the erection of a public building at Green Bay, Wis.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 3209) providing for the execution of new bonds and release of sureties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3210) authorizing the appointment and retirement of David McMurtrie Gregg as a captain in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 3211) to authorize the construction of an addition to the public building at Hartford, Conn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 3212) to grant certain lands to the city of Miles City; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 3213) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Jerome; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3214) for the relief of the Central College; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salaries of the Second and Third Assistant Secretaries of State from $4,000 to $4,500, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURSTON presented an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1639) making appropriation to pay the judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of the New York Indians, and providing for distribution of same; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SEIZURES OF COTTON.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask that Senate Executive Document No. 23, Forty-third Congress, second session, being a report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a Senate resolution of December 18, 1873, in relation to the number of bales of cotton seized under orders from that Department after the close of the civil war, be reprinted. I will state that this document is frequently asked for, and I understand the copy I have in my hand is the only one in the Capitol. There should be a reprint of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks for a reprint of the document named by him. Without objection, the order to reprint will be made.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN CITY OF WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the vacancy on the part of the Senate upon the Joint Committee on the Centennial of the Establishment of the Seat of Government in Washington be filled by the President pro tempore; and

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MCMILLAN.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to introduce a resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules. Perhaps I may be allowed to read it instead of having it read at the desk. It is merely a resolution for reference.

If I may be permitted to make one statement, the Senate has formed a habit for its own convenience of dispensing altogether with the reading the Journal. Heretofore, that has only been done under great pressure of business near the close of a session. Now, at nearly every session sometimes important errors or omissions are discovered in the Journal at its morning reading and corrected by the Senate, but there is no opportunity for that if this practice continues. It seems to me either that it would be the duty of some Senator to object always to these requests or to have some understanding that where the Journal is not read there shall be a subsequent opportunity to call attention to any error in it. I desire to move this resolution:

Resolved, That when on any day the reading of the Journal or of any part thereof shall be dispensed with, it shall be in order for any Senator, when the Journal shall be read on any subsequent day, to call attention to any error therein, and to propose any correction thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the resolution has been read by the Senator, it will be referred without further reading to the Committee on Rules.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. MCBRIDE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coast Defenses be, and it hereby is, authorized to employ an assistant clerk to be paid from the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum.

SOUTH CAROLINA STATE CLAIMS.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to reexamine the account between the United States and the State of South Carolina, growing out of the claim for moneys expended by said State for military purposes in the Florida war of 1836 and 1837, and to report to the Senate of the United States, as follows:

First. What amount was paid said State by the United States on said claim, stating date of payments and under what acts of Congress said payments were made.

Second. What amount of interest would have been due said State on the amounts paid June 8, 1854, and September 30, 1855, by the United States at dates of payment, and what amount of interest would be due on said amounts June 30, 1901.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4006) to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over by agreement from a former day.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. ALLEN, providing for a special committee to make thorough and complete investigation of all dealings and transactions between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of New York, etc.

Mr. SPOONER. That resolution, of course, will be debated, and the Senator who introduced it is not present this morning. I do not think it should be taken up in his absence, and I suggest that it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair also lays before the Senate the following resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. PETTIGREW, expressing sympathy for the South African Republic and our best hopes for the full success of their determined contest for liberty.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from South Dakota is not here. I ask that that resolution take the same order as the other, that it go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair also lays before the Senate the following resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. ALLEN, extending the sympathy of the United States to the people of the South African Republic in their heroic struggle for liberty and popular government.

Mr. LODGE. I make the same request, for the same reason, in regard to that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LIEUT. HORACE P. M'INTOSH.

Mr. MCENERY. Mr. President——

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator from Louisiana will permit me, I should like to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 854) for the relief of Lieut. Horace P. McIntosh. It is a brief bill which passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. MCENERY. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Indiana for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill indicated by him. It will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place Lieut. Horace P. McIntosh, of the United States Navy, on the retired list of the Navy, at a salary equal to 75 per cent of the sea pay of his grade at the time of his retirement, to take effect January 1, 1899.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUARTERMASTERS' SUPPLIES FOR THE ARMY, ETC.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MCENERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEWELL. Yesterday I reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill from the War Department which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] wished to investigate. He has now satisfied himself that it is perfectly correct, and I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6267) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes." The bill was read yesterday and objected to by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from New Jersey informs the Chair that the Senator from Maine withdraws the objection he made to the consideration of the bill yesterday.

Mr. HALE. Yes, Mr. President, I have examined the bill, and I find that it is only a continuation of the suspensions of last year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT FOR LOST COUPONS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MCENERY. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 392) to pay the General Marine Insurance Company of Dresden the sum of $1,434.12 for certain coupons detached from United States bonds, which said coupons were lost on the Cunard steamship Oregon, sunk at sea March 14, 1886. It is a bill that will excite no debate whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate in full for its information.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is a single amendment to it.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask one question. Is that an American company or a foreign company?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. A foreign company.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then ought not the securities to be residents of the United States?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They are subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and there is an amendment which makes the security twice the face value of the coupons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 3, line 3, after the word "indemnity," to insert "in double the amount of the face value of such coupons;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That before the redemption of said coupons the said General Marine Insurance Company of Dresden shall execute, or cause to be executed and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury a bond of indemnity, in double the amount of the face value of such coupons, with good and sufficient security, subject to the approval of said Secretary, to secure the United States against loss or damage in consequence of the redemption of said coupons.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems to me the securities ought to be residents of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Secretary of course would insist on that.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. McENERY. I now ask that the joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the joint resolution before the Senate. It will be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. BACON December 18, 1899, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of war, the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

SEC. 2. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to permanently incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government; and the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands.

SEC. 3. That the United States having accepted the cession of the Philippine Islands from Spain, and having by force of arms overthrown all organized authority and opposition to the authority of the United States therein, the duty and obligation rest upon the United States to restore peace and maintain order throughout the same; to protect in said islands the enjoyment of life and property and the pursuit of lawful avocations; and to continue such protection until the power and duty to maintain said protection shall have been transferred and intrusted by the United States to a government of the people of said islands deemed capable and worthy to exercise said power and discharge said duty.

SEC. 4. That when armed resistance to the authority of the United States shall have ceased within said islands, and peace and order shall have been restored therein, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, so soon thereafter as the same can be practically and safely accomplished, to provide the opportunity and prescribe the method for the formation of a government by and of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be thereafter independently exercised and controlled by themselves, it being the design of the United States to accord to the people of said islands the same measure of liberty and independence which have been pledged by the Congress of the United States to the people of Cuba.

SEC. 5. That when a stable government shall, by the method aforesaid, have been duly formed and erected in said islands, competent and worthy, in the judgment of the United States, to exercise the powers of an independent government and to preserve peace and maintain order within its jurisdiction, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, reserving to themselves only such harbors and tracts of land as may be needed for coaling stations or other governmental purposes, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights and territory secured in said islands under the treaty with Spain, and to thereupon leave the dominion and control of the islands to their people.

SEC. 6. That when said government has been thus formed and set up in the Philippine Islands and approved by the United States, it is the design and intention of the United States, through such means and measures as may be deemed most efficient and appropriate, to secure the guaranty of the continued independence of the same.

Mr. McENERY. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate with a lengthy discourse on the Philippine problem. It is a difficult one which time alone can solve. Everything in those islands is chaotic. We know but little about the geography of the country, its inhabitants, their social, political, and moral conditions, and we are not prepared to say whether they are in all respects equal to the inhabitants of the republics south of us when they declared independence. All of these people who have tried self-government have no conception of liberty regulated by law, but their appreciation of it is in disorder and revolution.

The Spaniards, when they quit the Philippines, knew as little about them as we know. Our military commanders can give no idea of their social and political condition in peace, as they have been confronted with a state of war since our precarious possession of the islands. Order is established and a government organized one day, to be succeeded the next by anarchy and revolution. Men there accept offices and make a solemn declaration of patriotism and allegiance to the Government, to be broken at the first opportunity which they think is favorable for a defiance of the authority of our Government.

We know just about what is contained in some newspaper almanac; that the Philippine group numbers some 2,000 islands; that the land area is about 140,000 square miles; that the island of Luzon is about the size of the State of New York; that Mindanao is nearly as large; that the population is from 7,600,000 to 10,000,000, and that racially the population is Malay; that of this population probably 2,000,000 are civilized, or, it would be more accurate to say, semicivilized, and the rest of the population is as ignorant and savage as the aboriginal Indian. Very little is known of the resources of the archipelago. They produce cotton, hemp, rice, sugar, tobacco, and fruits, all of which will, if the islands are annexed, come here and destroy our industries in these agricultural products. Of cotton, although not now produced, it is said enough was at one time raised for domestic consumption. The islands, so it is said, are as well adapted to cotton culture as are the fields of Georgia and Mississippi. If annexed and tariff broken down, it will be brought here because of the cheaper production, and cotton mills will be established there and cotton raised and manufactured near the demand for the manufactured articles, thus interfering with the establishment of cotton mills in the South and damaging those in the New England and Middle States.

The all-absorbing question is, What are we to do with these islands, and what policy shall the United States pursue toward them? I think it unfortunate that the results of the war with Spain have thrown them upon our hands. I do not believe that they were ripe fruit and through providential aid were dropped into our lap. They are to us Dead Sea fruit. It would have been well if Admiral Dewey had been ordered to leave Manila after his victory and Spain and the Filipinos left to fight it out. All the papers in the country, all the people of the United States, were silent as to Dewey's future course and the policy of the Administration after the announcement of the great achievement of Admiral Dewey. His departure immediately after the destruction of the Spanish fleet would have been declared an abandonment of the fruits of his victory. All remember with what enthusiasm the people received the announcement of every utterance of the great Admiral when he remained there guarding the approaches to Manila and warning away all whom he considered intermeddlers. It was said he was as great in diplomacy as in battle. On February 4, 1899, Aguinaldo attacked the American defenses at Manila. From that time until now there has been war with the Filipinos. If they had, as asserted, a government, it has been swept out of existence. Their army as an organized force has been destroyed and a guerrilla war inaugurated by the remnants.

It may be that Aguinaldo is great—the Washington of the Orient—but he is now a fugitive, with no hope of ever organizing a government unless this Government takes hold of him and puts him in power. It is not likely to do this. Events have followed rapidly since the declaration of war. They have not shaped themselves as we wished. Results have followed that no one foresaw, and we are now confronted with conditions which we did not make, but which have come to us as all events in history come. Social and political forces move silently and as powerfully as the glacier. The crash may come, the valleys may be destroyed, but who could detect the silent disturbance of the equilibrium that carried death and destruction? So it is with the moving forces in history. We are unconscious at the time of some small but momentous fact, something that escaped the attention of the masses, but years after they become apparent to the historian. Who thought that the war with Spain would have brought such results? Who believed that when Dewey sailed with orders to destroy the Spanish fleet that from a single victory the world's history and geography would be changed, an empire dismembered, and a new one erected in its place; that the traditions of a liberty, home-government, loving people would be disregarded, the policy of a great Republic changed, with tendencies to erect it into an imposing empire? Who is now responsible? On whose conscience rests the war with Spain? for from that has resulted the consequences which some of us now deplore, although we actually aided in bringing them about.

If the Filipinos were our allies and in haste and without cause inaugurated a war that is disastrous to their hopes of independence in the near future, who has helped to destroy the high hopes which these people once cherished? The Congress of the United States, irrespective of party, with unanimity declared war against Spain; with unanimity and with enthusiasm it voted supplies, raised money, and built ships, and with the same unanimity has voted supplies, ships, and money and men for the subjection of the Filipinos to the authority of the United States. Why, then, when we have voted all these requisites of war, should we interfere and prevent their effective use? Why embarrass an Administration that is endeavoring to carry out the will of Congress?

In my opinion, under existing circumstances, it is the duty of the Government to assert its authority over those islands. I do not know of any one in this Congress who asserts that we ought at this time to withdraw our troops from the Philippines. There is, I think, a disposition to vote all the supplies, men, money, and ships that are needed to establish the authority of the United States over the Philippines. I believe this to be the universal sentiment of the people of the United States.

I am opposed, Mr. President, to expansion. I am opposed to this Government annexing territory beyond its natural boundaries. I reiterate everything I said in my speech during the session of the Fifty-fifth Congress in opposition to receiving into our domain the Republic of Hawaii. Nature has set boundaries for nations. They are marked by oceans, rivers, and mountains. It has given them voice and language to mark also the distinctive places of their dwelling. They are homes set apart for them by the Almighty, and no nation has a right to trespass upon them. There is a relation between the land and the people in the character of their intelligence, their physical organization, and their faith. I do not think we have the right to dispossess the Filipinos of the home given to them by the Giver of all things. I do not think we ought to disturb their faith, destroy their intelligence, or alter their physical conditions. We are not, and no other nation is, the evangelist of the gospel of truth and justice. God made the world and the people in it according to His liking, and He has not commanded this nation to disturb His plans and purposes.

The moment the white man came in contact with this inferior race the assertion of his supremacy began, and it is only a question of time when he will exterminate and destroy the inferior. He has accomplished this in Hawaii. Three hundred thousand natives of those islands have dwindled to 40,000 of poor, diseased, helpless humanity. It will take a longer time to destroy eight or ten million of people, but time will efface them when in contact with the Anglo-Saxon race, and as it goes on disease and corruption will increase. The white man may get rich, his government from his accumulations may for a time be prosperous, as Spain was at the zenith of her colonial power, but the evils of foreign conquest, of crime and corruption, of debauchery and mismanagement, will sap the foundations of government, and the home people and government will, if not so corrupt and debauched, give way to indolence and indifference to the high and ennobling teachings of liberty and become a prey to the ambitious and the unscrupulous. Long possession of the Philippines, with an alien government over them, the inhabitants subjected to the arbitrary sway of a military dictator, preyed upon and defrauded by men who go there for that purpose and who make law the instrumentality for oppression, will not only affect those unhappy people, but in the course of time will become the rule of conduct of our own people.

The warning of this condition of affairs in those distant islands comes to us from the repeated assertion that their continuous possession by the United States is necessary for the enrichment of our people in the extension of trade. While adventurers there will thrive, prosper, and get rich, our home people will be the sufferers. They will export to the United States hemp, tobacco, rice, and cotton, and we will send nothing there that will profit us. They will raise everything and manufacture everything they eat and drink and wear. You may send to them reapers, plows, machinery, cotton gins, and sugar mills, but you will be furnishing them with the means of increased production of agricultural products which we produce here, and, with machinery and cheap labor, they will drive from the markets our farm products and manufactured articles. There are new phases to be introduced into our economic conditions by the annexation of foreign territory.

Free trade is to take the place of protection. Foreign possessions which will have unlimited agricultural products for export will destroy to a great extent the farming interests of the country. Fruits, tobacco, vegetables, sugar, and rice will be produced by the new territories and exported in quantities, and deprive the farmer of his share of the benefits under the tariff law.

Reciprocity treaties have already been negotiated which will injure the farmer and will favor some manufacturer. Reduced tariff with Puerto Rico against the interest of the farmer and for the protection of the manufacturer will extend to Cuba, to the Philippines, to all the possessions we may hereafter acquire in the Pacific and in China. I contend that the protection we offer the farmer under the system of protection will yield greater wealth than all the advantages that can be gained by free trade with the Tropics.

The cry of humanity will be raised in behalf of Cuba and the Philippines, as it has been done in the interest of Puerto Rico. Why go abroad to relieve distress while in doing so we bring it to our own doors? Our farmers would soon be calling for relief; vacant farms, idle hands, distressed sons and daughters will appeal for help in louder tones than come from across the sea.

Labor is unsettled, restless, and dissatisfied and threatening. The cities of the Union are crowded with the idle from no fault of their own. There is cold and hunger, disease and death, from want of work. It is in the power of the Government to give it. The sums which are expended for the military, for ships, for transportation, reach into the millions each year. This sum wisely expended would reclaim the arid lands of the country to an extent ten times the area of the Philippines, affording homes and employment for more than 42,000,000 people. The reclamation of the lands in the Mississippi Valley alone would bring greater wealth than all our foreign possessions. Fifty millions would accomplish this; but it is impossible to get an appropriation more than will suffice for temporary expedients, while we are going into foreign lands to reclaim them, to educate the people, to build for them schools and hospitals—in fact, everything that a maudlin sentiment of humanity can suggest, costing fifty times more, when we get through with it, than would give this country a prosperity and grandeur and a power the world never witnessed. With the small appropriations for our welfare we were rapidly becoming the greatest among nations. On land we are the strongest among nations. We are dividing our strength and transferring a part of it to the sea, neglecting home interests and home security. I do not object to the building of a great navy suitable to our needs, the protection of cities and coasts and commerce, but I think it unwise to go 7,000 miles away from home and float an immense navy to protect a country that will not give us in return the cost of the ships that anchor in its harbors.

The permanent annexation of the Philippines or any other territory beyond our natural boundaries is fraught with danger to this Republic. It will involve us in all the disputes and contentions of foreign governments. We can not be neutral. This danger has been emphasized in this Chamber more ably than I can describe it. On a former occasion, on July 24, 1896, I said on the joint resolution annexing the Hawaiian Islands:

> It was stated by the premier of England, speaking in the selfish interests of Great Britain, that an alliance with the United States would become a necessity on the part of Great Britain because of her complications with other European nations. That met with a response in this country, and the appeal of the premier was taken up from one end of the land to the other. The only sound which broke the acclaim was that which came from Irish voices denouncing any alliance with England as infamy. But it is bound to come if we get into any foreign complications, which we necessarily shall do if we acquire foreign territory. It will be unavoidable. France, Germany, Austria, all have their community of interest. Political interest will drive Russia into it. Her interests will be adverse to ours. Conflict may come, and we shall be antagonized by those great Empires, and our only hope and our only refuge will be in seeking an alliance with our kinspeople across the sea.
> What then becomes of the bimetallic policy? What becomes of the cry of 16 to 1? It will be heard only in that dark abyss, in that gloom which will overhang this country, as a dirge, a moan, a weeping, for the loss of the liberties of the people and for the destroyed prosperity of the nation.

Events have come thick and fast since that time. There was no declaration then that we would add more territory to this country. It was urged that the annexation of Hawaii was necessary for military purposes, as a protection to our Pacific coast, and we thought the appetite for more domain, for further expansion, would be satisfied.

We have a great many serious questions at home to engage our attention—questions which must be solved and settled before we are sure of the permanent establishment of representative government. We passed through one great crisis, and the dismemberment of the Union was averted. That was section against section. Armies struggled not against liberty but in favor of liberty and democratic government. The contest was simply on one side to prevent the breaking up of the Union by States which adhered to democratic government. Every representative principle in the Federal Constitution was incorporated even with greater extension in the Confederate constitution.

In my opinion, greater issues are now at stake. Every day reveals some defect in our system of government which will require the ability and patriotism of statesmen to remedy. Contests for office, ending in force and violence; the reckless use of an army to sustain a contending faction; the dispersion of a legislature by military force; the dissatisfaction of the laboring people, which more than once has broken into revolt and threatened revolution; the criminal organization of trusts controlling every product of field and factory, destroying industrial enterprise and the hopes of the young for advancement in life; the enslavement of the people by the aggregation of capital; the consolidation of great railroad enterprises, controlling legislation and the disturbance of economic conditions in trade and travel and transportation to the extent that the issue will be presented whether the state shall take charge of them and manage them in the interests of the people. Only as a last remedy will be this resort, but the issue will be forced.

All these matters demand the attention of the people of the United States, and foreign conquests will only serve to complicate the issues and make them more difficult of solution by the added strength given to great consolidated interests.

We do not yet thoroughly understand our own form of government beyond the fact that it is a representative government. Many constitutional questions remain undetermined. Matters pertaining to the operation of the Constitution are yet in their first stages of interpretation. Able constitutional lawyers in this Chamber are doubtful as to the mode and manner of filling vacancies in the Senate, one of the very essentials of the Constitution. Many are doubtful as to the extent of the powers of this Government; how far its laws and Constitution will extend to Territories acquired by the United States; the line of demarcation between State and Federal sovereignty in interstate commerce and matters affecting the welfare of the great body of the people in quarantine and sanitary regulations and laws. I might mention other questions which present themselves. Our form of government is not so firmly fixed, as it has experienced dangerous conditions, which may occur time and time again. We have passed through conditions which have repeatedly occurred, and which are not unlikely to occur again, of usurpation in office, a defiance of the public will, and the inauguration of a government directly opposed to all the teachings of democracy. We have arrived at that point in our history where corporations are exercising the functions of government and the masses of the people are helpless to protect themselves against corporate power with its share in government.

Would it not be wise statesmanship to straighten out and bring under the subjection of the people that power which now, by an almost universal belief, is oppressive; to establish our form of government on enduring principles; to have every constitutional dispute which has threatened its perpetuity definitely fixed; to adjust the differences between capital and labor; to educate and prepare for the exercise of self-government the vast number of ignorant and almost semisavage people in our midst before we rush to other lands to teach the principles of self-government, which, if we know, we do not fully practice; to undertake, through an indefinite time, the education of millions of barbarians and savages, when we have millions of the same class among us who demand all the attention we can give them?

The resolution under discussion is predicated upon the fact that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are not capable of self-government. The Government of the United States must of necessity, under the terms of the resolution, establish and maintain a government over these people until peace and order shall have been restored. And thereafter it is the intention of the United States, so soon as it can practically be done, to provide the opportunity and prescribe the method for the formation of a government by and of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be independently exercised by them.

Section 5 of the resolution leaves it to the United States to exercise their discretion whether the government erected by the Philippine people shall be competent and worthy in the judgment of the United States to exercise the power of an independent government, etc. It is evident that the resolution contemplates an exercise of sovereignty over said islands until they are able to establish an independent government having the power to preserve order.

The resolution embodies the following ideas: That the people are now incapable of self-government, that they shall not be incorporated into the citizenship of the United States, and that the islands shall not be permanently annexed to the United States, and that the Government of the United States reserves the discretionary power to determine whether the government established eventually by the Filipino be competent and worthy to be independent.

The Democratic Senators almost solidly voted for this resolution in the Fifty-fifth Congress. As I interpret it, it embodies correct principles. Practically it is too restrictive in not allowing for future contingencies. No one can tell what the future may bring forth and what relations this Government will have to maintain toward the Philippine people. That they are unfit for self-government, as we understand republican institutions, I do not think admits of a doubt. That they can and will be fitted for self-government is a question to be yet answered. I do not think they will be unless it be in a distant age when their intellect and their racial condition shall undergo a change, not until they shall approach Saxon intellect and Saxon characteristics. There is in these islands no nationality; there are thirty different languages spoken by as many tribes who are at war with each other. There are savages and a partially christianized people. There are Mohammedans with polygamy and slaves. There are Chinese with chop sticks and joshes. There is all the sensualism, all the corruption of the East. There are conditions there which should never be incorporated into our national life.

No sentimentalism should enter into the discussion of these questions. Our love of liberty, law, and order should not drive us into relations with other people which will disturb, possibly destroy, our love of liberty, law, and order.

Reason should control in all questions affecting our interest, and no mawkish sentiment should carry us beyond our borders to meddle with the affairs of others which do not concern our material interest or affect our national honor.

During the Fifty-fifth Congress I introduced a resolution which passed the Senate. In its essential features it corresponds with the resolution offered by the senior Senator from Georgia.

In the discussion of the resolution he criticised the word "integral" because the word "integral," in his opinion, was a word of limitation, and the purpose was to commit us simply to the proposition that in holding the islands it was intended to hold them as an outside piece of property, not entitled hereafter to be admitted as one of the organized Territories of the country. If organized territory means a part of the United States, that part of his criticism is correct. I am not willing that the Philippine Islands shall, in any event, become a part of the territory of the United States—an "integral" part thereof.

The resolution adopted by the Senate during the last session is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States, but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.

This resolution declared, and it was affirmed by the Senate, that there was no intention to make the Philippine Islands a part of the United States; that it was not the intention to incorporate the inhabitants of that country into the citizenship of the United States; that when armed resistance shall have ceased and peace and order shall have been restored it is the intention of the United States to establish a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants, to prepare them for self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of them as will best promote the interests of both countries. The words "when peace shall have been restored," etc., are not in the resolution, but they are there by necessary inference, because the United States can not establish a government until those conditions shall happen. This resolution and the one introduced by the Senator are in many respects similar. Both extend the authority of the United States indefinitely. But in the resolution of the Senator from Georgia the United States, if it relinquished its sovereignty, must do so absolutely and unqualifiedly, with all the right of sovereignty of an independent people, and the United States guaranteeing the continued independence of the same.

But in the resolution adopted by the Fifty-fifth Congress the United States is authorized to dispose of them as will best promote the interests of the United States and the inhabitants of the islands. This is a check, and a salutary one. It gives the United States the power to prevent them from doing anything inimical to the interests of the United States. It gives the Government the power in its relinquishment of sovereignty to make any stipulation that will prevent injury to the commercial interests of the United States and to protect the citizens of the United States domiciled there. It is not likely that they will for more than a century have any kindly feeling for the United States. Many generations will pass away before the inhabitants of the Philippines can even be benevolently assimilated. During their unnatural connection with the United States I believe they should be kept away from us. These inhabitants should not be permitted to come here to disturb our labor and make it more restless because of the degradation that would be heaped upon it by the introduction of the cheap labor that the islands will send here. Our agricultural and manufacturing interests should be protected from the products of that country produced by cheap and degraded labor.

Mr. President, in discussing the problem of the Philippines I think that nothing can be gained by a recital of the facts that antedated the war now going on in the islands. What advantage, what profit, to us to inquire whether the Filipinos have a government when it is acknowledged that it has been overthrown and destroyed and none now exists? What matters it whether Dewey recognized the flag of that government? Why argue that it is the declaration of the people of the United States that all government must rest upon the consent of the governed when we have imposed governments upon people in the past history of this country without their consent, and now impose a government upon Cuba to which the people have in no way given their consent, and we propose to establish one in Puerto Rico, where the people have had no opportunity of expressing an opinion? Why clamor for the protests of Aguinaldo when his voice has been hushed in the dreadful shock of battle? Why assert that we have no constitutional right to govern these people when we are governing them? These facts have gone into history. They may be recited hereafter in an arraignment of this country in the forum of public opinion and before the bar of nations.

In legislation we must deal with facts as they confront us. We are in the Philippine Archipelago and we ought to get away as soon as we can do so, just as soon as our interest and our honor and our obligations to the inhabitants of those islands will permit.

No sentimentalism can extricate us. We must deal with hard, unyielding facts and so direct them that the least possible injury can befall our people and inflict as little injury upon the people of the Philippines as a state of war and its horrible results will permit.

The members of the Senate in the Fifty-fifth Congress, voting for the resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia and a resolution introduced by me, affirmed that it was not the purpose of the United States to permanently annex the Philippine Islands and to incorporate the inhabitants of these islands into the citizenship of the United States. The final disposition of the islands depends upon the subjection of the inhabitants to the authority of the United States. The establishment of law and order, the institution of civil government, are desired results which can only be brought about by force exerted by the United States. The most effectual way, in the economy of life and money, will be to sustain the Government in its active efforts to establish order by the employment of force, and when this shall have been accomplished, in the efforts to establish a civil order employing the military only in the exercise of the police power of the Government; until the final and complete subjection of these people to its authority I have no sympathy for them. They are now enemies of the United States, and there is no place for sympathy.

In the future, when they show capacity and ability to take care of themselves, then sympathy may play its part and a righteous judgment may demand the recognition of their independent existence. The inhabitants of these islands had formulated a government on paper. There was no evidence of nationality, no external or internal sign of sovereignty. They displayed force and overran territory. The mob has done and can do the same thing. If they had been left alone they could not have protected themselves. This is admitted, as they asked for the protection of the United States. They were helpless from attack from abroad, and, like all people of their race and their intelligence, they would have been the victims of internal strife, promoted by a few ambitious men possessing intelligence above the masses. In my opinion it is an absurd proposition to contend they are now, or will be for sometime to come, capable of maintaining an independent government. I wish it were so and that to-morrow they could be turned loose from any connection with the United States of a political character. The President is now endeavoring to organize a civil government in the Philippines. No one, I apprehend, doubts the wisdom of this effort.

Throughout the archipelago the government, I understand, is to be by communities and provinces, running through all local conditions, even to that of tribes. The early establishment of civil government may induce the inhabitants to go to peaceful pursuits. It will, if they appreciate the effort, bring them hope of an independent government.

I have no high appreciation of the intelligence and character of the people of the Philippines. From all that I can learn they are not above the negro on this continent in either morals or intelligence. The percentage of negroes, excluding former slaves, who can read or write is greater among the negroes in the United States. They have more learned men than the inhabitants of the Philippines. To say that the Filipinos are fit to be trusted with electoral power is to affirm that the negro is entitled to its exercise. We of the South know what the experience of the negro was in the science of government.

When aided by white men, and to some extent restrained by the presence of disfranchised whites, they made a farce of government. If they had been left exclusively to themselves they would have literally cut each other's throats, and would have wrought entire destruction, instead of partial ruin and devastation. It would be so with the Filipinos if intrusted immediately with the exercise of electoral power. No one can predict how long our political connections with the Philippines will last. So long as it does, I hope that the Government of the United States will treat them humanely, and, as affirmed by the Senate, endeavor to instruct them in self-government, in the institution of a civil order, suitable to their wants and conditions; but during this probation of the inhabitants I hope to see them and their products so treated as not to injure our own people and their industries.

Mr. President, it is contended by some that the instant the treaty of peace was ratified the Constitution of the United States immediately took effect in the islands which we required from Spain. If this be a fact, then there was not, nor is there, any occasion whatever to declare that it is the intention of this Government not to annex the Philippine Islands to the United States or incorporate their inhabitants into the citizenship of the United States.

If the Constitution of the United States took effect immediately on the ratification of the treaty of peace, as is contended, then the people of those islands can come here at liberty; Chinese who have gone there can not be restrained from coming to the United States any more than we can restrain Chinamen who are citizens or who are inhabitants of any other State or Territory of the Union in going from one section of the country to another. Therefore, I think it would be exceedingly unfortunate if those islands should be considered as being at this time a part of the territory of the United States.

If they are territory of the United States, as is contended, and the Constitution and laws of the United States operate there, then the United States is without power to transfer them or to place them beyond the jurisdiction of this Government. So, Mr. President, the contention against the resolution which I introduced, that the Government of the United States should dispose of those islands in a manner to promote the best interests of the people of this country and of the inhabitants of the Philippines, has no force or effect whatever, because if we intended to transfer them to a foreign people we necessarily would have to change our organic law by an amendment.

But, Mr. President, there is another danger. By incorporating this large number of an inferior race into citizenship of the United States a sentiment will spring up in this country, just as it did in the interest of the negro, which will demand for those people a protection from supposed abuses, and it will give them a protection and it will give them privileges which are denied to the white people of this country. You will find that the fourteenth amendment, under the tender consciences of our judges, will extend to those islands for their protection, and it will be interposed in order to prevent the due execution of justice. That has happened in the State of Louisiana.

The fourteenth amendment never intended to give the negro any additional privileges; it never intended to give him rights which were not accorded to the white people of this country; but by torturing that amendment it has been made to extend to the negro privileges under the law which are not accorded to the white people of this country. He can go into the courts of justice; he can employ some obscure lawyer, who is hunting up notoriety and who can get up a hypothetical case and carry it to the United States courts, and thus indefinitely postpone the execution of the criminal laws of the country.

Mr. President, the interruption of the execution of the criminal laws under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States has repeatedly occurred. On more than one occasion criminals tried for the most serious and the vilest offenses have been saved from a just and merited punishment by the interposition of the Federal judiciary; and as an evidence of a case which has recently occurred in the State of Louisiana, I ask that the editorial from the New Orleans Picayune, dated February 10, 1900, which I send to the desk, shall be read by the Secretary and made part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEGRO RAVISHER SAVED FROM THE GALLOWS.

It has been a long time in this city since a negro criminal, condemned to capital punishment by the State courts, has been executed in accordance with law and the judgment of the courts, because the matter is commonly appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States on some pretense or other that in his trial and conviction the Constitution of the United States has been violated.

In this way the condemned criminal is able to secure a stay of proceedings, often amounting to years, and although, in all such cases in recent years, the cause has been finally sent back to the State courts, the result of such unnecessary interference with justice has been greatly to aggravate a distrust, already too common, of the efficiency of the State laws and the ability of the State courts to punish capital crimes committed by negroes, with the effect that such a popular distrust is at the bottom of all the lynching that is committed in the State.

Some time ago the people of the town of Gretna, in the suburbs of this city, were thrown into a fever of excitement at the announcement that, in the late hours of the night, the residence of a respectable citizen had been forcibly entered and a violent assault made upon his 12-year old daughter by a negro. The culprit was caught in the midst of his crime, and but for the fact that, at the hour when the crime was committed, the people who were aroused by the outcries of the victim did not know what had happened, the ravisher would have been promptly done to death; but the sheriff's officer who appeared on the scene, fearing popular violence, hurried his prisoner to a place of safety, where he was beyond the power of a mob.

The case was then left to the courts, with the result that a conviction was had in the district court of Jefferson Parish, and appeals to the supreme court of the State finally ended in the affirmation of the judgment of the lower court. Yesterday was the time set for the execution of the law upon the criminal, and he was already on the gallows, with a noose around his neck, when an order from the United States circuit court, at the very last moment, saved the life of the man who had, under the laws of the State, forfeited all right to live.

Petition had been made to the United States court that the constitutional rights of the condemned had been violated in the fact that he had been convicted under the laws and constitution of Louisiana made in 1898, and that this constitution and these laws contravene the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States is so sacred a thing that every United States court is bound to protect it at every peril, and, under the circumstances, Judge Parlange had no alternative but to grant an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and he affixed to the petition of the condemned the following order:

"The foregoing order is considered an appeal to the honorable United States Supreme Court, and is hereby granted the applicant, returnable according to law upon petitioner giving bond in the sum of $50.

"CHARLES PARLANGE,
"United States Judge.

"NEW ORLEANS, LA., February 9, 1900."

This document was conveyed in the greatest haste to Gretna, where the execution was just about to take place, and it reached there barely in time to save the criminal's life. It is claimed that this order of the court had no authority to prevent the execution, and that it so operated was the result of a misapprehension, and that the governor of Louisiana can set another day for the execution, which can be consummated without further ceremony. The Picayune greatly doubts if any State official of Louisiana, from the governor down to the lowest, would undertake to carry out an execution for a capital crime when the subject of it was protected by an appeal to the highest court in the land. There is in this State a very profound respect for the mandates of the United States courts, and it not likely that State officials are going to set them at nought.

In the meantime the life of a ravisher is safe under the ægis of the United States, and, if his case should be fully gone into by the Supreme Court of the nation, it will involve an inquiry into the entire status of the constitution of Louisiana, and no man can say how it will end.

Altogether, the case is a very important one, and it may have very far-reaching consequences. No invidious or injurious reflections can refer to Judge Parlange, who is a Louisianian by birth and inheritance, a citizen of the highest character, a lawyer of distinguished ability, and a jurist who is devoted to the establishing of just and righteous judgment. He is here to enforce the Constitution and laws of the United States, and in a case calling in question the guaranties of the Federal Constitution he must give it consideration.

But the fact remains that the most hateful crime that can be perpetrated in Louisiana goes unpunished, although the perpetrator has been ascertained and brought home to his guilt by every ceremonial and precaution which the State has provided. And there would have been and could have been no question of the State law in this case if the perpetrator of a most hideous crime had been a white man; but, being a negro, the entire power of the United States can be invoked to save him. This is the case, not only in Louisiana, but in other States of the South also, and it is, therefore, not strange that the lynching of negro ravishers has become the rule in those States when an outraged people can work their will on them.

In States where there is a large negro population, and where the negroes are made to understand that they can secure from the United States Government special protection which is not available to the white population, it is not strange that the whites should resort to extraordinary means to secure some adequate protection from the criminality to which the negroes seem to be invited by the peculiarities of the laws. These are matters that should be taken into consideration in the discussion of race questions in the United States.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, no amount of fault-finding, protesting, or remonstrating will prevent the fulfillment of the manifest destiny of the United States. On the 11th of January, 1871, a resolution was pending in the Senate to appoint a commission to go to San Domingo and examine the condition of the country and the people and report as to the advisability of ratifying the treaty of annexation. In discussing that resolution I said:

> I believe that it is a part of the destiny of this country, whether for good or evil, to annex more territory. I do not believe in the power of any man, or of any set of men, or of any party, to prevent the accomplishment of that destiny. While this Republic grows it must expand, it must increase; it must extend its territory as its wealth and power increase. That has been the history of every country while it was attaining its destiny. History does not furnish us an example of any nation that has risen to power and prominence which has not during its growth expanded. It is one of the elements of growth for a nation to expand as much as it is the element of growth in the oak, which, as it grows, must have room to extend its trunk and multiply its branches.—Congressional Globe, Forty-first Congress, third session, Part I, page 427.

Subsequent events have strengthened me in the views I then expressed.

While it is true that the opposition to President Grant's Administration mustered over one-third of the votes of the Senate, and defeated the treaty, the parties who engaged in the defeat were overwhelmed at the next election. Their desperate effort to defeat President Grant's reelection, by a combination with the Democrats to elect Mr. Greeley President, illustrates the unpopularity of that partisan attempt to limit the growth of the Republic.

THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE.

Whatever of despotism, imperialism, or disregard of the consent of the governed there may be in the acquisition of the Philippines or any other territory which may add to the wealth and power of the country and furnish new and greater opportunities for our progressive and enterprising youth, the principle of such acquisition is Jeffersonian Democracy. When the author of the Declaration of Independence doubled the area of the United States, Louisiana alone contained a population of over 49,000, with an organized and established government, while the vast territory included in the purchase outside of Louisiana contained hundreds of thousands of Indians equally entitled to consideration with the savages in the interior of many of the islands of the Philippines. It never occurred to Mr. Jefferson that it was necessary for him to consult the people of Louisiana or the Indian tribes of the West before he made that vast area a part of the United States.

The government established for Louisiana by Jefferson has furnished the model for every Territorial government which the United States has since established, and the denunciation, forebodings, and warnings against what was termed imperialism and disregard of human rights which the Louisiana purchase inspired have also furnished a model for all subsequent denunciations whenever new territory has been acquired. There was nothing new in the ravings of the Whig party against the acquisition of California and New Mexico which had not been said against the Louisiana purchase. Polk was abused during his term of office with equally as much vehemence and acrimony for the annexation of New Mexico and California as Jefferson was for the Louisiana purchase.

The parallel did not stop there. The policy of the Federalists who opposed the Louisiana purchase destroyed that party, and it never again elected a President of the United States; but it secured the supremacy of the Democratic party for more than twenty years. The election of John Quincy Adams by the House of Representatives in 1825 was the first break in Democratic power after the narrow, anti-expansion policy of the Federal party was adopted.

THE ACQUISITION FROM MEXICO.

The Democratic party again came into power under Jackson in 1829, and continued in power under Jackson and Van Buren until 1841. So strong was the prejudice against the name of Federalist on account of its narrow and illiberal policy that a new name was adopted by Henry Clay and his associates, who were opposed to Jackson's Administration. They called their new organization the Whig party, and achieved power in the memorable contest of 1840 on account of the financial crash of 1837, which was attributed to the Democratic party.

William Henry Harrison was elected President, and on his death, a short time after his inauguration, Tyler became President. In 1844 Polk of Tennessee was elected President. Whatever may have been the merits or demerits of the Administration of President Polk, the acquisition of Texas, California, Nevada, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, and part of Colorado attest the wisdom of its policy. The abuse against Polk's Administration by the leaders of the Whig party equaled, if it did not surpass, the efforts of the Federal party in the beginning of the century to destroy Jefferson for his alleged disregard of justice, humanity, and the rights of sovereign States of the East.

The disappointed ambition of the great leaders of the Whig party, on account of the disapproval of the people, embittered the last days of the great men of that party, whose brilliant oratory and matchless logic adorn the history of their time. No matter how brilliant or influential they were, they could not withstand the irresistible aspirations of the American people to expand, progress, and achieve.

THE ISLANDS ACQUIRED FROM SPAIN.

The acquisition of the Philippines and other lands from Spain, in a war waged for humanity and against the cruelties of a barbarous and decaying monarchy, is one of the most important additions to the territory of the United States since the adoption of the Constitution. The islands we have secured are essential to our financial independence. The people of the United States pay annually more than $250,000,000 to foreigners for tropical and semitropical commodities. The United States can never be thoroughly self-sustaining until the people can produce what they consume. The Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Cuba would mitigate to some extent the evils of the gold-standard folly.

With the acquisition of these islands everything consumed in this country might be supplied from our own natural resources. Such acquisition would enable us to enter upon the inevitable struggle for the commodity gold on equal terms with other countries. It might do more. It might give us some advantages which no other country would enjoy. The gold-gambling law under which we must live until we can break the chains of financial bondage with which the gold syndicate has bound us will compel the United States to buy the fluctuating commodity gold at any cost. If we can not supply ourselves with tropical and semitropical products in our own country, we must buy them of foreigners, who will demand gold in exchange. If we must pay $250,000,000 in gold to foreigners for commodities which we could produce with the acquisition of these islands, such acquisition is most important.

With the islands, the contest to save this country from impoverishment which must necessarily follow the contraction of the volume of the circulating medium to gold alone, will be sufficiently severe, but without them the struggle may become hopeless. But if we can produce everything we consume and the Secretary of the Treasury will be merciful and not load us too heavily with foreign debt by the sale of bonds, we may suffer less for the fetich folly of the gold standard than other nations who bow down before this false god. We must be prepared to contend with the world at large for gold, because the ruling money syndicate will not allow the United States to stamp its legal-tender authority upon any other commodity. This struggle for gold upon which to stamp the law of legal tender, if the gold syndicate remains in power, will be a contest among the nations for the survival of the fittest. There is some hope that with the additions of these islands to our vast national resources, coupled with the skill and enterprise of our people, the evil day of serfdom may be postponed for a time, although the shadow of feudalism already visible in the Old World may in the near future become total darkness.

OPPORTUNITIES AFFORDED BY NEW POSSESSIONS.

The prognostications of evil arising from the annexation of territory so often repeated ought not to deprive the people of the United States of the opportunities held out to them by our new acquisitions. Why should not the present generation enjoy opportunities similar to those furnished our fathers by the acquisition of Louisiana, Florida, Texas, New Mexico, and California? Why should not the wealth, power, and enterprise of the American people be increased and encouraged? May not the acquisition of the islands of the Atlantic and the Pacific wrested from Spain place the United States in the near future foremost as a manufacturing, commercial, naval, and political power?

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY NOT IMPERIALISM.

The suggestion that the acquisition of territory is imperialism is refuted by the fact that neither Jefferson, Monroe, Jackson, Polk, nor any of their associates are regarded as imperialists. The imperialism they advocated made homes for patriotic, liberty-loving, self-respecting citizens, whose loyalty to the Government of the United States is unsurpassed by the people of any of the thirteen original States.

If to assist the people of the Philippines to establish local self-government after the plan adopted by Jefferson is imperialism, then Jefferson was the pioneer imperialist of the United States. The Philippines will never be dependent colonies. They will be allowed to conduct their own affairs with the assistance of such officers as it may be necessary to appoint to aid them in establishing local self-government. They will not have a voice in the legislative councils of the nation until Congress shall ascertain and determine that their admission as States would be desirable. Notwithstanding the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo promised to make States of the territories acquired from Mexico, New Mexico is still a Territory. The suggestion that we must not trust the future, that those who come after us will admit the Philippines as States, whether qualified or not, is an assumption that our system of republican government is a failure and that patriotism will become extinct when the seats in this Chamber are filled by our successors.

PAST FOREBODINGS OF CALAMITIES.

No person occupies a seat here to-day but myself who was a member of the Senate in the Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth, Forty-first, and Forty-second Congresses. I was impressed during that time with the anxiety of many Senators for the future and their forebodings of calamities which they contended would necessarily follow if the opponents of the Union in the civil war were again allowed to participate in the government of the country. They assumed in their arguments that future Congresses could not be trusted and that the Government was in danger of being utterly subverted. How they misjudged the future let the heroic patriotism and valor of the soldiers from every State in the Union in the late war with Spain and in the far-off Philippines bear witness. The patriotism and fidelity to the interests of the whole country exhibited in both Houses of Congress by members from the South as well as from the North prove that a reunited people now enjoy a more perfect union than ever before. I have faith in my country and in the American people that they can extend a helping hand to the Filipinos and enable them to peacefully assemble and perfect in due time local self-government where life and property will be as secure as it now is in any State of this Union. I have seen order grow out of confusion in that vast territory acquired from Mexico, until the governments of the far West are as efficient in protecting life, liberty, and property as the best-governed State of the East.

EXTENSION OF FREE INSTITUTIONS OVER NEW ACQUISITIONS.

No one pretends that the Filipinos are now fit for statehood, but I repudiate the suggestion that they are not fit for just such government as Jefferson extended to the Louisiana purchase and Monroe to the acquisition of Florida. There may not be enough Americans in that country to organize a State government without Congressional or Executive action, as in the case of California; but if the same Congressional and Executive care that was extended to all other acquisitions of territory except California is extended to the Philippines, they will progress—it may be slowly, but they will progress in working out good government for themselves and security for life and property, which will bring prosperity and progress to them and great commercial and political advantages to us.

The history of the spread of our institutions over new acquisitions is most instructive in dealing with the Filipinos.

In the fall of 1803 President Jefferson appointed Governor Claiborne, of the Mississippi Territory, and General Wilkinson commissioners for receiving possession of the ceded territory from the commissioner of France, and gave Governor Claiborne a commission authorizing him provisorily to exercise within the ceded territory all the powers with which the Spanish governor-general and intendant were clothed, except that of granting lands.

President Jefferson took a common-sense view of the situation, and in accordance with the laws of nations administered and enforced the laws, customs, and regulations of the former government, with such changes only as were necessary to conform to the new conditions. Congress gave him all the power needed, and from time to time passed the necessary laws for the establishment of complete Territorial governments as fast as they were required.

HOW CALIFORNIA WAS GOVERNED.

The territorial contractionists, now finding the sentiment of the country in favor of expansion, are attempting to hedge by declaring that the acquisition of the Philippines is imperialism. They do not seem to recognize the distinction between extent of country and form of government. A country may be very small and its government very despotic, or it may be very large and its government very liberal. Free republican government is the birthright of the people of the United States, and wherever a necessity exists they organize self-government after the model of the free institutions with which they are familiar. They need not necessarily wait for Congressional action, or even Executive authority. When Commodore Sloat, at Monterey, in July, 1846, proclaimed California free from Mexican rule, he issued a proclamation to the people informing them of the change of government and assuring them that their political, civil, and religious rights would be protected. From that time until the arrival of Brigadier-General Riley, on the 12th of April, 1849, the country was governed by various military officers assuming both military and civil authority. These military officers caused the Mexican laws, so far as they were applicable, to be executed by the persons holding the local offices and such other persons as were elected by the people or appointed by the military authorities to fill vacancies.

On the 12th of April, 1849, Brigadier-General Riley arrived in San Francisco as military governor, with instructions from the War Department to administer civil affairs. He was unable to retain his military force because the soldiers left him and went to the mines, but he proceeded to organize a civil government and ordered an election on the 1st of August, 1849, for delegates to a constitutional convention to be held on the 1st of September of that year. The convention met, formed a constitution, and an election was held in November for members of the legislature and State officers. Peter Burnett was elected governor, and a full-fledged State government went into operation on the 1st day of January, 1850. The volume containing the legislation of the first session of the legislature, beginning January 1, 1850, will compare favorably with the system of laws in force in any State in the Union. Gwin and Frémont were elected Senators, and on the 9th of September, 1850, California was admitted into the Union. Congress legislated very little for the mining regions of the West, and no laws were passed for nearly a quarter of a century disposing of the mineral lands. Here again the American people who occupied the country made their own laws, rules, and regulations, which the courts adopted and enforced, and the reports of the supreme court of California and the surrounding Territories contain a system of common law which grew up among the miners themselves without any Congressional action. In 1866, just twenty years after the acquisition of the country, Congress passed an act legalizing the rules and regulations established by the miners and providing for the issuance of patents on compliance with the miners' laws.

THE PHILIPPINES.

Thus it will be seen that the American people carry with them their institutions wherever they go. The same will be true of the Philippines. Americans will go there and aid the natives in executing their local laws, and all that will be necessary in assisting the people of the archipelago in maintaining local self-government will be to appoint a few officers, make a few necessary changes in their laws to adapt them to the changed condition, protect them from foreign interference or domestic violence, and they will become useful and law-abiding people. They should also be allowed to send Delegates to Congress, not to legislate, but to advise; not to interfere with the institutions of our country, but to learn our form of government for the benefit of their constituents. The whole matter is very simple. It will develop and can not be interrupted.

The President has acted wisely in selecting an eminent jurist in the prime of life to assist the natives of the Philippine Islands in establishing local self-government after the models which our country so abundantly furnishes. All liberty-loving people, when they attempt to establish a government, look to our country for models for their guidance. Constitutions similar to our own have been adopted in Mexico and in various States of South America. Although the Republics to the south of us frequently fall short of the high standard of legislation and administration prevailing in this country, still they are progressing in the right direction. The Filipinos themselves already look to the United States for models for constitutions and laws in their own country, as evidenced by the proclamations and publications which we read in the newspapers.

We want very little legislation for the Philippines. We want their leaders to come here and see how we govern ourselves, so as to enable them to do likewise. We wish for the Filipinos peace and good order, and they will have them with very little assistance from us. The absurd charge that there is any intention on the part of the Administration or the Republican or the Democratic party to govern the Philippines or any other territory which we have acquired or may acquire as colonies by the strong arm of the military power is entirely without foundation. There is no more doubt that the Philippines, with our assistance, will have good government, and that they will be beneficial to us, than there is that good government has been secured under the American flag wherever it has floated.

Besides, we have assumed the responsibility of establishing civil government in the Philippines for the protection of the lives and property of the foreign as well as the American residents there, and to see to it that the relations of the islands with foreign countries are such as the law of nations require.

PROTECTORATE INCOMPATIBLE WITH FREE INSTITUTIONS.

In the struggle to suggest something in opposition to the time-honored methods of treating new acquisitions, some advocate a protectorate and in the same breath proclaim against imperialism. They do not define what they mean by a protectorate—whether they mean to govern the islands by a Cromwell or a Warren Hastings, or whether they mean to subject the islands to the intrigues and aggressions of foreigners and go to war with all the world to maintain the rights of the Filipinos to violate the laws of nations. No protectorate has ever existed which was compatible with free institutions or in accord with the principles of our Government. After having undertaken to establish law, order, and good government in the Philippines, we can not abandon them without disgrace to the United States. If we allow them to set up their own local self-government under our Territorial system, we can guide and protect them without any danger of foreign complications.

When the opponents of the acquisition of territory meet a growing sentiment of the country in favor of doing our duty toward the Philippines, as we have in all other cases, they say that the Filipinos are not as enlightened as the people of Massachusetts or Vermont, and consequently we must abandon the acquisition. We reply that if such a rule had been adopted with regard to Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, or New Mexico, the boundary of our country to-day would be the same as it was when the Constitution was adopted. It is very doubtful if any acquisition can be made hereafter if the rule is adopted that people of the land to be acquired must be equally intelligent with us to become a part of the United States. I have no doubt that the Filipinos are the most intelligent people we have ever annexed, although the barbarians in those islands are numerous. If we expand, we must take the world as it is and the people as they are, as we have always done.

IMPOST DUTIES ON PUERTO RICAN PRODUCTS PREGNANT WITH EVIL.

I am aware of the suggestion of an impost duty upon the products of Puerto Rico, which, of course, would be one of the worst forms of a colonial policy. This suggestion is pregnant with evil, and, if carried out, would furnish substantial groundwork for the charge of imperialism. It would be too much like the exactions which imperial Rome made upon her conquered provinces, and it might furnish a parallel to some extent of the imperial policy of monarchical countries in recent times. I am glad the President of the United States has not made that mistake. On the contrary, in his last annual message he says:

> Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

The recommendation of the Secretary of War, contained in his last annual report, describes in forceful language the injustice of erecting a tariff barrier against the products of Puerto Rico. Since the transfer of the island to the United States Spain has erected such a barrier; and if the United States does likewise, her markets will be cut off and the people will be in a deplorable condition. I will print as an appendix to my remarks a portion of the report of the Secretary of War and commend it to the careful consideration of Congress.

PRECEDENTS AGAINST TARIFF ON PRODUCTS FROM NEW ACQUISITIONS.

I am glad the President in his recommendation and the Secretary of War in his report are governed by the established policy of the United States in treating with the people of newly acquired territory. Their recommendations are in harmony with the following precedents:

On the 25th of November, 1803, and contemporaneously with taking possession of the Louisiana purchase, Congress passed an act removing restrictions of trade between the United States and the Territory of Orleans, thereby fully recognizing the new territory as a part of the United States entitled to the privileges of American customs and revenue laws.

On the 7th of May, 1822, the customs laws of the United States were extended over Florida.

The military officers governing California, previous to the passage of any law of Congress, enforced the customs laws of the United States and collected over $600,000 of duties on imports from foreign countries, and when Congress acted the customs laws of the United States were extended to all the territory obtained from Mexico.

It was never before suggested that any territory acquired by the United States should be treated as alien territory by imposing a customs duty on imports into the United States. I am glad to know that the President of the United States fully realizes the injustice of an attempt to treat any territory which we claim as our own as a foreign country. His advice against a duty on imports from Puerto Rico must be followed if we hope to have peace and prosperity there with its accruing benefits to the United States.

The colonial policy of greed, with discriminating duties against the products of our own territory, would breed dissatisfaction and discord. It might lead to militarism. It might require a large army to maintain order and force the people of the colonies to submit to such unjust and discriminating policy. It might do more. It might involve vast expenditures to maintain armies of occupation, which would be dangerous to the safety of the Republic.

If we treat Puerto Rico as we treated Louisiana, Florida, and California, the people of that island will learn to love the American flag and will soon be loyal Americans instead of a sullen and discontented people, suffering from discriminating laws. The mutual advantages of continuing the established American policy in the treatment of Puerto Rico will be very great. It will not only secure the friendship and loyalty of that island, but it will furnish an example which will be most beneficial in our dealings with Cuba. The great prosperity which Puerto Rico will enjoy will be an irresistible argument with Cuba in favor of joining her fortunes with the great Republic.

Our relations with Cuba are anomalous. We have no precedent for such responsibilities as we have assumed toward that country, but our relations to Puerto Rico are the same as they were to the people of all other territories which the United States have acquired and afford us an opportunity to furnish an object lesson to the people of Cuba.

PLENARY POWER OF CONGRESS OVER THE ISLANDS.

The discussion of the constitutional power of Congress in connection with these islands is unprofitable. There is no doubt that Congress has power to rob the territories in a thousand ways and render the people of our new acquisitions more miserable than they were under the horrible system of Spanish extortion which we undertook to abolish. There is no doubt that the people of the United States could amend the Constitution and reestablish slavery if they were wicked enough to do so. It would be just as profitable to discuss whether the people could, if they would, establish a monarchy in this country as it is to discuss the question whether Congress has the constitutional power to discriminate against the people of the new acquisitions by unequal revenue laws or any other system of extortion which greed may suggest.

But it is necessary for those who support and defend the continued possession of the vast acquisitions of territory which we have acquired from Spain to adhere to the Jeffersonian policy in our treatment of the people of these islands. Departure from that policy opens a wide field of discussion. While the opponents of annexation may give aid and comfort to Aguinaldo and his followers by their unpatriotic and intemperate ravings against the war now prosecuted at great cost and sacrifice of the lives of our brave soldiers, it is the plain duty of Jeffersonian expansionists to maintain our established policy in our treatment of the people inhabiting the new acquisitions. The country has a right to know that no imperialism or militarism is intended; that the people of the islands will be treated in the same manner that the people of Louisiana, Florida, and California were treated, and that no army will be necessary to make them submit to the local governments which we will assist in ordaining and establishing. It may be that there are savages in those islands, as in the case of every other acquisition, that will require military force to keep in subjection, but the millions of people who occupy those islands who are not savages will furnish no excuse for militarism or imperialism.

TEACHINGS OF THE FATHERS FOLLOWED BY THE PRESIDENT.

Whatever mistakes may have been made in dealing with the Filipinos or in failing to fully acquaint them with the policy of our Government, the President's message recommending equal laws for Puerto Rico and the appointment of Judge Taft to commence the work of instructing and aiding the Filipinos to establish and maintain local self-government indicate very clearly that the President has no idea of departing from the teachings of the fathers or establishing an empire on the ruins of the Republic. It will be impossible for the opponents of progress to impress upon the minds of the people that the size of a country has anything to do with the form of government. If republics can only exist in small territories, the United States passed that limit ninety-seven years ago, when the Louisiana purchase was made. The truth is, that when the situation is understood and the value of these acquisitions realized, the people of the United States will be as unwilling to give up an inch of territory in the Philippine Islands as they are now to give up any part of Alaska. The United States would go to war with Great Britain and take the consequences rather than to have 10 miles square of Alaska taken from us, notwithstanding that when that country was acquired it was supposed to be nothing but an iceberg.

I hope the great financial issue, upon which the happiness of the human race depends, will not be buried beneath the rubbish of anti-expansion and fault-finding, as it was for many years beneath the tariff controversy, but that it will be kept before the people until the fetich worshipers of gold understand the money question as well as the descendants of the devotees of the flat-world theory now understand that the world is round.

APPENDIX.

[From the report of the Secretary of War for 1899, pages 32, 33.]

The question of the economic treatment of the island underlies all the others. If the people are prosperous and have an abundance of the necessities of life, they will with justice be easily governed, and will with patience be easily educated. If they are left in hunger and hopeless poverty, they will be discontented, intractable, and mutinous. The principal difficulty now in the island of Puerto Rico is that the transfer of the island from Spain to the United States has not resulted in an increase of prosperity, but in the reverse. The industry of the island is almost entirely agricultural. The people live upon the products of their own soil and upon the articles for which they exchange their surplus products abroad. Their production is in the main of coffee, sugar, and tobacco. The prosperity of the island depends upon their success in selling these products.

So long as the island was a part of the Spanish possessions there was substantially free trade with Spain and with Cuba. The total exports from Puerto Rico for the four years preceding 1897 averaged about $16,000,000, of which an average of less than one-sixth part ($2,630,000) was sold to the United States and an average of one-half ($8,025,000) was sold to Spain and Cuba. Immediately upon the transfer of the island from Spain to the United States, Spain erected a tariff barrier against the introduction of Puerto Rican products. The interests of Cuban agriculture led to the erection of a similar barrier in the tariff adopted for Cuba, so that Puerto Rico was debarred from the principal markets which she had previously enjoyed, and at the same time this country has maintained its tariff against Puerto Rican products just as it existed while the island was Spanish territory. The result is that there has been a wall built around the industry of Puerto Rico.

Even before the hurricane of August 8, 1899, two crops of tobacco lay in the warehouses of Puerto Rico, which the owners were unable to sell at prices equal to the cost of production. Their sugar shared the prevailing depression in that commodity, arising from the competition of bounty-fed beet sugar. Their coffee was practically unknown in the United States and had no market here. It is plain that it is essential to the prosperity of the island that she should receive substantially the same treatment at our hands as she received from Spain while a Spanish colony, and that the markets of the United States should be opened to her as were the markets of Spain and Cuba before the transfer of allegiance. Congress has the legal right to regulate the customs duties between the United States and Puerto Rico as it pleases; but the highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectation of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Puerto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States, and that we should treat the interests of this people as our own; and I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OVERSTREET, Mr. BROSIUS, and Mr. COX managers at the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on House bill No. 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR-ELECT HAYWARD.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I wish to announce that at the close of morning business on Friday, the 2d day of March, I will request that the legislative business be laid aside that Senators may pay fitting tribute to the memory of the late MONROE L. HAYWARD, Senator-elect from the State of Nebraska. I have consulted with some of the Senators having in charge the paramount business of the Senate, and I think that that time is agreeable.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CULLOM. It is within a few minutes of 2 o'clock. As the preliminary work on the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii will be its reading, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to its consideration now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PETTUS. I should like to have it written down. I did not hear what it is.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from Alabama refer to the bill which I propose to call up? If he did not hear the announcement, I will make it again.

Mr. PETTUS. I did not hear a word you said.

Mr. CULLOM. I am very sorry; it was my fault, I presume. As it is within a few minutes of 2 o'clock, I ask that the Senate now, by unanimous consent, proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. HALE. It will come up at 2 o'clock anyway.

Mr. CULLOM. It will come up at 2 o'clock as the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PETTUS. I do not object, but I am a little afraid of general consents that I do not hear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. In the reading of the bill by the clerks, I will ask that the few amendments which are reported by the committee may be considered and acted upon as they are reached, if that course is agreeable to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill, and if there be no objection the amendments of the committee will be acted upon as they are reached.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in section 1, page 1, line 9, after the word "force," to insert "on the 12th day of August, 1898;" so as to read:

That the phrase "the laws of Hawaii," as used in this act without qualifying words, shall mean the constitution and laws of the republic of Hawaii, including regulations having the effect of law and the decisions of the supreme court in force on the 12th day of August, 1898, immediately prior to the transfer of the sovereignty of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States of America.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 2, line 25, after the word "That," to insert "except as herein otherwise provided;" and on page 3, line 2, after the word "applicable," to strike out "except as herein otherwise provided;" so as to make the section read:

That, except as herein otherwise provided, the Constitution, and all the laws of the United States locally applicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States: Provided, That sections 1850 and 1890 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not apply to the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. There seems to have been a word left out. The word "applicable" ought to be "inapplicable." The word "not" should be inserted between the words "States," in the first line of page 3, and "locally," and then "inapplicable" instead of "applicable" in the second line; so as to read:

The Constitution and all the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 5 on page 8.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I find myself compelled to be absent during the reading of the remainder of the bill and I wish to have some little understanding about it. I see that the amendments are being voted upon as we go along. Some of them might meet my approbation and some might not. I should like to know whether it is intended to go further to-day than the reading of the bill and the amendments which the committee proposed. I suppose that after that the whole matter will be open to amendment and that the amendments which have been voted on will, when the bill comes into the Senate, be still open to consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that Senators are a little anxious for a tolerably early adjournment to-day on account of some matters, and I did not suppose that I would be able to get the Senate to consider the bill much beyond the reading and adoption of the amendments of the committee, and then some little amendments that I desire to offer myself in behalf of the committee, that will not be disputed, I think. They are rather corrections of the chapter that has just been read: that is to say, putting in the word "inclusive" in certain places where it ought to be inserted in order to make sure just what is meant.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I simply wish to know that the bill will not pass to-day and will be open to amendment hereafter.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, it is not likely to pass to-day.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There are some matters, as we come along in the bill, which, it seems to me, should receive more careful attention than has been given. This may all be premature, but, for instance, I find that we have repealed the law with regard to other Territories, requiring them to submit their laws to Congress.

Mr. HALE. Not in this bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes; we have, in this bill.

Mr. HALE. That can not be.

Mr. TELLER. It would be the case if the bill passes in that shape. It is section 1850.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We have already passed the proviso that section 1850 shall not apply to the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire whether this bill is on its passage. I understood that it was simply the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. That is all at this time.

Mr. TELLER. I have several amendments that I propose to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was agreed that the committee amendments should be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The bill will be open for action by the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know what are the committee amendments. This is a Senate bill?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. What are the committee amendments that we are to consider at this time? Are any amendments to be considered that did not come from the committee?

Mr. MORGAN. All the amendments of the committee are printed in italics.

Mr. CULLOM. The committee itself reported some amendments when they brought the bill back.

Mr. TELLER. There are no committee amendments except what the bill contains.

Mr. CULLOM. No, except——

Mr. TELLER. Then that is all right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There are other amendments, I understand, from the committee besides those which are printed in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I have stated that in the chapter which the Secretary has just been reading a number of sections have repealed the local laws, and there are places——

Mr. HALE. The local laws of Hawaii?

Mr. TELLER. The Hawaiian laws.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, the Hawaiian laws. And there are sections cited here where the word "inclusive" ought to be inserted between certain numbers, and that I thought could be done this afternoon.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, there is no objection to that.

Mr. CULLOM. There is nothing in those amendments except to make that change.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If we are going no further than that, the whole matter will be open another day. That is all I desire.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say that I am very anxious to get this bill passed as quickly as we can, and yet I do not desire to interfere with our friends on the other side this afternoon, who I understand wish to have a conference of their own.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say a word to the Senator who has the bill in charge. I do not want to delay the passage of the bill, but there are some provisions in it that I am going to suggest some changes in.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will have ample opportunity to move to amend the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I have had some experience in living under Territorial law, and there are some things in the bill that I do not think ought to be enacted.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will have an opportunity to propose the changes he desires to have made.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator is not going to railroad it through there will be time to examine it.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not seeking any special haste about it beyond what is reasonable in the premises, and I have not manifested any such disposition.

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. FORAKER. The understanding is simply that the bill shall be read and the amendments, as they appear in print before us, shall be acted upon as reached. That is as far as we shall get this afternoon.

Mr. CULLOM. I apprehend that by the time we get the bill read and the few amendments are acted upon which were made in the committee before the bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, it will be about the time when I had agreed, so far as I was concerned, to allow the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I wish to offer it at this time, so that it may be printed and we may have printed copies at the earliest moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and go to the table.

Mr. FORAKER. Let it be read, so that we may know now what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert, on page 25, after the word "language," in line 2, the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may at any time after January 1, 1903, submit to the lawfully qualified voters of such Territory such changes and modifications in the qualifications for electors as they shall see fit, and the same being adopted by a majority vote, taken in the mode prescribed by the legislature, shall be valid and binding as law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed. The Secratary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 14, page 9, line 14, after the word "November," to strike out "1899" and insert "1900;" so as to make the section read:

That a general election shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1900, and every second year thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 17, page 10, line 7, after the name "Hawaii," to strike out "including notaries public and agents to take acknowledgments;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 17. That no person holding office in or under or by authority of the Government of the United States or of the Territory of Hawaii shall be eligible to election to the legislature or to hold the position of a member of the same while holding said office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 18, on page 10, line 25, after the words "convicted of," to strike out "larceny, bribery, grosscheat, or of;" and on page 11, line 3, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" so as to read:

No idiot or insane person, and no person who shall be expelled from the legislature for giving or receiving bribes or being accessory thereto, and no person who, in due course of law, shall have been convicted of any criminal offense punishable by imprisonment, whether with or without hard labor, for a term exceeding one year, whether with or without fine, shall register to vote or shall vote or hold any office in or under or by authority of the government, unless the person so convicted shall have been pardoned and restored to his civil rights.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 42, on page 17, line 22, after the word "other," to insert "house," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 42. That neither house shall adjourn during any session for more than three days, or sine die, without the consent of the other house.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 62, on page 25, prescribing the "Qualifications of voters for senators."

Mr. MONEY. Would it be in order to make an inquiry for information about the qualifications of voters for senators, I ask the Senator who reported the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. I will state to the Senator that there is an understanding that nothing shall be done to-day except formally reading the bill and acting upon the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. MONEY. Very well. I was not aware of that.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in section 73, on page 32, line 4, relative to the "Commissioner of public lands," after the word "Provided," to insert:

That all sales, grants, leases, and other disposition of the public domain and agreements concerning the same, and all franchises granted by the Hawaiian Government in conformity with the laws of Hawaii prior to the 11th day of September, 1893, are hereby ratified and confirmed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 75, on page 33, relative to the "Investigation of land laws."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois in charge of the bill if he does not think it would be more appropriate to place the charge of the public lands in Hawaii under the Secretary of the Interior, rather than the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. CULLOM. One or two Senators have made inquiries regarding the provisions of the bill, but I will say to the Senator there was an understanding that the bill should only be read this afternoon and the amendments of the committee acted upon. I should prefer to defer any explanation of the provisions of the bill until the reading shall have been completed and the Senate is more fully attended than it is at the present time.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I just came into the Chamber, and was not aware that such an arrangement had been made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in section 81, page 36, line 18, after the word "office," to strike out "during good behavior" and insert "for a term of nine years;" so as to read:

All such officers shall hold office for four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless sooner removed, except the chief justice and justices of the supreme court, who shall hold office for a term of nine years, and the judges of the circuit courts, whose terms of office shall be six years, and except the commissioners of public instruction and the members of said boards, whose terms of office shall be as provided by the laws of the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask that the amendment may be passed over. This whole section proposes to introduce into a Territory which we are creating an entirely new system of appointment of judges and some other officers.

Mr. CULLOM. This is only the reading of the section. It is not being adopted.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I want this amendment to be passed over, because I do not want it even adopted now.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

Mr. CULLOM. Page 36.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Section 81, to which I refer, commences on page 35.

Mr. President, we are giving to this new Territory of ours powers and privileges which we have given to no other Territory that has ever been organized in the United States.

In every Territory that has been organized we have reserved to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the appointment of judicial officers—judges, marshals, and other officers of that character. Here we commit it entirely to the governor of the Territory. If this section passes, neither the President of the United States nor the Senate can have anything to say about who shall be judges in that Territory.

Now, one single thing more. We have provided that the judges of all our legislative courts should have a tenure of office of four years only. This bill not only takes entirely away from the President and the Senate the power of appointment of the chief justice and justices of the supreme court, but it continues in office by legislation the chief justice and justices of the supreme court for a term of nine years. We never had a Territory of the United States where judges had a tenure of office longer than four years. I merely speak of it now. I should like this amendment to be passed over. I do not want to go into the matter at length at this time.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word, inasmuch as the Senator from Connecticut is disposed to discuss the bill as we go along, which I have tried to avoid as we are only having it read now.

The commission which was sent to Hawaii found there a very good civil government. Of course there were many things not entirely satisfactory and which we propose to change, but the commission desired to recognize the situation as it was and, so far as we could, consistently with the interests of the United States, allow conditions to remain there that were not entirely out of harmony with the spirit of the Government of the United States at home. We found a supreme court there, not to administer United States statutes, but to administer the laws of the Territory, which is preserved in the bill and which is in harmony, as we thought, with the general principles and interests of the Government of the United States as well as of that Territory.

The plan of the bill is to retain the legislature, the system of local courts, purely to administer Territorial statutes, and to provide a United States judge to administer the United States laws. The commission believe that the wisest course for us to pursue is to retain in force the laws, so far as they are consistent with our ideas of government, and the courts to administer them; and we found there a life tenure of judicial officers. The Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate thought perhaps that that was not exactly the right thing to do, and so we limit the terms of the judges of the supreme court to nine years and of the circuit judges of that Territory to six years.

We believe there is no occasion for changing everything there simply because we can and because in the Territories here in our own country we have United States judges to administer Territorial statutes as well as United States statutes. We believe it is wise to allow the judges of the local courts there to have entire control and jurisdiction over the local statutes of the Territory and a United States judge to administer the United States laws. I do not know whether in any of our States there is a life tenure. I do not remember any; but there are in different States different laws controlling the terms and qualifications of the officers. I believe myself that while it is a little different from what we have in New Mexico or Arizona, yet it is more beneficial to recognize the situation there as nearly as we can rather than tear up the whole system of their local government and create it anew.

As the Senator from Connecticut knows, the United States judges here, who are appointed to go to the Territories, in performing their duties there administer the local laws of the Territories as well as the United States statutes generally. But as to Hawaii, it seemed to the commission that we ought to adopt the plan they have there, supplementing it with a provision for a United States judge. The plan is to constitute the different islands into a Territory and have a judge administer United States laws, pure and simple, and officers to execute and administer them. That is all I want to say now. I did not care to discuss the matter at all.

Mr. FORAKER. Would it not be better to allow the amendment to be passed over, as the Senator from Connecticut suggested, until we can take up together all the points that are objected to. We may in that way be able to conclude the reading of the bill this afternoon.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Connecticut insisted upon discussing it, and I was trying to answer him a little.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator from Connecticut to say that he did not care to discuss the matter now. He merely wanted to call attention to the point and to have the amendment passed over.

Mr. CULLOM. He has been discussing it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was giving reasons why I thought the amendment should be passed over.

Mr. FORAKER. That was all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator from Illinois thought I was really discussing the matter, I will try to enlighten him hereafter as to why I think no such provision as he has in section 81 should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendment be passed over?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to its being passed over, and had not in the first place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, in section 85, page 39, line 1, after the word "have," to strike out the words "either directly or through such relative;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 85. That no person shall sit as a judge or juror in any case in which his relative by affinity or by consanguinity within the third degree is interested, either as a plaintiff or defendant, or in the issue of which the said judge or juror may have any pecuniary interest. No judge shall sit on an appeal or new trial in any case in which he may have given a previous judgment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 94, page 43, line 11, after the word "dollars," to insert "United States district judge, $5,000;" and in line 18, after the word "dollars," to insert "annually;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 94. That the following officers shall receive the following annual salaries, to be paid by the United States: The governor, $5,000; the secretary of the Territory, $3,000; United States district judge, $5,000; the United States marshal, $2,000; the United States district attorney, $2,000. And the governor shall receive annually, in addition to his salary, the sum of $500 for stationery, postage, and incidentals; also his traveling expenses while absent from the capital on official business, and the sum of $2,000 annually for his private secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the last paragraph of section 98, page 45, line 10, after the word "the," to strike out "governor" and insert "attorney-general;" in line 11, after the word "Hawaii," to strike out "may" and insert "shall;" in line 12, after the word "in," to strike out "a" and insert "such;" and in the same line, before the word "provided," to insert "as may be;" so as to make the paragraph read:

That if such fishing right be established, the attorney-general of the Territory of Hawaii shall proceed, in such manner as may be provided by law for the condemnation of property for public use, to condemn such private right of fishing to the use of the citizens of the United States upon making just compensation, which compensation, when lawfully ascertained, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the Territory of Hawaii not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire, in behalf of the committee, to move to strike out sections 104 and 105 and to insert in lieu of those sections:

SEC. 104. That this act shall take effect sixty days on and after the date of the approval thereof.

The adoption of this amendment I will state is very important.

Mr. PETTUS. Is not the phrase "on and after the date" misleading?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is wrong. If the Senator from Illinois will look at it he will see that it is wrong.

Mr. CULLOM. I took it out of the House print. Let it read "from and after its passage."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out sections 104 and 105, in the following words:

SEC. 104. That the legislature of the Republic of Hawaii may enact laws not inconsistent with the foregoing provisions prior to the taking effect thereof.

SEC. 105. That this act shall take effect on the 4th day of July, 1900, except section 104 hereof, which shall take effect immediately after the approval of this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 104. That this act shall take effect sixty days from and after the date of the approval thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe it was understood that on the completion of the reading of the bill there would be an adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator gave notice that he wished to insert the word "exclusive" in two or three places.

Mr. CULLOM. There are quite a number of those places, and as I think Senators are a little anxious that the Senate shall now adjourn, I will defer that for a future day. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 19, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 16, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BENNETT, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. W. R. Abercrombie on the Copper River exploration expedition to Alaska, transmitted by the Secretary of War, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for distribution by the War Department.

SENATE RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. W. R. Abercrombie on the Copper River exploration expedition to Alaska, transmitted by the Secretary of War, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for distribution by the War Department—to the Committee on Printing.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, House bill No. 1, known as the financial bill, has just been returned to the House, and I ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in Senate amendment to the House bill No. 1, fixing the standard of value, etc., and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment of the Senate ought to be printed in the RECORD, and if the gentleman will accompany his motion with that request, I see no objection to it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the amendment is already printed in the RECORD of this morning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman thinks it is printed with the Senate proceedings of yesterday?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is the gentleman sure that it is the same as it comes to the House?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would not object to the request, Mr. Speaker, but I am under the impression that it is contained in the RECORD of this morning.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the RECORD shows the bill as it passed the Senate, and yet I thought it well to have the amendment printed separately as a part of the House proceedings.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman adds to his request that the Senate amendment be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none. The Chair will announce the conferees during the day.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills.

Mr. SIMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. If this motion is voted down, will it be in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider business on the Private Calendar, it being Friday?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. SIMS. Then I hope the motion will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SIMS) there were 76 ayes and 54 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair) for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the appropriation bill, the title to which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill 8347, making appropriation for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For superintendent, $1,800.

For assistants and laborers, under the direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $12,093.75.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. I want to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if this is the total expense of the Botanic Garden? Is this bill the entire expense of that institution, or are there other items carried in some other bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am informed by the clerk of the committee that on the sundry civil bill there is an appropriation of $5,000 for the buildings.

Mr. HEPBURN. Are not the appropriations for the Botanic Garden carried on still another bill, is not that the rule?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I understand on the sundry civil bill there is an appropriation of about $5,000 in addition to the appropriation carried here.

Mr. HEPBURN. And no other?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not that I know of, and I think I am correct.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery therefor, as well as record books, telegrams, telephones, books for library, miscellaneous items, and furniture and carpets for offices, care of office carriage, horses, and harness, $12,000.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. If I thought that a motion to strike out the appropriation providing for the Civil Service Commission would put an end to that commission and its work, I would make that motion before this House, and ask for its consideration and a vote; but I am persuaded that even if this clause in the bill should be extirpated by a vote of this House, this commission would continue in existence and in the performance of its functions, and that the money needed for its payment and sustenance would be furnished out of other appropriations of the Government, or supplied subsequently by the presentation of a deficiency.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do desire, in the presence of this House and of the country, to register my unqualified and unequivocal opposition to every feature of the civil-service law of 1883, supplemented by the act of 1871 in its present application and administration. My reasons for the opposition to that law are fundamental. They go to the very foundation of the theory upon which the law is based.

I shall first, sir, consider the first objection that occurs, and that is that the passage and application of this law to the various branches of the public service without requiring examinations to test the fitness of the then incumbents in office of the public service was pernicious and vicious partiality. If this law can be justified upon any theory, it is upon the theory that in 1883 the Departments of the Government of the United States were filled with incompetent people. If that were not true, then there was no necessity for the passage of the civil-service law.

If that were true, then the test of examination should justly have been applied to those who then filled the offices in the Executive Departments of the public service. That was not done; and therefore the inevitable conclusion is that hundreds, yea, thousands of incompetent clerks and other officials were kept in the public service by the civil-service law of 1883.

It is not necessary, Mr. Chairman, to rely upon inference alone for that statement, because it has been stated by those in charge of this bill that the public service to-day is filled with incompetent officials. That being the case, where, I ask, do you find the efficiency of this law? This law practically said, "The public service is filled with incompetent clerks"——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE] has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to continue five minutes.

Mr. PEARRE. I would like to have ten minutes more.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then I ask that the gentleman be allowed ten minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PEARRE. Those in favor of this law, its advocates, practically said to the people of the United States: "The public service is filled with incompetent clerks; we must have a law to put them out; we must have a law to purge the public service and make competency the test of eligibility to that service." Yet that law contained no provision which would test the qualification of the man who was in—whose incompetency must have been the reason and justification for the passage of the law—but only placed Congress in the inconsistent position of requiring a test of qualification for those who are trying to get in.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why I am opposed to the civil-service law in its present operation and administration, and that is that its provisions apply solely to the lower offices in the public service. Heads of Departments, heads of bureaus, the men who control the affairs of those Departments, are subjected to no test of qualification. It is a discrimination against the poor, the humble, the uninfluential, and places a premium upon political favoritism or upon the political hack, who, by handling primaries or manipulating political conventions, has ingratiated himself into the favor of some political boss.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. PEARRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. Is it not apparent from the gentleman's examination of this matter that the question of the efficiency of the civil-service law depends almost entirely on the head of the particular Department who undertakes to administer it?

Mr. PEARRE. I quite agree with the gentleman as to that, and that is my argument—that if you put at the head of the Departments men of proper qualifications, men of efficiency, men of probity, men of honesty, who are determined to see that the public service is purged and kept free from incompetent subordinates, you have every guaranty that the safety of this nation and the good of the public service requires.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PEARRE. I yield for a moment, but I do not want it taken out of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Is there any single Department of the Government where inefficiency has resulted from the operation of the civil-service system? Has any head of a Department ever complained that the inefficiency of clerks in his Department was due to the operation of the civil-service system?

Mr. PEARRE. I have heard numerous complaints in regard to clerks. But that would not make any difference so far as the argument of the gentleman is concerned unless he is prepared to state the instances of inefficiency arising before the passage of this law.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. There were thousands.

Mr. PEARRE. Yes; and there are thousands to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Where are they?

Mr. PEARRE. Where were they before?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. In every Department of the Government.

Mr. PEARRE. I reply to the gentleman in the same way. In every Department of the Government the complaints of inefficiency are so common that any specific or special cases are not necessary to be referred to. So far as that is concerned, the gentleman from Indiana said yesterday that in the Departments—in one Department, at any rate—there are to-day 10 per cent of incompetent clerks; and the complaint is made that it is impossible to get those incompetents out.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE] yield?

Mr. PEARRE. Yes, if it is not taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It must be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Is there anything in the civil-service law to prevent heads of Departments from discharging incompetent men?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; in the Executive order.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I am asking the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. PEARRE. I will answer the gentleman from Massachusetts without any suggestion, although I am very glad to have suggestions from the gentleman from Ohio. The provision which interferes with the power of removal in the heads of Departments is in the order of the President, which says that they shall not be removed except upon charges made in writing and for just cause.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. As my colleague stated yesterday——

Mr. PEARRE. I do not yield further. I shall be ready to hear the gentleman fully on this subject when he has the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. If the civil-service law were out of the way, the gentleman from Maryland, residing so near Washington, would just fill this town with Marylanders occupying public office.

Mr. PEARRE. I fancy that the patriotism of Massachusetts is not superior to that of other States, because I heard read in this House the other day a list of members of Massachusetts regiments that never smelt powder in the Spanish war and who are now asking pensions.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PEARRE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. PEARRE. Sir, the Massachusetts regiment, that never got near Santiago, has filed to-day, according to the statement of a responsible member of this House, applications for pensions to the number of 500, or nearly half of their whole number.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am further opposed to this law, because I do not believe that examination is a test of fitness for the particular work. It has gone into history, sir, that the valedictorian is never heard of after commencement day.

If you will go through the annals of the bar of this country—and I think this statement will commend itself to the recollection, judgment, and approval of every member of the bar in this House—you will find, sir, that those students of law who have given the best promise of success by standing high in their studies while at the law schools and passing the best examinations, in many instances, when brought to face the practical problems of the profession and apply the principles to the practice, have become absolute failures.

Look at the Army in every war in which this country has been engaged. Some of the most distinguished successes have been gained by men who had not the advantage of the technical training of the West Point Military School, the latest illustration of which, sir, is the magnificent career of that soldier of the people, taken from its loins, Lawton, who died so gloriously in the Philippines the other day. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, look at the medical profession, and you will find that colleges are filled with professors who have scientific knowledge of the principles of their profession, who, when faced by the application of those principles to the ills of mankind, have proved utter and complete failures.

Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to go that far, because it has been admitted in this debate that the temporary clerks provided by the deficiency acts of 1898 in the War Department have given as complete satisfaction in point of service and efficiency as any men taken from a certification of the Civil Service Commissioners, and better in many instances. If this be the case, where is the need for such a law?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PEARRE. I should like to have five minutes more. I was interrupted several times.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I have no objection——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes' time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland may proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEARRE. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is admitted upon this floor in this debate, that the temporary clerks in the War Department have given ample satisfaction and have performed every duty the public service requires. Why, Mr. Chairman, as a further illustration that examinations are not conclusive tests of fitness, nor even reasonably good tests of fitness for the particular work, I may be pardoned for calling the attention of this House to a case which came within my own personal observation. A lady applied for a position in the Census Office and was required to pass the examination. She was 50 years of age. She had been teaching school to my personal knowledge for twenty-five years and had been engaged in literary pursuits during her whole life, a woman of fine intellect, of great qualification, a woman who had devoted her life to the technical matters of education. Yet, sir, in the face of that examination she failed; whereas to-day I am prepared to say to this House that there is not one jot or tittle of doubt about her eminent qualifications for any position to which she might have been appointed had she passed that examination in that Bureau.

But, Mr. Chairman, these are not the only objections. This law is full of inconsistencies and inequalities in its operation. Why, there is an attempt made in the act of 1871 to lead the people in this country to believe that some sort of preference is shown to the old soldier in these civil-service laws, but if you will look at that law you will discover that in order to have that preference he must show an injury in the service, traceable to the service, and then the President's order requires that he shall pass the examination and attain a grade of 65, no matter what his service may have been, no matter how loyal he may have been to his country, no matter at what personal sacrifice of comfort and prospects he gave his services to his country. He has no preference unless he can trace his disability to the service. And yet, sir, in the succeeding section you will discover that those who were not injured in the service are kindly recommended to the tender mercies of the banker, the manufacturer, and the merchant for preference in securing employment.

If this be not a lie written upon the statute books of the United States, then repeal this law and give to every loyal soldier of the Government of the United States preference for employment to which he was entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this law is un-American and unnecessary. It reminds one and savors much of the old laws of primogeniture and entail in England. It is unnecessary, for the reasons that I have given.

During the whole period of this country's history it was never found necessary until all the issues between the parties seemed to have been thrashed over and fought out and statesmen were looking about for some sort of new political emotion. Then they turned to this grand reform in the civil service of the Government.

Why, sir, these colonies, when but 3,000,000 people, waged war against the strongest nation then upon the earth. All the civil Departments of the Government of those colonies were strained to the utmost, and yet, sir, the autonomy of their Government and their success was never interfered with by the fact that we had no such civil-service law.

In 1812, sir, this nation, a little bit stronger, got into a controversy with Great Britain again, and whipped out of that nation a recognition of the principle, which has since become a principle of international law, that the American flag on board an American ship protected any man who rested beneath the shadow of its folds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PEARRE. I should like to have five minutes more. I will promise the gentleman from Indiana that I shall not ask for further time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEARRE. As I said, sir, in that war we whipped out of Great Britain the recognition of the principle, which has since become a principle of international law, that the American flag on an American ship protected any man who rested beneath the shadow of its folds. And, sir, at that time, as in every case of war, every civil Department of this Government was stirred and strained to excessive activity, yet no need was felt for reform in the civil service, and the success of our arms was in no way interfered with.

In 1848 we took into our arms appealing Texas, with her magnificent domain, and Florida afterwards. Prior to that time we had made the Louisiana purchase, and we have managed and administered the affairs of that vast territory, bringing portions of it in as States at different times, without destroying the autonomy of our Government or feeling the need for reform in the civil service.

In 1861, sir, brothers in this land were engaged in a controversy which could only be settled by the arbitrament of the sword. All the branches of the civil service of the Government were unusually stirred, and yet, sir, we went through that war and reached a satisfactory settlement of the enormous questions involved without the aid of a civil-service law and without feeling any necessity for it. During that war, sir, billions of money were spent and the armies of the United States were organized with more than a million of men. Yet the civil branches of this Government did not suffer by reason of the fact that we had no civil-service law.

The United States Government has been the pioneer, under God, in the progress of civilization, and to-day, sir, she has planted her flag in the Orient, which is the day star of hope and the pole star to the nations of the earth, to the haven of political regeneration and redemption. There we find the boys in blue and the boys in gray, under Grant and Wheeler, marching to the blended strains of Yankee Doodle and Dixie [applause] to advance the landmarks of civilization and to retain the flag of this nation where it has been once justly planted. [Applause.] That flag, sir, has ever been and will ever be the panoply of freedom and the talisman of equal rights to all men under the law.

Those boys who are fighting there to-day, sir, are considered capable by the people of this country to guard this nation's flag and honor and to advance the landmarks of civilization. If they are fit for that, in God's name, I ask, should they not be recognized as fit to administer, without examinations, at least the minor civil offices when that insurrection has been suppressed and civil government restored? [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think there is some reason, judging from the criticisms we have seen in the public press at various times during the past four years of the manner in which the civil-service laws are administered by the present Administration, for the criticism of the civil-service laws in general which has just been made by the gentleman from Maryland. I think the real reason that actuates the gentleman in making this attack is the fact that Maryland is so close to Washington, if the civil-service law should be repealed, all the gentleman's constituents would flock here and take possession of the offices.

Mr. PEARRE. Will the gentleman permit me? I permitted the gentleman to interrupt me.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. PEARRE. I just want to assign a reason, one reason only, on this subject. The Congressional platform upon which I was nominated declared for the repeal or modification of this law; and further than that, when an amendment to the constitution of Maryland was suggested and submitted to the people in 1873, providing for a civil-service law in Maryland, it was defeated by 60,000 votes.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That only confirms the statement that I made, that the gentleman's constituents in Maryland, as a general rule, are in favor of the repeal of the law, so that they could get possession of offices in the District of Columbia, and the other portions of the country would not get their proper share.

Mr. WACHTER. I desire to say, as a member from Maryland, that it gives us more trouble also, by reason of being so close to the capital.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. WACHTER. But we are against it.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. You are so close that the rest of the country would not get recognition at all if the civil-service law is repealed. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I stated yesterday on the floor of the House, the civil-service law is carried out nearly to perfection, if I might put it that way, by those who are the responsible heads of the different departments of the National Government in the city of Boston; and, as I stated yesterday, for the past fifteen years, since Mr. Cleveland first assumed the office of President, the women and the men who have taken the examination for service under the National Government in that city are appointed in the order of merit. On the walls of the Boston post-office to-day is exposed a list of those men and women who have taken the examination in the past year, and I challenge the gentleman who has just taken his seat or any other member of this House to show where a single individual's name has been passed. Politics has not interfered in the appointment, and every man and woman who has been appointed can thank his own brains and industry rather than charge his appointment up to some one with a political pull.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, how the law has operated in other sections of the country. I know that it is not lived up to in the city of Washington at the present time, and the Civil Service Commission has protested against its evasion more than once. I know it is not lived up to in other sections of the country, and the attention of the President has been called to that fact by the Civil Service Commission. The attention of the President of the United States has been called to the fact that the civil-service law has been violated in the matter of levying assessments upon officeholders for the success of the Republican party in the Ohio campaign last year. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is a notorious fact, Mr. Chairman, that almost every postmaster and every employee under the United States Government, in our State at least, received a circular letter from the chairman of the Republican State committee of Ohio asking for an assessment to benefit the Republican campaign in the State of Ohio.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. WACHTER. Do you mean to say that that was not done under the Cleveland Administration?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I never knew of any circular being sent around, and I do not believe any such practice was indulged in.

Mr. WACHTER. Do you mean to say that it was not done under the Cleveland Administration?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Never done that I have heard.

Mr. WACHTER. It was done in the city of Baltimore.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I challenge the gentleman to produce evidence in order. Now, Mr. Chairman, the records of the Railway-Mail Service here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The records of the Railway Mail Service here in Washington show the efficiency of the civil service in that branch of the Government work. The reports of that office tell us that since the civil service has been in operation that great department of the Government has increased its efficiency tremendously, to that extent, I believe, that only a very small fraction of 1 per cent of mistakes are made in that Bureau now.

When boys from my district and my State have written to me and asked me to do something toward getting them appointed, I have told them in every instance that the appointment would be made in the order in which they appeared on the list, and I believe there never has been an exception to that rule. Now, I do not know what State the lady who, according to the gentleman from Maryland, has been teaching school for twenty-five years came from, who could not pass a civil-service examination, but in my own State of Massachusetts we have the list crowded with the names of those who pass these examinations without any trouble twice every year, and I will cheerfully excuse the ignorance of my friend from Maryland upon this great question if that is the character of school-teaching that he has been compelled to submit to. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has chosen to go out of his way and attack the Massachusetts regiments. He made a statement that men in these regiments had applied for pensions who had never smelt gunpowder.

Mr. PEARRE. I did not make that statement. I referred to it as a statement made by a gentleman on the floor of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was just going to ask if the gentleman from Massachusetts heard the speech on his side of the House yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I did not hear the speech or I would have answered it on the spot. I was in my committee room, and I never knew anything about the matter until a few moments ago.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be well to answer the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I intend to do that. I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee before I take my seat.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He said that there were six or seven hundred applications for a pension from one regiment in your State that never heard a gun fired.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I intend to answer that statement if the gentleman will give me time.

Mr. WACHTER. That was only a repetition of the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Maryland said that neither of these regiments smelt any powder. He seems to be as familiar with the records of Massachusetts soldiers as he is with the working of the civil-service law. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have the Spanish-American war record, taken from the Office of the Adjutant-General, in which the Second Massachusetts had 1 officer killed in action and 3 officers wounded; 4 enlisted men killed and 41 men were wounded, and 4 enlisted men died of wounds received in the service. Two officers and 86 men died of disease contracted in the service.

I will now present the record of the Ninth Massachusetts, the other regiment referred to by the gentleman from Maryland. I will say at this time that the gentleman from Tennessee who made the original statement concerning these regiments stated to me before I took the floor, when I asked him his authority for his facts, that the table which he read the other day was prepared by the Pension Bureau, and he gave out the statement just as it was presented to him from the Pension Bureau. This action of the Pension Commissioner confirms the charge that I made against him the other day in the House, that he is hostile to the just claim of the Spanish-American war veteran, and when he submits a table to this House in which it is stated that no deaths resulted from the service of the Ninth Massachusetts Regiment, he certainly displays a lamentable amount of ignorance or betrays an evident purpose to do a great injustice to this regiment. The record of the Ninth Massachusetts Regiment, taken from the Adjutant-General's Office, shows that there were 3 men wounded, 4 officers and 110 enlisted men died from disease contracted in the service.

Mr. WACHTER. From what cause?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. From disease contracted by the inefficiency and neglect of this Government. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I wish the members of this House to understand that no other State in this Union has a prouder record than Massachusetts in this war, and when the gentleman says that neither of these regiments smelt powder he says what is not true. I wish to say that the Second Massachusetts was about the first, if not the first, volunteer regiment that landed in Cuba, and that the Ninth Massachusetts followed a short time afterwards, and that the State of Massachusetts has the proud record of being the only State that furnished two regiments in the memorable campaign of Santiago.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it was not necessary for men to die of wounds in the Santiago campaign to show that they were valiant and to entitle those depending upon them for support to apply for a pension. Disease in the Crimean war created more havoc among the English soldiers than bullets. We all know what occurred in the Santiago campaign, and we all know the conditions that existed there. I have seen it stated somewhere that when the British army, under the Earl of Albemarle, landed on the Cuban coast and attacked Habana in 1762 it lost nearly half of its efficiency by sickness in less than four weeks.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. I want simply to remind the gentleman from Massachusetts that Michigan had two volunteer regiments at Santiago.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That is true. I accept that statement. The gentleman from Michigan is correct.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. And the Seventy-first New York Regiment was there.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The Second Massachusetts Regiment was on the firing line and participated in the fight at El Caney and San Juan, and the Ninth Massachusetts arrived just after these battles and indulged in slight skirmishing until the peace treaty was signed. This regiment held the trenches in front of the city of Santiago, and if hostilities had been resumed would have been directly in front of the enemy. Both these regiments were armed with Springfield rifles and used black powder, exposing them to the well-directed shots of the Spaniards, who, though fighting for a bankrupt Government, were provided with the most modern gun known to civilized warfare. Two of the three majors of the Ninth Massachusetts died on Cuban soil as a result of their service within a month of the landing of the regiment, and the colonel of the regiment, who was ordered north after contracting this insidious fever that prevailed there, died two days after his arrival in Boston.

It was the duty of this Government, the richest in the world, to provide these troops with every safeguard that medical science could suggest; but how lamentably the Government failed in this direction is known to the House.

When the reports of men dying by the score every day from diseases in Cuba was flashed to this country, our President, Mr. McKinley, telegraphed General Shafter for the reason. This is what General Shafter replied. General Shafter telegraphed that 75 per cent of his command had been disabled by fever, and eight general officers of the Fifth Army Corps were signing a round robin in which they declared that if the army was not immediately moved it must perish.

Shafter also said, "What put my command in its present condition were the twenty days of this campaign when they had nothing but meat (fat bacon), bread, and coffee, without change of clothes and without any shelter whatever." Shafter telegraphed August 3, "There has never been sufficient medical attendance or medicine for the daily wants of my command."

One of the magazine writers, speaking of the situation from personal observation, made this criticism of the campaign in Cuba: "The marines observed the laws of health and lived according to the dictates of modern sanitary science, while the soldiers, through no fault of their own, were forced to violate almost every known law of health and to live as though there was no such thing as sanitary science in existence."

I was at Montauk Point when the Second Massachusetts Regiment arrived from Cuba, and I saw those boys (the great majority of them not able to walk the short distance of half a mile to the detention camp) fall by the roadside—not by ones and twos, but by the tens—and I saw them ten days afterwards, just able to walk to the boat which conveyed them to Massachusetts and home.

I saw the Ninth Regiment land at Montauk Point a few days after the Second, and I helped them in every way that I could to get sustenance. The incapacity of the Government at that time to furnish these men food and rations was such that I was compelled to fight with the commissary down there before I could get those boys milk and bread and beef five or six hours after they had landed upon that island. There were no overcoats there; they were not provided with proper tentage; they had no stoves to cook food. And when I went to the Quartermaster-General and asked for overcoats and uniforms and stoves, he said they were not on hand. And those boys, after they came from Cuba—and I was with them for a week—lay in their tents upon the cold, damp ground.

But with all the care that was given by private individuals, to these boys, after their return, died by the hundred.

Now, Mr. Chairman, because these men did not receive wounds, because their legs were not shot off, because they were not hit with missiles fired from Spanish guns, is that any reason why they should be deprived of their right to a pension? If this Government, by its incapacity, its inability to furnish those men with food, with proper sustenance, rendered able-bodied men unfit for employment, made it impossible for them to support their wives and their children, their fathers or their mothers, is it to be said that they are not entitled to exact from the Government that which is theirs?

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the gentleman from Maryland holds any such doctrine as that. I can not believe the gentleman from Tennessee meant to make any charge against the patriotism of Massachusetts soldiers. The statement which he presented he took as a record given him by the Pension Department; and, as I stated a few moments ago, the Pension Commissioner of the United States has no sympathy at all with the Spanish-American war veterans. I know——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I would like just two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts continue his remarks for two minutes more? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I know that among 25,000 applications pending for pensions there are some that are not warranted, are not justifiable; but I know that there are hundreds of worthy claims lying in the Pension Bureau now, according to the statement of the Pension Commissioner himself, that have never been investigated, but await the first scrutiny of an official of the Pension Department.

I know of instances where these boys attempted to go to work, and did work for a few days, but they were compelled to give up. I have heard employers of these men say that they did not know what was the nature of this disease contracted in Cuba by these men—this malarial fever and typhoid fever and dysentery—but that the disease was more insidious than any of which they had had experience; it simply left these men unfit for duty.

They went away full of animal life and vigor—in the prime of manhood. They came back physical wrecks. I do not know what may be the number of pension claims that have been presented at the Department, but I will say on this floor, Mr. Chairman, that those boys from Massachusetts who served in the campaign in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippine Islands did their duty heroically, and that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has every reason to be proud of the grand and noble record that her sons made in this struggle. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I was very glad that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE], who is a good lawyer, recognized the futility of making the usual annual motion to strike out this appropriation. I do not believe the House wishes to waste its time in debating this question, which we all see is not coming to any issue. I do not want to discuss the question generally. I would not say anything but for the fact that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made yesterday, in a confident and rather pugnacious way, a statement which I think demands a reply. He said that when the civil-service law was enacted nobody claimed that the existing service was poor, and that Senator Pendleton, who had charge of the measure, took the ground that it was introduced simply to make a division of offices between the two parties. "And," said the gentleman from Ohio, "I challenge any man on this floor to put his finger on any utterance of the character to which I have referred."

Now, unless somebody responded to that it might be thought that that statement was correct, and therefore I wish simply to read the following sentences from the debate at that time.

In the debate on the civil-service bill in the United States Senate in 1883, Senator Pendleton said:

> I repeat, Mr. President, that the civil service is inefficient, expensive, and extravagant, and that it is in many instances corrupt. Is it necessary for me to prove the facts, which are so patent that even the blind must see and the deaf must hear?

Senator Beck said:

> Secretaries have said officially to Congressional committees that they are obliged to take people they do not want; that they have to supply places to people for whom they have no use; and one Secretary came before a committee at the last session and said he was obliged to keep 17 persons in his Department whom he did not want, when one man would do the work better than the 17; and still such places are kept for political purposes.

It seems to me that that answers the challenge which the gentleman threw out yesterday.

And now one word concerning the remark that the two Massachusetts regiments in Cuba never smelt powder.

The Second Regiment came entirely from my section of the State. It was, I think, the first volunteer regiment in the whole country that was mustered into the United States service. It not only smelt powder—which the gentleman denied—but it smelt and used the old-fashioned powder on the firing line at El Caney all day beside the regulars with their smokeless powder and modern guns. It showed a gallantry and steadiness which have been repeatedly praised by the regular officers and of which we at our home are very proud. Just how many were killed I do not know, but I do know the number mentioned there is far too small, for we brought back from Santiago to my own city, where there were only three companies, the bodies of thirteen boys, and nearly fifty for the whole regiment; and I think it ill becomes any member of the House to sneer at the services or the losses or the requests for pensions from that gallant regiment.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, in a speech defending the policy of the Administration in reference to the Filipinos and Puerto Ricans, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] discussed at length the constitutional prerogatives of the Federal Government. The burden of his speech was regret that anybody should call in question the absolute sovereignty of the Government of the United States. The gentleman seems to entertain the opinion that the Federal Government possesses the same powers as have immemorially been exercised by the monarchy, and to regard as anomalous the contention that in this country governmental agencies are restrained, limited, and circumscribed by the Constitution.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the fundamental difference between the republic and the monarchy is that in the republic the powers of the government are limited, while in the monarchy they are not. By our Constitution the Federal Government is invested with certain enumerated powers and prohibited from exercising others.

The Congress can not enact ex post facto laws. It can punish for treason, but can decree no attainder of blood. It can impose taxes, but taxes must be equal and uniform throughout the country. It can preserve the peace, but the people shall not be prohibited from bearing arms.

But evidently the framers of the organic law were unwilling to rely upon these specific curtailments of the sovereignty of the General Government. The amendment, which was doubtless intended to preclude the growth of the nation's doctrine of "inherent powers" and "absolute sovereignty," now for the first time preached by an American President, declares that all powers not delegated to the Federal Government are retained to the people or to the States. And yet we hear gentlemen express surprise that anybody should claim that this Government does not possess all the powers exercised by the governments of the Old World.

It is said that if we can not obtain and hold as vassal states populous islands thousands of miles from our shores, then this Government is shorn of a power exercised by all governments throughout the world's history. Why, Mr. Chairman, if we are to accept the history of the monarchy as a guide for our footsteps, if we are to accept as a criterion the powers exercised by foreign governments as the correct interpretation of the powers of our Government, this will be indeed the abandonment of the Constitution and the end of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, the new and strange doctrine upon which the imperial policy of the Administration rests is at variance with the teachings of all the great statesmen of past generations and with a score of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Even the Federalists of the generation that framed the Constitution, the earliest and sturdiest defenders of centralization and extension of the powers of the Federal Government, declared that it could only exercise the powers expressly or by fair implication delegated by the Constitution. Webster and his contemporaries were of the same opinion. And the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States coincide with the views held on this side of the Chamber as to this as well as every other proposition upon which the Administration stands.

Mr. Chairman, not only in their interpretation of the Constitution, but in their demand for the establishment of arbitrary governments over distant colonies the President and his supporters are at variance with all the great statesmen who in the past have written or spoken upon the subject and with the decisions of the Supreme Court. If the Philippines are to be annexed, it must be with the understanding that then and thereby they will become a part of the United States, and as such entitled to the safeguards of the Constitution. Over and over again the Supreme Court has unanimously affirmed that the Government of the United States extends to all territory belonging to the United States, no matter how acquired. It has held that the term "United States" means not merely the States of the Union, but all territory belonging to the United States. It has distinctly held that when territory is annexed to the United States the safeguards and all the provisions of the Constitution extend to that territory.

Alexander Hamilton, an avowed monarchist and most ultra advocate of centralization, laid down this rule for determining the constitutionality of proposed legislation:

If the end be clearly comprehended within any of the specified powers, and if the measure have an obvious relation to that end, and is not forbidden by any provision of the Constitution, it may safely be deemed to come within the compass of the national authority.

Chief Justice Jay announced the same doctrine, and Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Martin vs. Hunter's Lessees (1 Wheaton, 304), declared:

The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution; and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.

In Gibbons vs. Ogdon (9 Wheaton) he said:

This instrument contains an enumeration of the powers expressly granted by the people to the Government.

Daniel Webster asserted the same rule. In the "Reply to Hayne" he said:

The National Government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people conferred upon it, and no more. The people erected this Government. They gave it a Constitution, and in that Constitution they have enumerated the powers which they bestow on it. They have made it a limited government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of such powers as are granted.

It is a Government of strictly limited powers; of enumerated, specified, and particularized powers, and whatever is not granted is withheld.

In his argument in Gibbons vs. Ogden, he said:

In conferring powers it [the Constitution] proceeds by the way of enumeration, stating the powers conferred one after another in few words; and where the power is general or complex in its nature, the extent of the grant must necessarily be judged of and limited by its object and by the nature of the power.

Chief Justice Marshall thus compactly expressed the same views, saying of the Federal Government:

Its powers are unquestionably limited; but while within these limits it is as perfect a government as any other, having all the properties and faculties belonging to a government, with a perfect right to use them freely in order to accomplish the objects of its institution.

Daniel Webster said:

We mislead ourselves often by using terms without sufficient accuracy or terms not customarily found in the Constitution and laws. The term "sovereign" or "sovereignty" does not occur in the Constitution of the United States. It does not speak of the Government as a "sovereign government." It avoids studiously the application of terms that might admit of different views; and the true idea of the Constitution of the United States is that powers are conferred on the legislature, not by general vague description, but by enumeration. The Government of the United States holds no powers which it does not hold as powers enumerated in the Constitution or as powers necessarily implied.

And again:

The sovereignty of government is an idea belonging to the other side of the Atlantic. No such thing is known in North America. Our governments are all limited. In Europe sovereignty is of feudal origin, etc. But with us all power is with the people. They alone are sovereign, and they erect what governments they please, and confer on them such powers as they please. None of these governments is sovereign in the European sense of the word, all being restrained by written constitutions.

Chief Justice Taney also pointed out, in Scott vs. Sandford, the limited extent of the sovereignty of the United States Government, and in Ex parte Merryman, saying:

Nor can any argument be drawn from the nature of sovereignty or the necessities of government for self-defense in times of tumult and danger. The Government of the United States is one of delegated and limited powers. It derives its existence and authority altogether from the Constitution, and neither of its branches can exercise any of the powers of government beyond those specified and granted.

The leading writers, without exception, adhere to the doctrine that ours is a government of laws, administered by governmental agencies whose powers are enumerated and limited, and that the Congress possesses no powers except those conferred by the Constitution, and can enact no law obnoxious to the Constitution.

In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (page 11) it is said:

The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers, the national Constitution being the instrument which specifies them, and in which authority should be found for the exercise of any power which the National Government assumes to possess. In this respect it differs from the constitutions of the several States, which are not grants of powers to the States, but which apportion and impose restrictions upon the powers which the States inherently possess.

In his Constitutional Law (pages 29-31) the same learned jurist states:

The Government created by the Constitution is one of limited and enumerated powers, and the Constitution is the measure and the test of the powers conferred. * * * It is manifest that there must be a difference in the presumption that attends an exercise of national and one of State powers. The difference is this: To ascertain whether any power assumed by the Government of the United States is rightfully assumed the Constitution is to be examined in order to see whether expressly or by fair implication the power has been granted, and if the grant does not appear, the assumption must be held unwarranted. To ascertain whether a State rightfully exercises a power, we have only to see whether by the Constitution of the United States it is conceded to the Union, or by that Constitution or by that of the State prohibited to be exercised at all.

Mr. Chairman, nothing new or novel is laid down in these authorities. This doctrine, approved by these leaders of the Federalists of a hundred years ago and followed by their successors, the Whigs of the last generation, has not until recently been called in question directly by the leaders of the Republican party. The doctrine that our Government possesses inherent sovereign powers, such as are exercised by kings and emperors pretending to divine appointment, is the hatchling and offspring of a Presidential policy which treats the Declaration of Independence as obsolete, regards the Bill of Rights as applicable only to American territory, and contends that Providence directs that this great Republic shall extend its dominion to foreign lands by force of arms. Mr. Chairman, under any circumstances territorial expansion beyond the confines of this continent would be madness, but when to obvious objections to such a policy, viewed solely from the standpoint of our own selfish interests, is added the manifest impossibility of doing so without overturning all preconceived theories of the meaning of the Constitution and the structure of our Government and institutions, certainly the gentlemen who are assuming this grave responsibility should hesitate to take this fatal plunge.

Mr. Chairman, I do not deny that the Government of the United States might not institute, in territories too sparsely settled to permit Territorial organization, governments essentially different from those existing in more favored sections, but even under such circumstances laws for their government would have to be provided by Congress, and such laws would have to conform strictly to the Constitution.

The chasm between this view of the constitutional question raised by the proposal of the Administration to establish and maintain unconstitutional governments in territory acquired by conquest is deep and wide.

We challenge and our opponents affirm the doctrine that this Government possesses powers not delegated by the Constitution. We contend that under the Constitution all the safeguards and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution appertain to every inch of territory owned by the United States, and may be invoked by all who dwell under the flag. Our opponents insist that our armies may conquer distant lands and that, reserving liberty and independence for ourselves, we may impose upon conquered millions any form of government that pleases us, regardless of the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], referring to arguments that have been made against the policy proposed by the Administration, expresses surprise that we should deny the power of this Government to do things which may be done by all other governments. My understanding of the Constitution is that it was intended to limit the powers of Government. It was intended to deprive our Government of powers exercised by others. It provides that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit a question there?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I should be glad to yield, but I have not the time, and I can not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It provides that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed. "That no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herein directed to be taken." "That no tax or duties shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

I might mention other similar provisions contained in the Constitution as originally adopted. Passing to the amendments to the Constitution, we find other limitations upon the powers of government imposed. The Bill of Rights is a distinct negation of the doctrine of the absolute sovereignty of government; and, Mr. Chairman, even more significant than its specific limitations is the constitutional provision that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Mr. Chairman, if the reigning politicians really hope to succeed in the programme mapped out at the White House, they must assume that the Supreme Court is going to reverse at least twenty adjudicated cases, in which every proposition laid down in the Administration policy as to Puerto Rico and the Philippines is declared unconstitutional. That this is their hope was shown early in the controversy by the declaration of a prominent Republican Senator in a speech delivered in the Senate that the Dred Scott decision, in which the court unanimously concurred in denouncing as unconstitutional the very things now proposed by the Administration, long ago became "a hissing and a byword." The Senator was paving the way for an assault upon former decisions of the Supreme Court and took this method of disposing of one of them. The Dred Scott decision at the time of its enunciation was not criticised generally as illogical or contrary to law. The one feature of the decision which shocked the conscience of the nation was that it defined accurately the helpless condition of the slave. It challenged the attention of the American people to the fact that millions of human beings in this country had no civil rights which white men were bound to respect.

It served a purpose in the political discussions of the slavery question in this, that it did hold up to the American people the monstrous proposition that millions of human beings could live under the American flag without the right to resort to the courts created by the Constitution for the enforcement of human rights and the punishment of wrongdoers. Now, what is proposed? The leaders of the great party whose founders pointed to the Dred Scott decision as an adjudication, eloquently setting forth the enormity of human slavery in a Republic, propose to place 12,000,000 Filipinos and 1,000,000 Puerto Ricans under a government restrained by none of the safeguards of the Constitution. They have declared, and propose to proceed to the end upon the proposition, that the people of these islands have no constitutional rights which the American courts are bound to respect. The President proposes that, under such legislation as Congress, unrestrained by the Constitution, may enact, rulers by him appointed shall govern these peoples. They are to be treated as conquered peoples—their islands as vassal states. We are to have one standard for ourselves and our children and another standard for them and their children. Liberty in our own country—vassalage in our dependencies!

And this is not to be a temporary, but a permanent arrangement. These islands are to remain forever the property of the Republic, but are never to fully share its blessings. When I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] yesterday whether, if in the future the islanders should, by means of education, arrive at a standard of intelligence and morality justifying their admission as States, he would favor their admission, he replied that he would not. So say we all. Therefore, the proposition is that eternal slavery shall be fastened upon these people. Mr. Chairman, was such a proceeding ever dreamed of by the founders of our Government? Could such a system endure under the Constitution or laws of the United States? No wonder defenders of such a policy find it necessary to assail the decisions of the Supreme Court. No wonder the Senator who acts as the President's mouthpiece sought to evade the decision of the main question here involved, made by the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott decision, by appealing to prejudices arising out of the antislavery agitation of forty years ago.

It is not even strange that the Senator forgot to state that as to the question now under discussion—the powers of Congress in legislating for the government of the Territories—the court was, in the Dred Scott case, as it has been in half a dozen others in which the same question was under consideration, unanimous in declaring that in all the territory of the United States the Constitution applies; that Congress has no power to enact laws applicable to territories acquired by cession, treaty, or conquest which contravene in any respect the organic law. Ours is a Government of laws, and all governmental agencies are circumscribed, limited, and defined by enumeration in a written Constitution, which applies to every inch of the dominions of the Republic. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, that our discussions here sometimes take a very singular course has been illustrated this morning. Two or three days ago the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] made a speech which I find reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I find two tables showing the casualties in 8 Northern volunteer regiments and 8 Southern volunteer regiments.

A MEMBER. What page is that?

Mr. HEPBURN. Page 1851. The gentleman states in his tables that the casualties in the regiments from the North aggregated 254, in the Southern regiments 185, and in another column the pensions that have been sought for were 3,588 from the Northern regiments and 761 from the Southern regiments, and he takes that as a basis justifying this language:

> There is but one general cause that can be assigned for this great and astounding difference in the number of pension applications from the North and from the South. It must be due to a wide and generally prevailing depraved, debauched, and corrupted public sentiment that exists throughout the North and does not exist throughout the South, due to education and environment.
> Is it any surprise, then, that the brave young men from the North who lately volunteered to go and fight Spain, to liberate her oppressed and taxburdened subjects, are not restrained by the same noble sentiments when it comes to thrusting their hands into the pockets of American taxpayers and robbing them of their hard earnings by means of fraudulent and unjust pensions?

That language was used by the gentleman from Tennessee, a partisan friend of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD]; but the gentleman from Massachusetts sat in his seat silent when that assault was made——

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I was not present.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). Upon his constituents, on those regiments that he eulogizes, and never a word of dissent from him.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). Or if the gentleman was not present, he has seen the RECORD, because he read from it here this morning.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman. I stated a few minutes ago, and the gentleman must have heard if he was here, that I was not present in the House when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] made his charges.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). And when reading from that RECORD, holding it in his hand, he blandly stated to the gentleman from Tennessee, "Undoubtedly he secured his information from the Department."

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). The only rebuke he saw fit to make; and yet when the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE], in the course of a speech in reply to a taunting suggestion from him, imputing an ignoble motive to him, made reference to what had been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, at once the wrath of the gentleman from Massachusetts is excited, and he calls that simple reference an attack upon the honor of the Commonwealth that he in part represents. Singular, is it not, to take without a word of rebuke the assault that is made by his partisan from Tennessee, solicitous to construe into affront and as offensive a mere allusion to that which has been said without the slightest pretense of indorsement?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to have five minutes more if the committee will indulge me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEPBURN. And while I am upon this subject I want to call attention to the unfairness of the usually fair gentleman from Tennessee. I find in the tables that he has made this—in the tables relating to the 8 regiments from Northern States the headings, "Killed," "Wounded," "Missing," "Total." No mention of those who died: no mention of that. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts tells us that those should have been numbered by the hundreds. The gentleman from Tennessee omits those and secures only the meager total of 254 out of those regiments. Yet when it comes to the other regiments, to which he invites comparison——

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. In a moment. When he gets to the casualties that have occurred in the 8 regiments from the South, he finds killed in action, 1; wounded, none; died—the number of deaths which he has omitted in the other table is here set out in full, and together with the 1 killed, no wounded, and the dead, he finds a total of 158. If the gentleman had been fair, if he had stated all the facts in regard to the Northern regiments, as he did with regard to the Southern regiments, he would have found no such disparity as seems to him to justify this harsh, harsh—other words would suit better than that—language.

> Is it any surprise, then, that the brave young men from the North——

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have told the gentleman once that when I got through I would yield to him.

> Is it any surprise, then, that the brave young men from the North who lately volunteered to go and fight Spain, to liberate her oppressed and taxburdened subjects, are not restrained by the same noble sentiments when it comes to thrusting their hands into the pockets of American taxpayers and robbing them of their hard earnings by means of fraudulent and unjust pensions?

Which is worse, to perpetrate a fraud upon the Pension Department or for a man in this House, under the protection that here is given him, to create by suppression of the facts an apparent condition that seems in his mind or might seem in the minds of other persons to justify such an assault?

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement? You are making an attack on me.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not make any attack on you. I am calling attention to what you have done.

Mr. SIMS. Let me tell you what I have done. I want it to go in your remarks. These papers were furnished me; I did not write a figure of them; I did not make a figure; I simply wrote letters for information, and I got the information and the tables, and they were printed just as they came from the Pension Office. I did not select them; I did not leave out or put anything in.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did not the gentleman see that these two tables that he was holding up for the purpose of comparison, on which to base his remarks, were not alike? That from one table there was omitted the great aggregate of those who died from disease?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if the House will kindly yield me five minutes more, I think that will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I want to state how I came to make this investigation. I started out to investigate and see what the difference was in pensions between the Regular Army and those volunteers of like service, and the two first tables were sent me because those regiments served in Cuba at the battle of Santiago, and, if the gentleman will notice, they are alike. Neither shows any deaths. Then I wrote for other regiments coming from farther south. I did not name them. There were eight of them, and three of them were not in battle. There were no killed, wounded, and died put in, and there were no columns of death in either table. I knew nothing about it only what appeared from the record.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman's explanation has been made.

Mr. SIMS. I did not know there were any deaths in these other regiments. I did not intend to make any statement that was not true in every sense, and I will be glad to correct it, as far as possible, if there is error in it. I got the tables from the Pension Office and published them as I got them.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now that the gentleman's attention has been called to the matter, I shall expect the gentleman, and his associates will expect him, to correct it here on the floor to remove this condition——

Mr. SIMS. I will be glad to do it, if found to be wrong or incorrect.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). Of the wonderful disparity between the two regiments that he thought justified him in making that assault upon the Northern soldiery, the assault which the gentleman from Massachusetts listened to when it came from his colleague without a word of rebuke——

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That is not true, as I have repeatedly told the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). And now in a honeyed way tries to apologize for and smooth the way without contradiction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS was recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not know that the gentleman from Tennessee had been recognized.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio wishes to speak to this matter, I will yield to him, for I may want to refer to what the gentleman from Ohio says.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall only occupy a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Ohio proceeds now, it is in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, then I withdraw my request.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has alluded to the fact that men on this side of the House, after the recent statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, were silent. He spoke of the fact that this was a debate. I never was able to see the opportunity of debating a question in the House of Representatives. Not only is a man limited in time, but he is not recognized unless he specially makes application for recognition, perhaps weeks ahead.

I simply want to say this: I received from the Commissioner of Pensions a statement that there were 27,000 applications for pensions from men who had served in the Spanish war; and I was not surprised at the statement. I say to you that in five years there will be a hundred thousand such applications. And you will find most of them to be honest claims. The situation of the Spanish war men has never been understood by you people who stayed here in Washington.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has given you a bird's-eye view of what happened to Massachusetts regiments. I happened to be in a particularly favored position—not at the front, but in readiness to go to the front. I happened to be with the Ninth Pennsylvania in the fever-stricken camp of Chickamauga. And what was the condition there? In the company I took down there, in four months 2 men were dead and 36 down with the typhoid fever, so sick that they had to be removed from camp. The total result was that in a regiment of originally 1,300 men at muster out there were 30 dead, 3 of them captains, and one-third of the regiment down with typhoid fever. This was the condition, irrespective of the usual casualties.

Now, gentlemen, this condition of things was due to some cause. These men were carefully examined in the early part of 1898. They were then men in the finest physical condition; for only such were allowed to go to the front. Yet, notwithstanding this fact, we found at the end of two or three months a regiment absolutely depleted, so far as its ability to do effective work was concerned—fully one-third down with disease. To whom should this be attributed? To the men in authority, the men who had charge of the United States Army, the men at the top, not the men who stood in the ranks and day after day, from 4 o'clock in the morning to almost 12 o'clock at night, were trying to keep their men in shape. You can not blame it on these humble men. The men in authority at the head of the military forces, whether of the Regular Army or of the volunteer service, knew nothing about the care of men—had not the least idea of ordinary sanitary arrangements—yet they supposed themselves to know so much, with their fine military education, that they could not listen to a civilian accustomed to caring for men by the hundreds and thousands in the manufacturing industries of the country.

And I say to you, gentlemen, do not be surprised—whether the gentleman from Tennessee has made a mistake or the gentleman from Maryland has made a mistake—they will soon find out their mistake. This is perhaps no place to say that because a man is a Republican or a Democrat he has not told the truth. I simply want to call attention to the fact that this great question will come up before you year by year; and I say that so long as you keep up this war in the Philippine Islands you will simply pile up hundreds and thousands of these pension claims, because these men are fighting under the most adverse climatic conditions that any army in the world, outside of the British army in Africa, ever fought.

So I say, gentlemen, open your eyes. This question will continue to come up, and you might as well prepare yourselves to meet it, and when you have hunted up your data be sure that it is correct.

Mr. GAINES. As I understand, the gentleman was in the volunteer service?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES. And had some experience down in Chickamauga?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. A very terrible experience.

Mr. GAINES. And the gentleman's observations are based upon what he saw there?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Yes; upon what I saw there and what I know to be true.

Mr. GAINES. What was the cause of the condition of things the gentleman has described?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Because the gentleman who had charge of the United States Army furnished nothing at all to prevent the troubles that arose there.

Mr. GAINES. The superior officers?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. From the top of the Administration down they had no conception of how to run an army of 250,000 men.

Mr. GAINES. When they should have had skilled physicians they had horse doctors?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Oh, the horse doctor was one of the best men of our force. I will say nothing against him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, with his great zeal in this matter and his great capacity for searching through the records of the past, has found a declaration by the author of the civil-service law that something was wrong in the Departments. I never heard of it before. But I stand corrected by the gentleman, and congratulate him that he found that splendid statement. Now, I put up against that statement of Mr. Pendleton, referring back again to what I said yesterday—I put up against him the statement of Senator Morrill, the statement of Senator Morton, of Indiana; the statement of Mr. Richardson, Secretary of the Treasury; the statement of Senator Logan, the statement of Senator Hill, the statement of Senator MORGAN, and all the other gentlemen who participated in the debate. A brief statement of what they did say and whether the Departments were in good condition or not appears on page 1929 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I submit that upon a clear, overwhelming preponderance of evidence I am right in the statements I made, except that Mr. Pendleton did say what I did not think he said. I had a better opinion of him yesterday than I have to-day. But I honor him, dead or alive.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I shall take the time of the committee but a minute. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] inadvertently, without doubt, left out the name of a New York regiment that participated in the campaign at Santiago. I need not call the attention of this House to the fact that it was Captain Rafferty, of the Seventy-first New York, who led two companies up the slope and was the first man on the summit of San Juan. If dead heroes are required to testify to the gallantry of New York troops, look at the grave of Sergt. Nicholas Fish, killed at Quasimas. Fish was the grandson of President Grant's Secretary of State, and one of the grandest men, physically and intellectually, that ever came from New York.

I might also point to the corpse of William Tiffany, whose doctor said that he was starved to death on a Government transport. Above all else we have a living witness of the gallantry of New York troops in the person of Theodore Roosevelt, leader of the Rough Riders, to-day the governor of that great State, nominated and elected because of his pluck, bravery, and endurance in the Spanish war [applause on the Republican side], and the only thing distasteful about him in my estimation is his politics. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I deem it due to my State to make this statement, so that, neither by indirection nor imputation, any stain shall rest upon the gallantry of her soldiers, whether in the war of the Revolution, the war of 1812, the war with Mexico, the civil war, or the war with Spain. New York has always held her place in the line of battle when the interests of the nation were threatened.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, my courtesy to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] rather led me to fancy that I might be permitted to interrupt him and ask a question or two and to set myself right about some wrong inferences which he had drawn.

The gentleman endeavored to impugn my motives of hostility toward the civil-service law by stating that I desired that law repealed in order that the people from Maryland might come here and gobble up all the offices, or words to that effect. In reply to that foul imputation, I suggested that if what was said by a Democratic member on this floor a day or two ago, referring to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], were true, then there were also some patriots from Massachusetts who were glad to receive assistance from the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland said that no Massachusetts soldier had ever smelt powder.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. PEARRE. No, I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman if he did not make that statement?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PEARRE. I will now read what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] said, upon which I base my remarks or my reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts:

> In the Ninth Massachusetts Infantry, killed, none; wounded, none; deaths, none; missing, none; applications for pensions, 645.

I cast no imputation upon any soldier from the North or from the South. If any imputation were cast, it was cast by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], on the other side of this Chamber.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That statement is the statement of the Republican Commissioner of Pensions, who is himself from the State of Tennessee, as the gentleman from Tennessee said at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has stated that he declines to yield.

Mr. PEARRE. That has been sufficiently replied to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield?

Mr. PEARRE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I think after hearing the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] this House was convinced that the center of the intelligence of the universe is Boston.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. PEARRE. And that the Athens of the world has at last found a new location.

I may also add, Mr. Chairman, that after the pathetic narration of the gentleman's patriotic services at Montauk Point, this House is also convinced that they have an unrecognized hero in the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, the men who went to war from Massachusetts or Maryland, whether wounded in the service or disabled in the line of duty, under pension laws passed by the Republican party, with no assistance from that side of this House, are entitled to their pensions, if the law so provides. And I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that were it not for the patriotism, fairness, justice, and devotion of the Republican party to the old soldier, the heroes from Massachusetts would not now draw pensions and never would.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has repeatedly declined to yield.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to reply to something which the gentleman has said about me.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PEARRE. No, sir; my time is so limited I can not yield.

Mr. Chairman, I will further call attention to something which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] may desire to know, and that is that in the troublous times in 1776, when Boston was in danger, it was the regiments and the companies from Maryland, which afterwards distinguished themselves throughout the Revolutionary war as the Maryland Line, the Tenth Legion of the Armies of the United States, the Old Guard of the Continental forces, that marched to the rescue of Boston and saved her from attack. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would not rise here to say anything had not my name been mentioned so often and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] come so near putting me in a hole.

Now, I want to say this, that in a list of 8 Northern regiments, to which reference has been made, there is no heading of "died." I am not responsible for the list. I knew nothing as to the figures, only as the list was turned over to me as sent from the Pension Bureau and turned over by me to the Official Reporters exactly as I received it from the Pension Bureau. Every word of it came from that source. But since looking into this, there is not so much in it after all.

Now, take these 8 regiments, and there are 3,588 applications for pensions, 80 of them for widows, 303 for dependents. Only 383 of the whole 3,588 could be on account of death, including killed and wounded. Now, there are invalid-pension applications, 3,175. And inasmuch as so much has been said of the Massachusetts regiment, the Ninth, I want to say about the Second that there were killed, 5; wounded, 40; and the applications are only 467; that in the First United States Cavalry the killed and wounded are 93, and the applications are only 241. In the Seventy-first New York there were 13 killed, 60 wounded, and their applications were only 305; but the other five of those regiments—the District of Columbia, the Ninth Massachusetts, the Thirty-third Michigan, the Thirty-fourth Michigan Infantry, and the Eighth Ohio—did not have a single man killed or wounded in those battles; and yet the table will show by investigation that the fewer killed and wounded the greater the number of applications; and in the Massachusetts regiment the invalid-pension applications are 552, and not one of those applications can be from a dead man. They must be from a live man.

Now, I will admit that possibly it is true that it makes a Northern man sicker to face bullets than a Southern man, and in all fairness I ought to say that perhaps regiments north of the Ohio River going to Cuba in the summer time might be more subject to climatic troubles than regiments from Southern States, which I have quoted, but it can not make up for the astounding difference in these applications. Either the soldiers of these Southern regiments have not applied in proportion to injuries received in the service or these Northern regiments have applied out of all proportion to injuries received in the service, because there are 3,175 invalid applications out of 8 regiments, while in the 23 regiments of the Regular Army and 2 batteries the invalid applications are only 2,403.

What is the matter with the soldiers of the Regular Army from the North? Does it not make them sick to go to Cuba in the summer time? Look at the applications of the 23 Regular Army regiments. The applications from the 8 Northern volunteer regiments exceed them all, and in the list of the 23 Regular Army regiments there is no list of "died" either. But I simply compare the applications of these 8 Northern regiments with the applications from the 23 regiments of the Regular Army. You need not refer to Southern regiments. You need not make a single calculation. You need not go further than to say at once that the applications of the volunteer regiments from the North far exceed the applications from the soldiers in the Regular Army, and I must submit that there is some cause other than military service to account for it, and I think it is due to education and environment.

We see here on Friday nights, and at all other times, that Democrats, Republicans, and Populists from the North are almost running over each other in their attempts to show their loyalty and devotion to the cause of pensions and pensioners.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. SHATTUC. How much time did you take up last Friday night talking upon a question with no pertinency to the question at issue?

Mr. SIMS. You will not ask me to pass on the pertinency of my own remarks?

Mr. SHATTUC. In my opinion, about half the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for five minutes more time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to give all justice to these 8 Northern regiments. I did not call for them by name. They were sent to me. I want to get a list of the dead, not killed in battle, and when I get it I will be glad to insert it in my remarks. I will say in reference to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the widows and dependents of these Northern regiments are not knocking at the doors of the Treasury like those who are alive, the invalids. Further, I contend that it will show that my contention on another matter is right, and that on account of the abuse of the pension system, not wrong in itself, but on account of its abuse, it costs this country more money to fight a war with volunteers than it does by the Regular Army, including retirement pay and pensions. I am in favor of just pensions, but it is the abuse I object to. It will exist in the South as bad as in the North as soon as it has operated there as long as it has in the North. I asserted, and as I believe, it is due to education, environment, and surroundings, not that the people of the North are not just as good naturally as the people of the South.

I am going to say this to this House, and you shall have the benefit of it: I have applied for a list, Mr. Chairman, of every volunteer regiment in the Army that served in the war with Spain and that was called out by the Government; for a list of killed, wounded, and died, and a list of pension applications; and I assert now that when it comes in it will prove my assertions in the main are absolutely true.

Mr. GAINES. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. You received the tables that you published in the RECORD from the Commissioner of Pensions, did you not?

Mr. SIMS. I certainly did.

Mr. GAINES. And you never changed the tables, and they appear as you received them, do they not?

Mr. SIMS. I gave the originals in as I got them from the Bureau.

Mr. GAINES. Then they were not of your making.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want to do anybody injustice; I want to help save my own country and my own section of the country from the same trouble which must appear to every thinking mind afflicts that section of the country that is getting the great bulk of pensions. The taxes have got to be paid, and they are to be wrenched out of some people that are not able to support themselves; and while I have no objection to granting just and liberal pensions, I think this House ought to rise in its might, have a revision of these laws, and stop this abuse, because it looks that we are going to have rumors of wars and wars without end. These men come from every section of the country, and I ask you gentlemen on the other side to rise in your bravery and help combat these abuses and stand by an executive officer when he executes the law, and not hound him by trying to drive him out of a place which he honors, as you are attempting to do now.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very unfortunate discussion which has been precipitated by the gentleman from Tennessee. I have examined these tables. I do not know what he asked the Commissioner of Pensions for. That request is not here. Probably he got exactly what he asked for. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that if he wants a fair test let him ask the Commissioner for the number of applications for pensions on file for each regiment that served in the war with Spain. You talk about men dying of wounds——

Mr. SIMS. That is what I have done.

Mr. MAHON. Why, does not the gentleman from Tennessee know—and perhaps he was a soldier in the late unpleasantness——

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Not much.

Mr. MAHON. That a bullet may strike a young soldier not in a vital part, especially a young man, and that wound will easily heal and simply leave a mark, and he will remain a sound man the rest of his life. The history of all wars shows that it is not the bullet that leaves the disability that follows a young man from his early manhood to the grave. It is the disease from bivouacking, camping, and marching, and sleeping on the snow without shelter, and sleeping without blanket. Why, the gentleman from Massachusetts complained that these soldiers of that regiment did not have stoves. Why, the soldiers on both sides would have taken spasms if they had run across a stove in any tent in the great armies of the late war. You can get from the Pension Office what applications have been made and see how many there are and where they served. Take a regiment of the South that served in Camp Alger or at Camp Meade in my State, and a regiment from the North that served in Cuba, not acclimated, and it had a large number of men with fever put into their system; and of course the difference would be much larger between them and those born in the South in Cuba than in a regiment from the North, and it is not a fair test.

The gentleman from Tennessee speaks of the Regular Army, and the fact that so few applications have been made from that force. He forgets that they have been in the service for years, and they know how to take care of themselves; and therefore the percentage of disease, perhaps, is not one-half as large in those regiments as it is in the volunteer regiments.

Now, I say it is unfortunate that this question should be raised at this time in this country. Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining of our Southern brethern, but I am going to make this statement, that prior to 1878 the copperhead element of the North were too cowardly to sustain the Union and too cowardly to go South and join their Southern brethern. Their record upon the floor of this Congress is reeking with bitter, malignant opposition to the pension laws.

Since 1878, Mr. Chairman, there have been 14 great pension bills before this House. Some of the bills were for repealing all the limitations on arrears of pensions, increasing war widows' pensions from $8 to $12 a month, the amputation bill, widows' arrears giving pensions from the death of the husband, disabilities to parents, the dependent pension bill, and so on. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party on that side of the House cast in favor of these bills but 417 votes, and in the aggregate they cast against it 648 votes. The Republican vote in favor of the bills was 1,066, and during all these years from 1862 to 1898 not a solitary Republican vote has ever been cast against pension bills for the benefit of soldiers who saved this nation.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. No, I can not now; I will afterwards. Lincoln, the first great war President, never vetoed a pension bill. Johnson, who followed him, never did; Grant vetoed 5; Hayes, none; Garfield, none; Arthur, none; Harrison, none; McKinley, none, and your President Cleveland vetoed 560. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MAHON. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not remember that when the pension appropriation bill was brought in here in the Fifty-fifth Congress it was passed in ten minutes without a solitary vote against it on either side?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; I am coming to that.

Mr. GAINES. Well, you did not mention that. You tried to give the impression that this side of the House was against all pension bills, which is not the truth.

Mr. MAHON. Now, I am saying that the Democratic party of this nation can not point with pride to that record which they have in regard to the care and welfare of the soldiers of the late civil war. When the great army came back from the field, when the Confederates had laid down their arms, when a great review was had, upon this Capitol was placed a piece of canvas 100 feet long and 20 feet wide upon which was written that this nation could never pay the debt that we owed to the veterans of the war who saved the nation. The Republican party has, in season and out of season, tried to keep that pledge. Now, I say it is unfortunate that when we had got to that point in this Congress during the last five years where this opposition had passed away that this debate should have sprung up, and I hope this will be the last.

I say it is unfortunate, when we were all joined as patriotic people, both great sections of this country under one flag, that any sectionalism should be raised here in regard to pensions or any other great question except a purely political one. Here to-day, with my approbation, the widow of that great war general, Jackson, is on the pension rolls, and there properly. We find on the pension rolls hundreds of men who served in the Confederate army, and they were put there by the votes of the Republican party under the law with reference to the Mexican war. I know, as I have stated before, that since I have been in this Congress the men on that side of the House have been generous to the old soldiers, and especially those who met them on the field of battle, and I trust that after this discussion ceases this is the first and last sectional discussion we shall have in regard to the pensions of the civil war or the Spanish war.

There are 69,000 men now who carried a gun forty years ago, and their cases are still before the Pension Bureau, undecided. The Pension Bureau has millions of applications here to-day, and it is trying to do the best it can with them. I am opposed to making any issue of this matter here in debate. If the pension laws are not right, let us correct them. There are many abuses I would like to correct, but it must be done by legislation. The Spanish-war soldiers should be cared for. It matters not to me whether it is a boy from Mississippi who presents a private pension bill here. If the evidence satisfies me that he was attacked by fever in the South or in Cuba or in any of the Southern camps. I will vote him a pension as willingly as I will a boy from Pennsylvania. We will do justice to the Spanish soldier, and do it without any sectionalism, and when this debate closes I hope this is the last we shall hear of this matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield a moment to me?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is there any remedy the gentleman can suggest by which we can avoid the unfortunate condition of 27,000 claims that have been filed and only 400 acted upon? What would be the gentleman's remedy for that?

Mr. MAHON. I want to say this, that I have from my own State 400 men, applicants for a pension because of the Spanish war, and I went to the Pension Office and I found that their cases were not completed. It is the same old story. Attorneys take the claims and leave them half finished. All they do is to take the $25 when the pension is granted.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York was recognized.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to ask if there is any amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Literally none. The amendment and debate are exhausted if the gentleman from Indiana insists on applying the rule. We have been going on by unanimous consent for the last two hours.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have had two days' general debate on this bill, and I think we should proceed with the bill.

Mr. GAINES. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the general discussion on this paragraph continue for twenty minutes longer and then we proceed with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] asks unanimous consent that the debate upon the Civil Service Commission clause of this bill be limited to the next twenty minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I deplore as much as any man on this floor any invidious comparison between regiments from different sections of this country. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has, I believe, unintentionally done a great wrong both to the regiments of the Northern section of our country and to the volunteers generally. If the gentleman, after he gets further information from the Pension Department, will make a similar comparison between the number of casualties, including all the deaths from sickness, wounds, and other causes, with the number of applications for pensions, he will find that there is no material difference whatever in this proportion due to different localities from which the volunteer regiments were raised. I know this to be a fact, because I have examined the matter; and I know that the figures all run about the same for the different sections, when you take into account all the circumstances of the service. The showing was magnificent from all sections of our common country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this comparison of volunteer troops with the Regular Army is fully as misleading as the other which the gentleman has made use of. The regular soldiers are still in the service. Those of them who are sick are being taken care of by the Government. The volunteers, though sick and some of them have been in the hospitals and some of them have died as the result of that very sickness, have been mustered out of the service.

I had the honor in 1898 of commanding a troop of cavalry in Puerto Rico, and I know that as soon as I left the United States my sick list began to grow. I lost no man down there, but the proportion of sick men grew very rapidly after we got out into the field. We had no equipments; we could not have any. The trouble was not due to the incompetence of anybody; it was due to the necessities of the service. When I brought that troop of cavalry back, 60 per cent of them were sick, and at least 50 per cent of them had to go to hospitals afterwards or be taken care of by their families at home. Now, the regulars who went down there when they came back were taken care of and kept in the hospitals, while these other men—men of the volunteer service—had to be discharged, sick or well.

Mr. Chairman, an attack has been made upon the incompetence of our higher officers. I have no defense to make of any incompetent political appointee. I know there were a great many such. But I do say that our Regular Army, as it stood at the beginning of this war, and a large majority of our Volunteer Army would compare favorably with the army, regular or volunteer, of any country in the world. They show up well when compared with the British. Our people did not make so many mistakes as the British army make now in South Africa.

The battle of Santiago—I do not say anything about that general who stayed back behind and was not up when the battle was fought—I do say that the subordinate commanders and the soldiers, regular and volunteer, in that battle were the finest in the world; and that battle, regardless of the fact that the commanding general was not there, will go down in history as a very notable and a most successful battle.

The campaign in Puerto Rico is notable. It was a scientific campaign. We did not lose many soldiers down there as killed or wounded in battle; but it was because we had one of the best generals in the world in command there. And that campaign from beginning to end was planned and executed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. I ask two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for two minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman having an extension of time for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. That campaign in Puerto Rico was planned scientifically and executed with the greatest intelligence and vigor, exactly as planned. In the first place, the general fooled not only the Spaniards, but fooled all the people in this country about where he was going to land. While the people were expecting him to land on the north side, he fooled them by going on the south side and thus got his landing without any losses. That general was General Miles—a great man, to whom we should all feel grateful.

Then by every successive movement of our troops toward the interior the Spaniards were fooled. Every movement on our side was a success from beginning to end. It was not because there was nothing to do that there were no losses on our side, but it was because of the superiority of General Miles and General Brooke and General Wilson and General Schwan and General Henry and other commanders on that island.

Mr. GAINES. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. I yield for a moment.

Mr. GAINES. Were the people there glad to have your troops come?

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. Oh, yes; the Puerto Ricans were; but there were some 8,000 Spaniards who did not welcome us very cordially.

Mr. GAINES. I said "the people:" I did not say the Spaniards.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. Oh, yes; I believe the majority of the people were glad to see the Americans take the island, but they were not running any chances by taking any active part to help either army. There were a few ragamuffins who were ready to halloo for either the Spaniards or the Americans.

Mr. GAINES. I was asking as to the feeling of the people.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. There has been much exaggeration on this subject. There were people there who were ready to shout for either the Spanish or the American side, according to which ever side might be on top. The conservative, intelligent part of the population were glad to become Americans.

Mr. GAINES. Did the people at large object to the invasion of the island by the army of General Miles? I was not asking whether the Spaniards objected; but my information is that upon the incoming of the army of General Miles, that army received a hearty welcome from the people who wished that the Spanish might be exterminated.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. Yes, that is true; but they did not want to undertake the job.

We all know that in any country at any time there are two parties. Of course, when the American Army put down the Spanish, there were many people to welcome us; but one defeat would have turned the current the other way, and many would have joined the Spaniards to help put us out. All the people never welcomed us. Why, there were a great many Puerto Ricans in the Spanish army. They called them volunteers. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope that gentlemen in talking about incompetents will not include all the high officers in our service. There may have been a few; but taking our Army as a whole, it compares favorably with any army in the world. And our soldiers of 1898, though the war was short, showed themselves, whenever opportunity was given, as worthy descendants of the men who waged the gigantic and terrific war of 1861–1865.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally for a purpose which will be explained.

The committee accordingly rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair announced as conferees on the bill H. R. No. 1, Mr. OVERSTREET, Mr. BROSIUS, and Mr. COX.

The SPEAKER also announced as Speaker pro tempore for the evening session Mr. HEPBURN.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I desire again to call public attention to the civil-service law. My experience is that the only way to correct existing evils and abuses in the public service is to call attention to them.

I do not complain of the original civil-service law when properly interpreted. I do complain of the extensions of that law by President Cleveland and of the abuses of the law under all Administrations; and I want to point out one abuse that has been made apparent to certain members of this House during the last sixty days.

On the 16th day of December last a report from the Deep Waterway Commission was filed in this House and referred by the Speaker and ordered to be printed. That report was sent to the Public Printer. Sixty days have elapsed, and yet, at a hearing of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors on day before yesterday, that committee were unable to obtain the information contained in that report because of the incapacity of the Public Printer to print a document that in my city could be printed in five days. I am told that the failure to print is because the maps accompanying the report had to be sent out of the department to be prepared. If we have a Public Printer who is compelled to send his maps to some private institution to have them reproduced, I submit that he go West and obtain his printing in houses that can produce it within a reasonable time.

I call attention to the fact that the Government Printing Office is not legally under the civil-service law, and that the present Attorney-General has given his written opinion that that department was illegally placed within the civil service by the order of Grover Cleveland.

I believe, from my investigations, that 20 per cent of the employees in all Departments in the city of Washington are absolutely incompetent, are worthless to the public service, are really barnacles upon the ship of state, and unless Congress sooner or later remedies this evil the entire law should be and will be repealed.

I believe in upholding certain branches of the civil service. I think that the postal service throughout the country, the Railway Mail Service, the letter carriers, the postal clerks, and that class of employees from which the inefficient ones have been weeded out, should be upheld and continued; but I call attention to the fact that, in its present form, they are holding life positions, contrary to the spirit of our institutions. No man in this country should hold a life office, save possibly judges of the Supreme Court; and I think it would be better for our country if all of the judges were appointed for a tenure of office. I know some cases where there would be vacancies if such a law were in existence.

I want to call attention to another branch of the civil service, and that is the custodian service. I have had a little experience in that. I recommended for appointment certain men to be employed in the custodian service in my city. Among the appointees was an elevator man, who had run the elevator in the city hall at Detroit, where more people are carried up and down than in any other building in the city. He had been in charge of that elevator for four years. He was an efficient elevator operator, with experience. He was put in temporarily, through the courtesy, I suppose, of the Treasury Department, and served for eight months. He took the civil-service examination, passed, and was on the eligible list, and the custodian desired to appoint him permanently, but the Civil Service Commissioners objected because it was discovered in his application that he had stated that he had but one leg, having lost the other in the service of his country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CORLISS. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. I shall have to object unless the time is also extended on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CORLISS. I was going to call special attention to this fact, that the Civil Service Commission put out of office a man who had lost his leg in the service of his country, a man who was perfectly competent to run an elevator, and who had been in charge of a public elevator for years. He was certified to be perfectly competent by the custodian in charge of the building, and the Civil Service Commission put him out simply because he had lost a leg. The Speaker of this House, under the civil-service laws of our country, could not become an elevator man.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Could he pass the examination?

Mr. CORLISS. He could pass the examination, and the man to whom I refer did pass the examination; but in his application he had to state whether he had two legs or not, and had lost one of them. He was perfectly competent to run an elevator, and yet under a rule of the Civil Service Commission he was compelled to leave his position for the reason stated.

Now, I submit that it is not right, and it is not legal, that the employees under the custodian of a public building should be under the civil-service law, and I call special attention to that case because I know personally about it. It illustrates the method in which the Civil Service Commissioners apply the law.

In my opinion there is another great evil in connection with this matter. We hear it constantly charged on this floor that there are in this country trusts and organizations of that character. The gregarious instinct of man seems at least to permeate the minds of the members on this floor when they are discussing that question; but I discover in examining the civil-service law and the rules applied by the Civil Service Commission that they reserve to themselves absolutely the power to appoint from the eligible list. Notwithstanding the fact that men are examined and pass the examination and are put upon the eligible list and are eligible for appointment, the Civil Service Commissioners reserve to themselves the right to select who shall be appointed by the heads of the Departments. I should like to ask the members of this House how they enjoy that part of it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the reason we can not get a bill in here to repeal or modify the civil-service law? What is the use of making speeches about it when we can not get a vote on it?

Mr. CORLISS. I hope we will have an opportunity to-day; and if there is a member on the floor who objects, I am in favor of bringing in a bill that will fix a tenure of office and limit the power of the Civil Service Commission, and try to reform the Departments of our Government.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to ask one more question. From the speeches that I have heard delivered here I believe that a majority of the members, even on the Republican side, are opposed to this civil-service business as it exists. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the rest of them seem to be opposed to the existing condition of things. Now, what is the reason that you can not get an opportunity to consider a practical bill here to modify that law?

Mr. GROSVENOR. With the permission of the gentleman from Michigan, I will say that I stated on yesterday or the day before that since 1883 innumerable bills of all sorts for the repeal, for the extension, for the enlargement, for the modification, for the restriction of this law have been introduced here. They have gone to the committee, and no bill upon which an amendment could be placed has ever been reported.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We want to get something practicable.

Mr. CORLISS. That is practicable.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it is impracticable. The bills go to that committee and sleep until the day of judgment. What is the reason that this House can not make that committee report some bill, either favorably or unfavorably?

Mr. CORLISS. I think we can, and unless this amendment which we propose can be adopted, I am in favor of adopting a resolution ordering that committee to report a bill on this question.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. You had a Democratic Congress. Why did you not amend this law?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you. I was very young in that Democratic Congress and have learned a thing or two as well as you since then, and I may as well state it now. [Laughter.] I hope I am not to be held responsible for very many of the sins committed in that Congress, because I am one of those who helped to overrule the Committee on Rules, the first time it ever was done.

Mr. CORLISS. I simply want to say, in conclusion, I do not think the law in all its effects should be repealed, but this abuse should be set aside and the Departments of the Government placed in a condition to properly and economically perform the public service.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time limit be extended for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that the time limited for debate be extended for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES. I amend that by saying fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I object. The gentleman from Mississippi only wants ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, you declared the motion carried before the gentleman rose from his seat or said a word.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Indiana rose for the purpose of objecting, his objection would be admitted although a moment late.

Mr. GAINES. Do you object to extending the time for fifteen minutes?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from Mississippi only wants ten minutes.

Mr. GAINES. I want five minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You may ask it afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again put the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the time limit for debate be extended fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SHATTUC. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi that the time limit be extended for ten minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I had not thought of speaking on this bill, but am prompted to do so now by statements that have been made about our civil service. The gentleman from Indiana in charge of this bill told us the other day of the great number of incompetent clerks and employees in the various Departments here. He read a letter from an Auditor of the Treasury, stating that there were a number of clerks in his department who were so low in proficiency that they should be dropped from the service. We have heard much of this before, and all of us know that this undesirable condition of things exists.

We all know that nearly all the Departments here are loaded down with deadwood, and that they could do their work with a less force if that force were efficient. And the heads of Departments are constantly coming to Congress and asking for an increase of their force because of the inefficiency of the clerical force already employed. While there is no law creating a civil pension list for these people, yet the Government is, by its practice, pensioning them by paying them for work they are unable to perform. I for one am opposed to the extension of the civil pension list.

I am aware that when these people in the Government service grow old and become incapacitated for the work they are employed to perform they excite our sympathy, as all old and needy people do.

But I know of no good reason why the people who have not had the benefits of Government employment should be taxed to support in their old age those who were fortunate enough to get Government positions when they were younger. You sometimes hear it said by those who advocate their retention and who advocate a civil pension that they have grown old in the service of the Government. While this is true, they have served the Government in positions they sought on salaries generally larger than are paid to those who do like service in the private walks of life.

Take the man who, instead of being able to secure a Government job, settles upon a farm and engages in agricultural pursuits. He makes a good citizen, pays his taxes, helps raise the products that feed and clothe our people at home and that go abroad to give us our great balance of trade, which makes our country rich and prosperous. He raises manly sons who help fight our battles, and daughters who go largely to make up our splendid womanhood.

He and his class are as essential to the welfare and prosperity of the country as any Government employee. When he grows old and incapacitated for work no one thinks of suggesting that the Government should pension him on a good salary. Then, with what sort of justice can it be claimed that he should be taxed to pay salaries to those who appeared to be more fortunate and secured Government positions at good salaries when they were younger after they have grown old and become incapacitated to fill those positions? By the retention of these incapacitated clerks we are indirectly pensioning them at large salaries. I am opposed to either directly or indirectly extending these civil pensions; and if I had my way I would knock out all civil pensions now recognized by law.

It is conceded by all who have spoken on this subject that it is a wrong that should be righted. But there seems to be some diversity of opinion as to who is responsible for this condition of things and how it should be righted. As representatives of the people it is our duty to see that the employees of the Government who are unfitted for service should not be borne upon the rolls for salaries. The heads of the Departments claim that when they attempt to discharge one of these superannuated or incapacitated clerks that Senators and Representatives come and insist that they should be retained, and by their importunities prevent the Department officials from doing their duty.

This, if true, is a reflection on the heads of the Departments and Senators and Representatives both. No Senator or Representative should insist that an incompetent person should be retained in the service, and no head of the Department should yield to any such pressure when it is brought to bear. The official who justifies his own wrongdoing, or the failure to do his duty, by claiming that he was influenced by those who have no power over him places himself, it seems to me, in a very unjustifiable position.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] comes to the rescue and charges this condition of things to the civil-service law, and then he proceeds to berate the law and the commission. He admits that, as a member of the St. Louis convention, that nominated the head of the present Administration, he voted for the platform, one of the planks of which was that the civil-service law should be maintained and its provisions extended. He is the chief spokesman of the Administration on this floor; and while admitting that the President, both in his letter of acceptance and his inaugural address, pledged himself to the faithful execution of the civil-service law and the extension of its provisions, I believe no one pretends now that this promise of the Republican party and the Administration has been kept. I am not the champion of the civil-service law or the commission on this floor; but I am not disposed to sit here and hear either wrongfully accused when the guilty parties can be easily ascertained. I deny that the civil-service law or rules are responsible for the evil under discussion.

The rules promulgated by the Civil Service Commission, under the direction of the President in 1896, if enforced by the heads of Departments, would remedy itself the very evils of which the Departments complain and would do it in a way that importunate Senators and Representatives could not prevent. Rule 11 of the Civil Service Commission provides that a record shall be kept of the quantity and quality of work performed by the clerical force in the Departments, and that all promotions shall be made on the merits of the clerk as shown by an examination of this record, and it further provides that whenever an examination of the record of any clerk discloses the fact he has fallen below 70 in the quantity and quality of his work that he is to be dropped from the service.

Gentlemen have said that there should be some law to correct the abuse about which we have been talking. Here is the law already in existence that would correct the abuse if the Departments would enforce it, and would rid the Government service of every incompetent or incapacitated clerk in the Departments.

But one Department of the Government has enforced this rule, and in that Department the results have been entirely satisfactory. Yet all the other Departments are controlled by appointees of this pretended civil-service-reform Administration. They are under the control of the President, who has made so many pledges of his devotion to the civil-service law. As a member of this House I protest against the Departments complaining about this condition of things and then try to throw the responsibility off on Representatives and Senators, when the whole trouble comes from their failure to comply with the law; and I protest against the gentleman from Ohio trying to shift the blame from the shoulders of his Administration onto the civil-service law and the Civil Service Commission.

I am told there have been more than 1,100 reinstatements by this Administration of persons who had been dropped from the civil service.

Now, I am informed that the average age of these people who have been reinstated is over 60 years. The trouble mainly complained of is that the employees are too old to do the work.

They are paid their salaries and Congress asked to appropriate money to employ others to do the work; yet, in the face of this well-known fact, this Administration has reinstated more than 1,100 persons, whose average age is more than 60. What sort of a record is this for an Administration that went in with such fair promises?

I will not go into a discussion of the thousands of places that have been taken out from the operation of the civil-service rules by this Administration, nor do I believe in partisan and unfair criticism of all the acts of an Administration of the opposing party. But it does seem to me if there ever was an Administration convicted on its own showing of broken promises and bad faith this one is in its dealing with the civil service.

I believe the President is at heart a believer in the civil-service law. I think he thought he meant what he said when he promised to execute and extend it; but the only way I can account for his failure to see that it was done is that he has not been strong enough to resist the pressure of the spoilsmen of his party. I have thought it due, Mr. Chairman, that this statement should be made, lest the country might be misled by some of the speeches here as to where the true responsibility rests for an unpardonable condition of things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois ask unanimous consent?

Mr. CANNON. No, Mr. Chairman; I think five minutes will suffice.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has already limited the time of debate on this paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will not take any time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, then, the informal amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I thought the Clerk was still reading on some page earlier than page 28. I have been waiting here until the Civil Service Commission paragraph should be reached with a view of offering an amendment. Have we passed that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; we have passed that and have reached page 31.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then I ask unanimous consent that we return to page 28 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman indicate what the amendment is before we consent?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it is an amendment that will be germane.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I have no objection.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would request the gentleman from Iowa to withhold his request until my colleague [Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts], the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, comes back to the Chamber. He has been here expecting the amendment, but has gone to luncheon.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will withhold it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that by some inadvertence the debate on the Civil Service Commission provision was begun before that provision was, in fact, read, and as a matter of fact it never has been read. At the close of the debate, it having been limited by unanimous consent, the next paragraph was begun without having read the paragraph relating to the Civil Service Commission. That being so, there is no doubt but that the gentleman from Iowa can demand the Clerk to return to that paragraph and now read it, unless it be understood by unanimous consent that when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] returns to the Chamber the Clerk will then return to that paragraph. That will be done if there be no objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6267) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes."

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000; three Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $4,500 each; clerk to the Secretary, $2,250; stenographer, $1,800; three private secretaries, one to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $1,800; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; two clerks of class 1; one clerk, $1,000; four messengers; three assistant messengers, and one laborer; in all, $45,530.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, it is more in sorrow than in anger that I rise to-day to reply to a few of the insinuations, innuendoes, and assaults made upon men who are not upon this floor to defend themselves. I make no excuse for those on this side of the House, neither do I desire to cast any reflection upon that side, but I do say fearlessly here to-day that the most that has been said, I might say many things that have been said, are absolutely unnecessary to be expressed upon this floor; and I regret that men who wore the blue on that side, men who have reached distinction in the war of 1861–1865, men who participated in those bloody days, find it necessary now in attempting to do something here for the maimed and crippled should see fit to assault the Democratic party.

It has been charged here that the Democratic party has never placed a line on the statute books looking to bettering the conditions under the pension laws of the soldiers of 1861–1865. How unfair that statement is! Gentlemen here know that every line of those laws that has been placed on the statute books——

Mr. MAHON. Does the gentleman refer to any statement made by me?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I refer to a statement made on that side, not by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but, I think, by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Democratic party had no power to place anything on the statute books; and when by the will of the people they came on this floor, the pension laws were already there, placed there by the Republican party; and for all that is good in them I take off my hat to the Republican party, and honor it for giving us those provisions. But when gentlemen assail the Democratic party as a body that has ever been hostile to the pension laws and to pensioners, I deny it. I want to call attention to the fact that it is not the Democratic party nor Democrats who are appearing before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and assailing the provisions of the pension laws in such bitter terms as almost to make one shudder at the details of outrages being committed. Who are the gentlemen that come before us? Is Corporal Tanner a Democrat? Is General Shaw a Democrat? Is Gen. Dan Sickles, who occupied yesterday the seat where I am now standing, a Democrat? They arraigned those pension laws and the administration of the pension system more bitterly than any Democrat on the floor of this House.

Why, sir, looking at my colleague across the way, let me say that I have heard him all over Ohio declaring on the stump, where he could be heard by the people in the excitement of a political campaign, that it was the Republican party alone that was the friend of the soldier and was maintaining his rights.

Now, gentlemen, you stand here a majority on this floor. I challenge you to the record. Remedy the evils that have been complained of, not by Democrats, but by your own illustrious men who wore the shoulder straps and fought in the front. Obey the appeals of the Grand Army of the Republic. Remedy the evils that now exist.

When I look to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] I expect nothing. Why? Honoring him as I do, yet I have never seen him let an opportunity or an occasion go by without assailing, with all the vigor and vengeance of his power, the pension laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to continue for a few minutes longer. I have not had much time on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman occupying five minutes additional?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I serve notice that when these five minutes have been occupied, I shall object to any further discussion that is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Tennessee, let me say I am not here to defend the soldiers of the late war. A distinguished general who was in command of one of the regiments from Ohio in the Spanish-American war was upon the floor when the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee was made. It was for him to reply. General DICK might have taken up this defense. But I am here to defend the men who fought under General DICK, if he speaks no word for them. I say that the homes in Ohio of the men who made up that regiment are to-day virtually hospitals of the boys who returned from the military service in the Army of the Union.

I have no patience with any man who has not charity, generosity, patriotism enough in his soul to do something, if nothing but a kind word, for the men who defend the flag in the hour of my country's peril. [Applause.]

You glorify the South. So do I. Her people are taking care of their disabled soldiers and are doing it out of their own means—out of their hard-earned dollars. But, sir, you are getting tired of that; for before the Committee on Invalid Pensions to-day there is pending a bill introduced by the gentleman from Texas asking the removal of the restrictions on account of service in the Confederate army, in order that those who afterwards served in the Federal Army in the war of 1861 to 1865 and the Spanish-American war may get upon the pension roll of the Government. From the State of the gentleman from Tennessee more names are being presented for the pension list by the distinguished gentleman from that State [Mr. GIBSON] than by almost any man in the entire North. Read your record of the Pension Department and say whether you will assail the honor and courage and patriotism of the Northern soldier. Do you say that it makes him more sick to face bullets than it does the men of the South? I hurl that back.

Mr. SIMS. I did not say that.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I understood that to be your language. If it was not, I will take back my statement.

Mr. SIMS. I said that "maybe it made them sicker."

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. "Maybe!" Your people ought to know that at Stone River, Shiloh, and all along the line we left the record of the Northern soldier. It stands side by side with yours. I honor both the blue and the gray. May my tongue falter and my lips tremble when I assail the patriotism and courage of any Southern soldier that ever fought in the field. But I deny your right to come here with statements fortified either by H. Clay Evans or yourself in order to cast an aspersion upon my comrades. Go look at the records you have brought here. I hold you blameless upon the statement you made that the Commissioner of Pensions gave you this list. If he did, and if he did so knowing its character, then he ought to be dismissed from his office this day and this hour.

Take the record—in 8 Northern regiments 17 claims for disease contracted in the service to 1 where the soldier had been killed or wounded. Take 8 Southern regiments, where there were 761 claims on account of disease to 1 where the soldier had been killed or wounded.

Mr. Chairman, civil service! Yes, I am looking across this aisle now. You cry out against us for what purpose? To make the people believe in the Republican districts of Ohio that you want to repeal that law for the purpose of giving out more offices. If it is true that you want to do it, you can do so. But you know that the pathway between the Executive Mansion and this building will be hot when you dare to attempt it. And I make this proposition now, that no such thing will be, no such thing dare be, in this Republican House. If it shall come, I will vote with you, because I look upon it as an arrant humbug, only exceeded in its monstrosity by the humbugs who pretend to want to get rid of that law when they know they dare not. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of chief clerk and superintendent: For chief clerk, including $300 as superintendent of Treasury building, $3,000; assistant superintendent of Treasury building, $2,500; inspector of electric-light plants, gas, and fixtures for all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $1,900; 4 clerks of class 4; additional to 1 clerk of class 4, as bookkeeper, $100; 2 clerks of class 3; 3 clerks of class 2; 4 clerks of class 1 (1 as librarian); 1 clerk, $1,000; 1 messenger; 2 assistant messengers; storekeeper, $1,200; telegraph operator, $1,200; chief engineer, $1,400; assistant engineer, $1,000; 2 assistant engineers, at $720 each; 6 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 firemen; 5 firemen, at $660 each; coal passer, $500; locksmith, $1,200; captain of the watch, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; 58 watchmen; 6 special watchmen, at $720 each; foreman of laborers, $1,000; skilled laborer, male, $840; 3 skilled laborers, male, at $720 each; 26 laborers; 10 laborers, at $600 each; laborer, $480; 2 laborers, at $360 each; 90 charwomen; foreman of cabinet shop, $1,500; draftsman, $1,200; 11 cabinetmakers, at $1,000 each; cabinetmaker, $720; carpenter, $1,000; carpenter's helper, $660. For the Winder Building: Engineer, $1,000; 3 firemen; conductor of elevator, $720; 4 watchmen; 3 laborers, 1 of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the conductor of the elevator; laborer, $480; and 6 charwomen. For the Cox Building, 1709 New York avenue: Three watchmen-firemen, at $720 each; and one laborer; in all, $175,700.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized on the pro forma amendment.

[Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may proceed with the consideration of the bill, I shall have to object to any further extensions of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for War Department: For Auditor, $4,000; Deputy Auditor, $2,500; law clerk, $2,000; 6 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 16 clerks of class 4; additional to 1 clerk as disbursing clerk, $200; 42 clerks of class 3; 64 clerks of class 2; 51 clerks of class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 5 clerks, at $900 each; skilled laborer, $800; 3 clerks, at $840 each; 1 messenger; 3 assistant messengers; and 8 laborers; in all, $297,300.

Mr. TALBERT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I understand there is already an amendment pending to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it is a strange statement to be made upon this floor that the head of a department should be relieved of his position and discharged because, forsooth, he has seen proper to send information here to this House in regard to the department over which he is placed. It seems to me that it is the duty of the heads of Departments to send such information here as will enlighten members upon questions relating to their several Departments, and it seems to me to be a strange thing that members here exhibit so much temper and so much feeling whenever they strike the subject of pensions. It seems to me that whenever you mention the word "pensions" they want to raise such a fuss as to drown out all attempts to throw on the light in regard to the granting of pensions in the Department as well as here upon the floor of the House.

Now, it seems to me that we ought to have arrived at a stage where we can stand up and discuss pensions as we do other propositions, in a dispassionate manner and as a business proposition, without boiling over and heating up in such a manner.

Now, no man has greater regard for the true and brave soldier than I have, and no man's heart goes out more than does mine toward our brave boys who have gone to Cuba and Manila; but we must recollect another fact, that the people at home who have these enormous expenditures to pay are as much entitled to consideration as the soldier or his family. You must recollect that the people must raise provisions, must furnish money to buy arms and ammunition, and to feed and clothe these soldiers, and when we come to consider a pension proposition we should consider it as a business proposition, and while we consider the bravery of the soldier, we should not, at the same time, lose sight of the people at home who are the taxpayers, who must foot the bills which are being piled up here in an enormous way. These pension propositions should be investigated as are other propositions.

I am glad that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] had the courage to stand up here and make the speech that he did the day before yesterday. There is a great deal of information in it, and the Commissioner of Pensions deserves credit for giving it, instead of being removed, as some claim. He has opened the eyes of members on both sides of this House. I am glad he put that information before us, notwithstanding it has displeased Peter the Great and some others. I want to say that we should take it up and use it and consider it in the light in which it was intended. His investigation is an able one and has thrown great light upon the subject, and I stand here to defend the gentleman upon whom assaults are being heaped, and, while he is able to take care of himself, I think it is an injustice for everybody on that side and gentlemen on this side to jump upon the gentleman from Tennessee. He has given you nuts that you will never crack; he has asked you questions that you can not answer, and instead you hurl epithets at him. Let us take his speech and consider it, and I hope it will do some good in stopping the greyhound speed which some of you pension grabbers want to make in giving pensions to soldiers and even to some who never shouldered a gun or smelled gunpowder.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of bookkeeping and warrants: For chief of division, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,400; estimate and digest clerk, $2,250; 2 principal bookkeepers, at $2,100 each; 10 bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; 11 clerks of class 4; 4 clerks of class 3; 2 clerks of class 2; 3 clerks of class 1; 1 messenger; 1 assistant messenger; and 1 laborer; in all, $67,170.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that we return to page 28, the Civil Service Commission.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAYNE). The Chair understands that it was agreed to return to that paragraph. The Clerk will read the paragraph, which the Chair understands has not been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For 3 Commissioners, at $3,500 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,000; 8 clerks of class 4; 10 clerks of class 3; 13 clerks of class 2; 15 clerks of class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; 2 clerks, at $900 each; 1 messenger; 2 laborers; engineer, $840; 2 watchmen; in all, $91,340.

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the Commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, $7,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. I offer the following amendment as an addition to the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 2, page 29:

"That the term of service of all clerks, messengers, watchmen, skilled laborers, laborers, assistant messengers, and all other employees now employed in or by any of the Departments shall terminate as follows:

"One-fourth on the 30th day of June, 1900.

"One-fourth on the 30th day of June, 1901.

"One-fourth on the 30th day of June, 1902.

"One-fourth on the 30th day of June, 1903.

"For the purpose of carrying out the above provision the head of each Department shall divide the above-named clerks and employees into four classes, and shall designate the persons whose terms of service shall expire in each of the above-named years: Provided, That any person whose term of service is above limited, having the proper qualifications, may be reappointed by the head of the Department for a period of four years, which period shall thereafter be the term for which all clerks and other employees shall be appointed unless sooner discharged for cause, to be determined by the head of the Department."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask the gentleman if he intends that to apply to all the Departments?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope the gentleman will not make that point of order.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not want to simply discuss the paragraph.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I will repeat my question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order, so that it may be discussed.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it is fair and right that this House should have an opportunity in some way, at some time, to vote upon a question like this. Heretofore through the legerdemain of rules, through the stifling powers of committees, this House has never yet been permitted a square vote upon this question. When the people were demanding with almost unanimous voice an abolition of the civil-service law, at no time have the committee dared to let the people's representatives vote upon this question. There has not been a time, in my judgment, in the last five years that if the proposition could have come before us that we could not have settled this question by some kind of proper change or amendment that would give us a proper civil service.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will repeat my question. Does the gentleman mean his amendment to cover all the Departments?

Mr. HEPBURN. All the Departments.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then you will have to change your amendment, because you have mentioned none except the Civil Service Bureau.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Do I understand that the heads of the Deparments are to designate such clerks as they desire to retire?

Mr. HEPBURN. The amendment simply provides that the clerks and employees are to be divided into four classes by each head of the Department in his particular Department, and that he is to determine what force shall cease their official connection with the Government on the last day of this fiscal year, what force shall cease their connection with it on the last day of the next fiscal year, and so on until all are out.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think that it would be fairer if it were called a speedy method of ridding the Departments of Democrats?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is possible, in view, perhaps, of the next election, that a great many of them will go [laughter]; but I take it they will only because they were not fit for reappointment. There ought to be some settlement of the official term of these men. We have sought to secure a term of service for all of the employees.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I will vote to abolish the civil-service law if you will give me an opportunity to do it, and I know a number on this side will do so if an opportunity for such a vote is offered.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will join you in that.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Why not move to strike the paragraph out?

Mr. HEPBURN. Because it would only be an expression of the opinion of this House. Suppose we do not make an appropriation for a person in office. He could go to the Court of Claims and secure his judgment, and we have got to pay him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I doubt that.

Mr. HEPBURN. We could not effect anything merely by the striking out of the provision for the commission. It would be simply an expression of our opinion. I am willing to have the gentleman move to strike it out, but it will not be effective other than as an expression of the opinion of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, your party has the Presidency, has the Senate, has the House of Representatives, and has the Committee on Rules. What is in the way of bringing your bill here repealing the civil-service law?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yet when your party was charged with the responsibility, they not only refused to do that, but their President went on and covered with the blanket of civil-service protection 80,000 employees.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope my friend will not charge us with that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. And yet you do not dare, when you have the power and responsibility, to repeal the law. The question of the gentleman from Tennessee is not answered by me, but I will submit to him that the reasons that have animated him to retain the service when his party had the power to abolish it are probably the reasons that control gentlemen on this side to the same action when they have the same power. If he will analyze his own feelings, and determine what has been the mainspring of motive with him when in the condition I have suggested, he will probably have some better understanding how gentlemen on this side are affected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think the gentleman can cite the time when the Democratic party had the presidents of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, thank God, it was a good while ago [laughter]; but the gentleman ought to remember that there was such a time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts raise the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to this same section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after line 13, page 28, down to and including line 2, on page 29, being the provision in regard to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this proposition is exhausted by order of the committee.

Mr. MUDD. I understood that we came back to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The section was considered and debate was limited by order of the committee, and debate has been exhausted.

Mr. HEPBURN. That was not the understanding of the committee, Mr. Chairman. I for one did not understand that. I had my amendment here and I wanted to make some observations upon the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman from Iowa did make some observations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa made some remarks by unanimous consent. Whatever may have been the understanding, that was the order of the committee, but of course it may be modified.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be heard five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] will add to his request five minutes on this side in which to reply, we will have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland modify his request so as to ask that five minutes be allowed to each side?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object, for that means a civil-service discussion here of—we do not know how long.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana objects. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I raise a point of order against the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What point of order does the gentleman raise?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. It is against existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt but that the committee can strike out a paragraph appropriating under existing law.

Mr. MUDD. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD]. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that any order that may have been made by the committee be rescinded so far as this section is concerned. I think that is only fair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the order limiting debate on this section be rescinded.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MUDD) there were 49 in the affirmative and 48 in the negative.

Mr. CANNON. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported 68 in the affirmative and 66 in the negative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in justice to the committee, I want to give notice now, so that gentlemen may understand, that when this bill is reported to the House and this amendment comes up for approval there will be asked a separate vote in the House upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Office of the Secretary: For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000; 3 Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $4,500 each; clerk to the Secretary, $2,250; stenographer, $1,800; 3 private secretaries, 1 to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $1,800; 1 clerk of class 3; 1 clerk of class 2; 2 clerks of class 1; 1 clerk, $1,000; 4 messengers; 3 assistant messengers, and 1 laborer; in all, $45,350.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of this bill what provision, if any, has been made for appropriation of money to pay the rent of buildings which may have to be occupied by the Government in cases where other buildings which have been so occupied are being improved. For instance, in my own city provision has been made for an addition to a public building, and the making of this improvement will occupy probably ten or twelve months. Meanwhile the offices now in that building—the courts, post-office, etc.—will have to be removed. I would like to know whether in this bill there is any provision for the payment of rent in such cases?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Improvements of that kind are carried in the sundry civil bill. There is nothing of that kind in this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, as I understand the gentleman, this is not the place to provide for a matter of that kind.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is not.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment to strike out the last word will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Treasury Department: For Auditor, $4,000; Deputy Auditor, $2,500; law clerk, $2,000; 4 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 17 clerks of class 4; 13 clerks of class 3; 10 clerks of class 2; 20 clerks of class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 clerks, at $900 each; three assistant messengers; 4 laborers; and for continuing 3 clerks of class 1 and for 4 additional clerks of class 1 rendered necessary by increased work incident to the war with Spain; in all, $125,700.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word.

From the observations made this morning by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] it seems obvious that I failed yesterday to express myself with sufficient clearness. When he states that he inferred from my remarks that I was in favor of holding the people of Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines in perpetual servitude, it is evident, I think, that he failed to listen in the spirit in which I endeavored to speak. I tried to discuss from an entirely nonpartisan point of view and in an impartial spirit the fundamental principles of our institutions respecting the acquisition of territory.

If I was animated by any spirit at all, I was animated by the spirit of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson. And the spirit that animated them was not a partisan but a national spirit. As a result of my investigation of these principles, an examination of the opinions of our leading statesmen thereon, and a consideration of the interpretation put upon these principles by the people themselves during the past century, I was led to the conclusion that the United States has the right to acquire and hold territory, inhabited or uninhabited, without immediately incorporating it into the Union. I expressed no views concerning the final disposition of Puerto Rico, Cuba, or the Philippines. I did not understand the gentleman to ask me any question concerning Cuba or Puerto Rico. I will say now, however, in regard to Cuba and Puerto Rico, that whenever the people of those islands shall have shown a capacity for self-government and a desire to be incorporated into our Union, I would be in favor of annexing them to the United States as organized Territories and ultimately admitting them to statehood.

I understood the gentleman to ask me whether, when the Philippines were capable of self-government and were considered fit for annexation to the United States, I thought that ought to be done, and I replied no; that I did not think when that time came that it would be advisable; and my reason was, that when the time comes when the entire inhabitants of the Philippine Islands have shown that capacity for self-government which would entitle them to be incorporated into our Union they ought to be able to govern themselves as an independent republic. If after that the people of the Philippine Islands express a desire for union with the United States, I am fully in accord with President Monroe and President Jefferson and President Polk, who thought that the success of the system of local self-government, combined with Federal Union, did not depend on parallels of longitude or on isothermal lines, and should not oppose their admission.

The time at my disposal yesterday did not allow me to give full expression to these views. I wish now simply to say in general that in acquiring territory we can, as we have done, hold it without incorporating it into the Union. It should be so held as to extend as far as possible to the inhabitants of the territory in question the spirit of our institutions and the rights so far as possible which we enjoy; and whenever the people of any territory which we may acquire show capacity for self-government, they should either be given their independence or be incorporated into the Union. And during the time that we so hold them it should be our earnest effort to extend to them the principles of liberty and the spirit of freedom for which the wisdom of our sages and the blood of our martyrs have been given.

Mr. NOONAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. NOONAN. Does my colleague contend that the territory of the Philippines and of Puerto Rico is not territory of the United States?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. It is not territory incorporated into the United States; it is territory belonging to the United States in the sense of the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. GAINES. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is recognized in support of the pro forma amendment.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, several hours ago the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE], I regret to say, took it upon himself to decry the Democratic party, saying that it was not in favor of promulgating a just pension system; that the Republican party had been the father of pensions and had perpetuated our pension system. Mr. Chairman, we all know that is not borne out by the facts, and I regret exceedingly that the gentleman should make any such statement. I have been endeavoring ever since that statement was made to get the floor, but my friend on the other side, who possibly knew that I was going to rise for the purpose of defending the Democratic party against any such false accusation, objected in a very eloquent voice to giving me unanimous consent, and I rise now simply for the purpose of doing justice to that party, and to say that I remember in the Fifty-fifth Congress it was the distinguished son of Mississippi, the Hon. JOHN M. ALLEN, who rose on the floor of this House when our last immense pension appropriation bill was being considered and moved that it be passed unanimously, saying that when Joe Wheeler was climbing the heights of San Juan it was not time to talk or parley about the payment of pensions. That bill was unanimously passed.

Since I have been in this Congress, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party as a party has not opposed just pension laws, and the American people do not oppose a just pension law. The men who should not be pensioned are the men to whom we object. They are the men that the present Commissioner seems to be after now with a hot poker. The Commissioner of Pensions was opposed and criticised by the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], as well as myself, rose in our seats here and defended him from his own party, because we believe that he is doing his duty, if the press reports and his own reports are true, and we must at least take the latter as being true. If that be so, he is trying to do his duty, as Cleveland did, Mr. Chairman, in cleaning the pension roll, in expurgating the pension roll, and instead of making it one of suspicion, making it one absolutely of honor.

Mr. Chairman, bear in mind another thing—and I want to state right here that the day my distinguished colleague [Mr. SIMS] made his speech on the floor of this House which has excited so much comment here that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] who has to-day several times defended his State and her soldiery from a supposed attack, which I am sure was not malicious on the part of my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], for I do not know a kinder, a more charitable, or a more just man upon the floor of this House than he—the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] was not in the House. I occupied his seat myself, and on the same occasion, a few minutes before or after the speech of my colleague, I spoke upon the floor of the House, and I spoke from the seat of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD], which is a good one, because I could speak with more ease from that seat than from my own. In justice to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] I want to make this statement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it remained for a distinguished son of Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], when my colleague [Mr. SIMS] occupied the floor on a former occasion, to make a statement which corroborates the position that I have taken here. On page 1029 of the RECORD the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] said the following to my colleague [Mr. SIMS]:

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I do not believe the gentleman from Tennessee represents the best sentiment of the Democratic party upon that side of the Chamber in that statement.

Mr. SIMS. I represent the cause of truth; and if the Democratic party does not sanction it, that is their fault, not mine.

Now, this is what I particularly desire to read:

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that in the passage of pension bills here it has been to the eternal credit of members upon that side of the Chamber, many of whom were in the Confederate army, that they have thrown less obstruction in the way of a liberal administration of the pension law than they have ever been given credit for doing. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES. And yet my young friend from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE], possibly, like myself, born and reared since the war, gets up here to-day and flaunts it in the face of Democrats upon the floor of the House that the Republican party and the Republican party only has been the friend of the honest pensioner, the heroic soldier, the deserving patriot, and has been the only party which has enacted just pension laws.

The fact is that the Republican party has been in control of this House, with the exception of a few years, ever since the war, and during those few years we had a so-called Democratic President and a Democratic Senate and House which undertook to do the identical thing that the Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Evans, is undertaking to do to-day, as I said a moment ago, to make the pension roll a roll of honor rather than one of suspicion. The very fact, as I said a few days ago, that there is opposition to the Commissioner's administration of the law, coming from his own party and not from the Democratic party, shows that that roll should at least be looked after with more particularity than it has been heretofore.

Mr. Chairman, the old Confederate soldier, the Southern people, yea, the American people, believe in an honest pension law and a just pensioner, nothing more and nothing less. It is in the matter of the unjust pensioner that the American people feel they are being outraged.

Now, some gentlemen on the other side, I believe the gentleman from Ohio, alluded to the fact that hundreds and hundreds of pension bills are before the Pension Committee, and called attention to the fact that the gentleman, I believe, representing the Second Tennessee district [Mr. GIBSON] had introduced so many bills. I want to say to him that that district is a Republican district, as the First district is. It was the "Union end of the State," the end that voted against secession in days gone by, and hence it is, aside from the great industry of the Representative from that district and his great love for his people, that the distinguished son of Tennessee who represents that district has introduced so many pension bills.

Now, finally, let me challenge the kind attention of this honorable body to this fact: I say to you that the old Confederates—of whom I am not one, born and reared as I was since the war, but my kindred, my people, my neighbors were Confederates, and for that I make no apology here or elsewhere—have unmurmuringly, as honest history portrays, stood up here in favor of a just and honest pension system. They have favored it upon the hustings. They have done so in face of the fact that there stands upon the statute books of this country the following section:

No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States. (Section 4716, Revised Statutes.)

That was passed in 1862, and it is the law to-day. This is true in the face of the fact that the colonel of the first Tennessee regiment that went to the Philippines and did such valiant service there was a distinguished Confederate officer, and one of the lieutenants was a distinguished soldier, Maj. W. J. Whitthorne, a brother of the distinguished Admiral Whitthorne, who was for so many years a member of this honorable body.

Yet our people have unmurmuringly borne protective tariffs and these heavy pension bills. And I was happy to see the spirit that characterized the Republican side of this House when I brought to the attention of this body last Friday night the fact that that statute, section 4716, is still in force, so that to-day Colonel Smith's widow is not pensionable, although her gallant husband fell on the firing line at the head of his regiment in the Philippines. Under that law, which the Republican party has allowed to remain upon this statute book for thirty years, we can not give her a pension. I have introduced this bill to repeal this law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I ask a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be recognized for one minute more.

Mr. GAINES. I am glad to say that I do not believe that this House, nor this Congress, nor the President, will long let that law remain upon the statute books. I was happy to hear the mouthpiece of the Administration, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], say that he would join with me in the repeal of that statute that does not represent the feeling, the judgment, or the heart of the American people of this day. I shall ask later to extend my remarks by printing my bill to repeal section 4716.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8499) to equalize the pension laws.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the laws enacted and now in force relating to pensions for soldiers and sailors of the civil war of 1861 to 1865 be, and they are hereby, made equally applicable to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, without any distinction whatever as to age, participation in rebellion, or otherwise; and the same rates shall be paid in either case alike to officers, soldiers, widows, children, invalids, and dependents; and that all laws and parts of laws not in conformity herewith are hereby repealed.

That the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby directed to pay to Mexican war pensioners now on the roll the rates allowed in each respective case by the laws relating to the civil war, beginning with the date of the passage of this act.

That applicants for pension or increase, based upon service in the Mexican war, whose applications have been heretofore rejected because they were under age, or because they participated in rebellion, or because of any other requirement or condition that existed in the laws relating to Mexican war pensions which does not also exist in the laws relating to civil war pensions, shall, if they apply again, be paid from the date of the original application; and widows, invalids, and dependents who have applied for and been denied pensions or increase for any such reasons shall, upon reapplication, be paid at the rates herein fixed from the date of the original application. All persons who are now upon the Mexican war pension roll, and who now, under this act, become entitled to a disability rate, shall be paid that rate from the date of the original application if the disability then existed, or from the date of the occurrence of the disability.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, much criticism has been indulged in to-day against the party to which I belong upon this question of pensions. I desire to read for the benefit of the other side of this House the criticism of one of your members on the 19th of last month in reference to the conduct of the Pension Bureau. I do not suppose that there has been more attention given to this matter of pensions by any member than has been given by the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. Here is what he says about the conduct of the Pension Department under Republican rule:

On the 4th of March, 1897, there was a change of Administration, and the soldiers of this country looked forward to a new Commissioner of Pensions and a change in the Bureau of Pensions. They looked for a change in the rules and regulations; they looked for a more liberal construction of the law; but, I am sorry to say, they were disappointed.

* * * * * * *

But the new Commissioner of Pensions, with the exception of the continuance of the board of revision, which I believe had completed its work, and the consequent stoppage of the reduction and dropping of pensioners, continued the same rules and practices as the former Administration.

Now, here is what he says about the Republican Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Evans, who represents this Administration in the Department of Pensions:

He kept up the same false charges against the pensioners. He permitted himself to be interviewed and wrote articles for the press and did other things to attract the attention of the public to his Bureau.

Further on, let me read this record, coming from a Republican source, as to the conduct of this Department:

Mr. CURTIS. I charge it because I have examined the cases; I have a memorandum of them in my pocket, cases where I believe he has absolutely ignored the decision of Webster Davis. I want to call your attention to the fact that in 1897 he says he rejected, in round numbers, 107,000 cases—89,000 on medical grounds, 13,000 on legal grounds, 5,000 on the ground of no benefit.

I want to say here that I do not believe that 107,000 soldiers of the Union perpetrated falsehoods when they made their statements in reference to the contraction of disease or wounds in the war. I want also to say that the record of the Democratic party can be favorably compared with this record that was made by the Commissioner of Pensions, who represents the McKinley Administration. One hundred and seven thousand soldiers of the Union had their applications for pensions rejected, and when they were rejected it was an imputation that the 107,000 soldiers falsified.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not further desire to continue in this line of remarks, but I do ask permission to continue my remarks in the RECORD, in order that I may show the record of the Democratic party in Congress on this subject of pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will publish the whole record of the Democratic party, I would be glad for him to extend his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his remarks may be extended in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Interior Department: For auditor, $4,000; deputy auditor, $2,500; law clerk, $2,000; 3 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 8 clerks of class 4; 19 clerks of class 3; 35 clerks of class 2; 22 clerks of class 1; 11 clerks, at $1,000 each; 7 clerks, at $900 each; one clerk, $840; 1 assistant messenger; 10 laborers; and 1 female laborer, $480; in all, $160,640.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 40, line 12, strike out "twenty-two" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five;" in line 17 strike out "sixty thousand six" and insert "sixty-four thousand two."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Post-Office Department: For Auditor, $4,000; Deputy Auditor, $2,500; chief clerk, $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; 7 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 13 clerks of class 4; additional to 1 clerk as disbursing clerk, $200; 61 clerks of class 3; 76 clerks of class 2; 90 clerks of class 1; 70 clerks, at $1,000 each; 21 clerks, at $900 each; skilled laborer, $1,000; 25 money-order assorters, at $900 each; 31 money-order assorters, at $840 each; 23 money-order assorters, at $720 each; 2 messengers; 12 assistant messengers; 23 male laborers, at $660 each; 3 female laborers, at $660 each; and 15 charwomen; in all, $546,180.

For additional force for bringing up work of assorting and checking money orders one year or more in arrears, and for increased business, namely: For 5 clerks of class 4; 4 clerks of class 3; 5 clerks of class 2; 8 clerks of class 1; 12 clerks, at $1,000 each; and 5 clerks, at $900 each; in all, $48,500.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph. In line 22, after the word "for," strike out the word "additional," on page 41.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 41, line 22, after the word "for," strike out the word "additional."

Mr. STEELE. And insert the word "temporary."
The Clerk read as follows:

And insert the word "temporary."

Mr. STEELE. And on page 41, line 24, after the word "business," insert the words "incident to the war with Spain."
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 41, in line 24, after the word "business," insert the words "incident to the war with Spain."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it changes existing law.
Mr. STEELE. It is providing for additional force, and it is a temporary force to be employed only during the war with Spain, as other provisions are in this bill.
Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As I understand the amendment, it either means nothing or it means that this force is not to be appointed according to existing law; and of course if it means that, it is a change in the existing law. As I understand it, it leaves the number practically the same, but changes the method of appointment. I suppose that is the purpose of the gentleman from Indiana.
Mr. STEELE. I am not disclosing my purpose, Mr. Chairman, but I claim it is not in contravention of existing law. There are other amendments in the bill providing for the same service, and the employment was simply temporary throughout the Department.
Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The law provides for that.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentlemen from Massachusetts to the fact that it does not change the existing law as the Chair understands it. There is no existing law upon this subject. Here is a provision providing temporarily for certain employees in one of the Departments. Surely it is within the power of the committee to perfect that system.
Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. There is a law to-day providing how additional appointments shall be made. I may not have caught the reading of the amendment, but as I understood it, all it does is to strike out the word "additional" and put in the word "temporary," which we all know has been so construed that they shall be appointed in a manner different from the regular method. If that is the proposition of the amendment, I submit that the Chair would hold that it was, of course, a change in existing law. If it does not mean by the word "temporary" a different method of appointment from that which the law now provides, I do not see what the pertinence of the amendment is.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that it is obnoxious to the rule, if that is the intent of the amendment.
Mr. STEELE. The additional force is asked for, and it is supposed that they want them during the war with Spain, as it is required in other Departments. I am asking that they be appointed in the same way.
Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I should like to ask if the bill before this amendment was offered did not provide for the additional force?
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order.
Mr. STEELE. Well, I am sorry the gentleman from Massachusetts made a second speech. [Laughter.]
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.
The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Office of the Director of the Mint: For Director, $4,500; examiner and computer, at $2,500 each; assayer, $2,200; adjuster of accounts, $2,000; 2 clerks of class 4; 1 clerk of class 2; 4 clerks of class 1; translator, $1,400; 1 clerk, $1,000; 1 copyist; 1 messenger; 1 assistant in laboratory, $1,000; and 1 assistant messenger; in all, $29,360.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 42, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "one thousand" and insert "fifteen hundred."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the amount recommended by the Secretary.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Indiana if there is any statute upon this subject?
Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no statute. In the last appropriation bill it was carried at $1,000.
The CHAIRMAN. The last appropriation bill carried it at $1,000?
Mr. HEMENWAY. At $1,000. This amendment seeks to make it $1,500.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is right; but the recommendation of the Secretary is that it should be $1,500.
The CHAIRMAN. The recommendation of the Secretary would not make any difference as far as the point of order was concerned. The Chair understands that it was carried in the last appropriation bill at $1,000; and there being no other statute on this subject, the Chair must sustain the point of order.

TRANSFER OF EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and at the urgent request of many members on both sides of the House, I desire to give notice that when we get back into the House I will ask unanimous consent to substitute Monday night for pension business instead of to-night, on account of the storm.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago: For assistant treasurer, $3,000; cashier, $2,500; vault clerk, $1,800; paying teller, $1,800; assorting teller, and receiving teller, at $1,500 each; clerk, $1,000; bookkeeper, $1,500; 3 coin, coupon, and currency clerks, at $1,500 each; 15 clerks, at $1,200 each; messenger, $840; stenographer, $720; janitor, $900; and 3 watchmen at $720 each; and 2 watchmen at $840 each; in all, $44,020.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25, page 57, and line 1, page 58, strike out the words "and 2 watchmen at $840 each.

The amendment was agreed to.
The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at St. Louis: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier and chief clerk, $2,500; first teller, $2,000; second teller, $1,800; third teller, $1,600; fourth teller, $1,200; bookkeeper, $1,500; two assistant bookkeepers, and coin teller, at $1,200 each; assistant bookkeeper, $1,000; assistant coin teller, stenographer and typewriter, and messenger, at $1,000 each; two day watchmen, and coin counters, at $720 each; night watchman, $720; and janitor, $900; in all, $25,460.

Mr. HEMENWAY. On behalf of the committee I move the amendment which I send to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, in line 17, insert "2 clerks, at $1,200 each;" and in line 23 strike out "twenty-five thousand four hundred and sixty" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-seven thousand eight hundred and sixty."

The amendment was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to add to my remarks made an hour ago matter which will make less than a page of the RECORD.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD his remarks made during the session of the Committee of the Whole to-day. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, as I was cut off and prevented from concluding what I desired to say, I make a similar request.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.
Mr. GAINES. I ask the same privilege.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] makes a like request. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.
The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Chief of Engineers: For chief clerk, $2,000; 4 clerks of class 4; 3 clerks of class 3; 3 clerks of class 2; 4 clerks of class 1; 1 clerk, $1,000; 1 assistant messenger, and 2 laborers; in all, $26,040.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 76, in lines 8 and 9, strike out "4 clerks of class 4; 3 clerks of class 3; 3 clerks of class 2" and insert in lieu thereof "5 clerks of class 4; 4 clerks of class 3; 4 clerks of class 2;" and in line 11 strike out "$26,040" and insert "$30,840."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. HEPBURN. May I have the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] for a moment? In the second line of the note on page 22 of the report I read:

Net increase in the number of salaries estimated, 1901, over appropriations for 1900, 967.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is the number of salaries estimated for; but of those some are for the temporary force that was expected to be put on the permanent roll.
Mr. HEPBURN. But that is the number required in the opinion of the heads of Departments—967 more than were appropriated for in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No, sir. That includes a number of salaries of those who are now temporary clerks, but whom the heads of Departments expected to be put on the permanent rolls. Including these, the increase would be 967. If the gentleman will turn to the first page of the report, he will notice that this matter is there partially explained:

It is proper to state that of the 799 specific salaries estimated for in excess of those recommended in the bill 410 were for clerks and others in the War Department now employed and paid from a general appropriation made for the current fiscal year for additional employees rendered necessary in the War Department because of increased work incident to the war with Spain, which general appropriation it is proposed to continue during the next fiscal year in the same sum as was provided for the current year; and 188 of such specific salaries estimated for were in place of employments in the Navy Department now paid from appropriations for "Increase of the Navy."

Mr. HEPBURN. Possibly the last line of the note to which I have just called the gentleman's attention will explain:

Net increase in number of salaries in this bill over appropriations of 1900, 168.

That, I presume, is the number they call for in their estimates over and above those now employed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. They called for a larger increase in the estimates; but that is the number we have allowed in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration House bill No. 8347 (legislative appropriation bill), had come to no conclusion thereon.

TRANSFER OF EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next at 5 o'clock the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session not to extend beyond half past 10 and to be devoted to the consideration of such business as is in order at the regular Friday evening meeting.

Mr. PAYNE. And that the session of to-night be dispensed with?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Yes, sir. This request is made at the solicitation of members on both sides of the House. The reason is apparent to all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the session for to-night be dispensed with and that on Monday next, at 5 o'clock, the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, the evening session to adjourn at half past 10 o'clock and to be devoted to the consideration of business that is in order at the regular Friday night session. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suppose it is understood that we shall adjourn to-day at 5 o'clock. You do not propose to run this session beyond 5 o'clock?

Mr. SULLOWAY and others. Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAHON, for four days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. RIDGELY, for one week, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following executive communication and Senate bill, the reference of which was changed as indicated:

Letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for the pay of stenographers and typewriters employed by Indian inspectors and agents—from Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Senate bill for the relief of A. F. Fleet, superintendent of the Missouri Military Academy, Mexico, Mo.—from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on Military Affairs.

VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY AT ANNAPOLIS.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. GROUT, Mr. HEATWOLE, and Mr. BERRY as Visitors on the part of the House of Representatives to the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER also announced the appointment of Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. OLMSTED, and Mr. SLAYDEN as Visitors on the part of the House of Representatives to the Military Academy at West Point.

And then, on motion of Mr. HEMENWAY (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Acting Director of the Mint submitting an estimate of appropriations for new machinery and appliances at the Philadelphia mint, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Also, letter of Frank B. Rose, of Swarthmore, Pa., relating to section 11 of the naval personnel bill—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 17, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment, as chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals, of Mr. DAVIDSON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. NEEDHAM, for three days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LIVINGSTON (at the request of Mr. MADDOX), for this day, on account of sickness.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2708. An act to amend an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1899—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2650. An act granting an increase of pension to Katharine Taylor Dodge—to the Committee on Pensions.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BLAND.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I ask unanimous consent that Saturday, April 7, beginning at 1 o'clock, be set apart for the delivering of eulogies on the life and character of our late colleague, Mr. BLAND.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that Saturday, April 7, commencing at 1 o'clock, be set apart for exercises in commemoration of the life, character, and death of the late Mr. BLAND, of Missouri. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

And then, on motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the point where he suspended last evening.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Of the foregoing amounts appropriated under public buildings and grounds, the sum of $27,130 shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the clause just read, from lines 20 to 23, inclusive. I do not know whether the gentleman who is in charge of this bill contends that that provision is in order or not.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I certainly do.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard briefly. I will read the language against which I make the point of order:

Of the foregoing amounts appropriated under public buildings and grounds, the sum of $27,130 shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

It seems to me that there can be no doubt that this is squarely a change of existing law, inasmuch as it changes the fund out of which these expenses shall be paid.

I do not know that there is any permanent statute on this subject, but in the appropriation bill for the current year, passed at the last session, which I have before me and to which it is unnecessary to refer, everybody knows that these expenses were paid entirely out of the revenues of the General Government.

Now, these parks which are referred to here all belong to the General Government. The title to the land is in the General Government. It is just as appropriate and just as fair and proper that the expenses of policing this Capitol building should be paid one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia as to have the District pay one-half of the salaries of watchmen in the various parks hereinbefore enumerated. For instance, among the parks here enumerated as a part of the public grounds of this Government are the grounds about the Executive Mansion, the greenhouses, and nurseries, and other matters of that kind, with which the District has nothing whatever to do. It is just as appropriate and just as much in accordance with law that the Territory of Oklahoma should be made to pay one-half of these expenses as that the District of Columbia should be made to do so.

If there is no general statute upon this subject, Mr. Chairman, then this is new legislation which changes the body of the law applicable to this subject-matter as it stands to-day. Therefore it is subject to the point of order.

Numerous decisions hold that anything which is in the nature of new legislation is a change of existing law.

Not only is this provision obnoxious to clause 2 of Rule XXI, as a change of existing law, but as to the District of Columbia and its revenues it is an expenditure not authorized by law, because everyone will concede that no such expenditure as this has ever been authorized or was ever sought to be authorized out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

I think there can be no question, Mr. Chairman, that this is a plain, unequivocable, and incontestable change of existing law and, as to the District of Columbia, also unauthorized by previous law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's point of order is not, in my opinion, well taken, for the following reasons: Congress is the common council for the District of Columbia and has been from the time of its establishment. Its establishment is in pursuance of a provision in the Constitution. Now, it is a question of fact as to whether these are legitimate municipal expenditures. If so, then there is no doubt about the power to appropriate for the same by Congress.

The gentleman says that the District of Columbia does not own these parks. That is true. Nor does the District of Columbia own the fee in the streets. It owns the parks just as much as it does the streets.

Now, I apprehend it will not be controverted even by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] that it is competent to appropriate, either from the Federal Treasury or from the Federal Treasury as it is replenished by taxation upon property in the District of Columbia, to improve and care for the streets.

There is a great park system connected with the District. There is the Zoological Park; there is the Rock Creek Park; there are hundreds of little parks at the intersection of streets, at almost every street corner.

Now, it is true that in large part the appropriations for the care and preservation of the numberless little parks about the District have been made heretofore from the Federal Treasury alone. I mean the appropriations have been made from the Treasury as contradistinguished from the revenues of the District. But under the law of 1878, as well as under prior laws, all revenues collected in the District of Columbia are covered into the Treasury, and there is no way to get them out except to appropriate them. This bill does that, and it provides in substance, as is usual in District expenditures, that one-half shall be paid from the Treasury proper and one-half from the money that is in the Treasury from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Now, if there is no authority to make this appropriation for policing these parks out of the revenues of the District, there is no authority to make it from the moneys belonging to the United States.

It is true that the act of 1878 does provide that it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to submit estimates to be transmitted through the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress for certain objects. I read now from section 3 of that act:

> The cost of maintaining public institutions of charity, prisons belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District, the expenses of the Aqueduct and its appurtenances, and also to submit an estimate of the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

Now, this is to defray an expense of the government of the District of Columbia.

Then, if you go further on in this section, you find this provision:

> To the extent to which Congress shall approve of said estimates Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent thereof, and the remaining 50 per cent of such estimates shall be levied and assessed upon the property of the District of Columbia.

The gentleman might say that as an estimate is provided for, unless the estimate comes, there could be no appropriation of one-half from the revenues of the District now in the Treasury. If the gentleman does say that, I will answer his proposition by saying that by virtue of the same language there could be no appropriation from the money of the United States in the Treasury, because the law applies to one as well as to the other; and if it applies to one, it necessarily applies to the other.

The true principle is that if this be a legitimate municipal expenditure for the District of Columbia, whether it is found in the estimates or not, under the law which creates the District and makes Congress the common council thereof, then from the bare fact of the existence of the District of Columbia, and Congress being the common council, and it being a municipal expenditure, it is in order.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. The parks, as I understand it, are under the control of the War Department, and not under the control of the District Commissioners?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, another question. Is the gentleman in favor of the pending proposition?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. BABCOCK. Another question. Does the gentleman think that it is wise that all expenditures in the District of Columbia for municipal affairs and improvements should be paid one-half by the District of Columbia and one-half by the General Government?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, and no; both, if the gentleman will allow me. I am fully in harmony with the proposition that when real-estate speculators desire to have streets extended they should pay the benefits, and I believe that is a District matter and that Congress has the power to provide for the extension, just as it did the other day in the legislation that the gentleman reported, to extend one of these avenues—perhaps Sixteenth street, I do not recollect—and that that should be at the exclusive expense of the District of Columbia and of the property benefited. Congress so legislated.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is the point that I wanted to develop. Does the gentleman understand that in these street-openings the District pays one-half and the abutting property pays one-half?

Mr. CANNON. Very well; that is quite in the power of Congress, and Congress has so exercised the power.

Mr. BABCOCK. The impression has gone out that the District is paying it all, and I desire here to correct that, and to call attention to the fact that the District of Columbia pays for one-half of the expense of opening all of the streets and the abutting property pays the other half, it being assessed against the property, payable in one, two, three, four, and five years.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that exactly; and that is quite in the power of Congress. Further, it would be in the power of Congress, if the Chair will indulge me in further answer to the gentleman's question, to assess the whole of the expense upon the property. We have plenary power in the premises, and we have exercised it. We have had such legislation, and we will have to do so in the future where proper cases are presented; but this is upon a different ground. Here are a hundred parks, created as much for the benefit of the District of Columbia and the whole people as the streets are created. The fee simple in the streets and in the parks are all in the United States. Now, the gentleman says because of that this provision is susceptible or amenable to a point of order that one-half of it shall not be from the revenues of the District that are in the Treasury of the United States. That point of order necessarily would run upon the same principle to improvements of the streets; necessarily so. It would necessarily run upon the same principle for the support of the local courts; it would necessarily, upon the same principle, run for the support of the hospitals.

Mr. STEELE. For the police.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). And many other municipal expenditures. So, I state again, as to the District of Columbia, Congress having plenary power, Congress has legislated by the organization of the District prior to 1878 and in 1878, and has plenary power to govern this city just the same as a common council of a city would; more than that, it has greater power than a common council, because a common council finds its warrant of authority in the act of the legislature which creates it. We find our warrant of authority in the Constitution, and are absolutely supreme in the exercise of that warrant of authority, limited only by the general provisions of the Constitution.

We have exercised that authority; we have organized the District; we have created the streets; we have created the parks; we have kept the fee simple in the hands of the United States for obvious reasons. We created the Zoological Park, which has been kept in the same way, for obvious reasons; and yet the gentleman says, because the bare legal title is in the United States, that we have not power to appropriate, or rather we have not authorized heretofore appropriations for municipal purposes where the United States holds the fee simple. Well, I would point to a long line of precedents in answer to that; I point to the necessity in answer to it; I would point to legislation in answer to it; not only the legislation of 1878, I would refer to legislation from the beginning.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I realize, and all admit, that Congress is the common council of the District of Columbia; but I also contend, and I think all will admit, that Congress, when acting in that capacity, must act in obedience to the law and the rules of this House. I do not contend that it is not within the power of Congress to provide that the District of Columbia shall be made to pay one-half of the expenditures for the maintenance of these parks. I do not contend that Congress can not provide that the District of Columbia shall pay all the expenses of these parks, however inequitable and wrong that may be. I do not contend that Congress, in its absolute and unlimited power of legislation on the District of Columbia, can not provide that the District of Columbia should pay the expenditures for the maintenance of this Capitol building, because it is a public building in the same sense as those here enumerated are public buildings and public grounds. But everybody realizes that there is a difference in doing this by direct legislation and doing it upon an appropriation bill. We can bring in a bill here which is not subject to a point of order in such a way as direct legislation can appropriately get before this House and directly provide by law that such should be the case; but we have not done so——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. MUDD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If we have not power to appropriate from the moneys in the Treasury, one half of it belonging to the people of the United States and the other half made by the District revenues, for this purpose, will my friend please put his finger on any legislation anywhere that would give us the power to appropriate it all from the moneys of the people of the United States? And I will say further that when he will put his finger on such legislation I will show him right along with it the same power to appropriate half and half.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I do not contend that there is a line upon the statute books specifically showing in ipsissimis verbis that you can appropriate for the general purposes and objects of the General Government. No such particular and express provision is necessary. I aver that Congress is clothed with the general power and with complete power to appropriate money generally for the expenses of the National Government, and among the objects of expenditure of the National Government is the maintenance of its public buildings, parks, and grounds.

The gentleman is unfortunate in his attempted analogy between the streets of Washington and these public parks. He replies, in response to a remark by me that on general principles outside of the law such expenditures should be paid from the Government revenues because the fee is in the Government, that the same argument would apply to the streets, and reads from the organic act of 1878. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I needed any confirmation of my contention, the gentleman has there supplied it. The organic act of 1878 does specifically provide that one-half of the expenditures for the maintenance of streets should be out of the District revenue. It goes further——

Mr. PUGH. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. In whose province is it to determine what constitutes the expenses for the District? Is it not solely within the discretion of Congress? And also tell me what the difference is between the principle involved in the expenses of the court of appeals, the supreme court, the Garfield Hospital, the Providence Hospital, the Zoological Park, and this.

Mr. MUDD. I understand it is in the province of Congress to determine what are the legitimate expenditures for the District of Columbia, but I understand just as well, and I apprehend that it is patent to everyone, that it is within the jurisdiction of the Chairman of this Committee of the Whole House—and it is to that jurisdiction I am now making my appeal—to determine whether or not in the case in point that function is being exercised in consonance with the law and the rules of the House.

The act of 1878 enumerates—and it is singular that the chairman should read from the act of 1878; he seems to have mistaken the application of it—I say the act of 1878 specifies the objects of expenditure for municipal purposes for which payment should be made on the half-and-half principle out of the two funds, those of the District of Columbia and the National Government. It states that the opening of streets shall be so paid——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. I will read it to my friend.

Also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia; the cost of maintaining all public institutions of charity, reformatories, and prisons belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the United States or District of Columbia; and also the expenses of the Washington Aqueduct and its appurtenances; and also an itemized statement and estimate of the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MUDD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not the act before me——

Mr. CANNON. Neither streets nor parks are mentioned.

Mr. MUDD. I have not the act before me, but my recollection is clear that somewhere in that act there is a general provision referring to the opening and construction and extension of streets. If that is not the case, everyone understands that the opening and extension and building of streets is an ordinary municipal function.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if my friend will allow me, because we both want to get at the right of it, take Pennsylvania avenue, down there by the market and Ford's old theater, there is a little park. Now, then, is it not both for the use of the Government and citizens of the District of Columbia, one as much as the other? If you find the authority to appropriate for one, have you not found the authority to appropriate for the other?

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress there was an act providing for the control by the District Commissioners of the little plats of ground at the intersection of streets which are generally denominated "parkings." I apprehend, in view of the passage of that act, if it should be the case now that there were any expenditure needed for watchmen in connection with the little places called parkings, which are not in any sense public parks, Congress might appropriate one-half out of the revenue of the District of Columbia. Now, sir, I do not feel it necessary to enter into a controversy with the gentleman as to whether or not the care of streets is especially enumerated as one of the objects of municipal concern and municipal expenditure. I know this, however, that Congress, the District Commissioners, the attorney for the District, and everybody else have heretofore so construed it to be a law; and if they have construed it to be the law and it is the law, it would require a change of existing law to appropriate for such proposition as is contained in this bill.

Nobody has ever contended that the maintenance of the public parks should be saddled on the District of Columbia. The mere fact that the citizens in this District, in common with persons temporarily residents of the District, members of Congress and others, people from all over the country, occasionally enjoy the parks is no reason why these parks should be maintained by the District of Columbia. It might just as well be contended that it was equitable and lawful that the State governments should pay one-half of the expenditure for maintenance of the great national parks that are scattered here and there throughout the country. Of course I understand that we can not make the States pay for them, but the principle, the equity, would be the same.

Mr. PUGH. Does the gentleman concede that the act of 1878 comprises all the law regulating this appropriation?

Mr. MUDD. No, sir; I understand that Congress has from time to time covered the statute book with laws regulating appropriations for the District of Columbia, but I understand just as well as the gentleman from Kentucky understands it——

Mr. PUGH. One moment.

Mr. MUDD. Let me answer the question. There is no provision in any of these laws, and the gentleman does not undertake to point to any provision requiring the expenditure by the District for this particular proposition, for the first time sought to be put through upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. PUGH. Will the gentleman——

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that this matter will be further elucidated by any other interruption. I will therefore proceed to conclude my remarks upon it. The question here is not whether this may not be from a certain standpoint of observation a legitimate appropriation for the District of Columbia. I think it is not. But however that may be, the question and only question to be considered at present is whether this provision does not change existing law in that it proposes to change the method of appropriation—that we are to put this provision upon the statute books for the first time this year, making a departure from existing law and from the uniform custom of Congress with respect to the District for perhaps a hundred years.

The very title of this bill, "A bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government," shows its character and nature and purpose. Of course, it is not stated specifically in the title that the money appropriated by the bill shall come out of funds in the United States Treasury for National Government purposes——

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman will allow me to say that the closing words of the title are "and for other purposes."

Mr. MUDD. Oh, I understand that; but it does not anywhere say that you are taking this money from other sources—from illegal sources.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Is not one-half of the pay of the Metropolitan police of this city to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia?

Mr. MUDD. We will cross that bridge when we come to it. The question of the gentleman has no relation to this matter of the public parks, for which there is no provision under existing law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Nine-tenths of this money is to be paid to officers who are clothed with the powers of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. MUDD. I do not think that is the case. If it were, it would not alter the situation. Mr. Chairman, I say again that the very title of the act in which we find this provision is a sufficient answer to the contention of gentlemen who think this proposition in order.

Let me read the first paragraph of the bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Of course, that does not specifically negative the idea that it may not refer to money in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia; but I submit that by all fair rules of construction we have a right to have considered as superimposed upon and read into that language, after the word Treasury, the words "of the United States for United States Government purposes." The language as it stands in the bill constitutes, in my judgment, a fair intendment to that effect, and should be read and construed as a mandate that the moneys expended under the bill shall be drawn exclusively from funds belonging to the United States.

This is a very important question, Mr. Chairman. This provision of the bill makes a new departure. The amount of money involved is considerable. Our action upon this question will set a very important precedent, greatly affecting the welfare of the District of Columbia. Therefore, I have made the point of order, and I trust this matter will receive the very careful and serious consideration of yourself and of members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands it, the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] is, that the provision to exclude which the point of order is invoked is a change of existing law. The gentleman confines his point of order to that.

Mr. MUDD. The Chair will allow me a moment. I contend that it is a change of existing law and quoad the District of Columbia provides for an expenditure not previously authorized. My point includes both grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that amounts to practically the same thing. Clearly this provision is for a work now in progress. The gentleman from Maryland does not contend, as the Chair understands, that it is not so. The parks, according to the understanding of the Chair, are not on a parity with the Capitol Grounds, but are rather similar to the streets of the city. The organic act of 1878 clearly intended, and in section 5 rather more clearly than in section 2 states, that Congress should charge one-half of all public expenses in the District to the District of Columbia. Section 5 of the act expressly names "streets and sewers and any other work." So that the Chair thinks it was clearly the intention of Congress, by that organic act, to provide that Congress should charge the District of Columbia with one-half of all public expenses in the District. And this, it seems to the Chair, is such an expenditure as Congress intended by the act of 1878 should be borne one-half by the District of Columbia. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 19, page 79, down to and including "Columbia," in line 23.

Mr. MUDD. As a member of the District Committee, to whose hands have been committed in a special sense the interests of this District, and with what knowledge I have of the conditions obtaining here, I have felt it my duty to offer this amendment, which proposes to strike out this provision and leave the expenses for these parks to be paid hereafter, as heretofore, entirely out of the revenues of the General Government.

I do not intend to go into any lengthy discussion of this question. The House understands the nature of the provision and the nature of the amendment. Whatever may be the opinion of the Chair (to which, of course, I submit, though I protest very strenuously that it is not the correct construction as to the legality of the provision under our rules), the propriety of the provision stands on a different footing. Everybody admits—the gentleman in charge of this bill, in discussing the point of order, conceded—that the provision is at any rate a departure from the custom that has prevailed heretofore.

Now, I have seen it stated, and I have no doubt all members of this House have made careful observation of the statements of the newspapers within the last two or three days, that the District of Columbia is now approaching a very large deficit in its revenues that are needed for carrying on the ordinary expenditures of the government and for the ordinary, gradual, and average extension of streets, in response to the interests and necessities of this, as we hope, growing city. This provision is a departure from the spirit of the organic act of 1878. By that act Congress abolished the previously existing government of the District of Columbia, took the charge of it out of the hands of its people and established the system under which the District of Columbia was to be governed exclusively by Congress without having any say in its own concerns. Congress then said, and pledged the faith of the Government to the declaration, that thereafter the expenditures of the city, which were enumerated, and which did not embrace the parks, would be paid one half out of the revenues of the General Government and the other half out of the revenue of the District of Columbia.

Certainly it was never contemplated that the District should pay one-half of the expenses of these parks. It was never so stated; it was never hinted at. It appears nowhere upon the face of that act, either by express language or by any sort of implication. It has never been contended by anyone, from that time up to this hour, that the District should pay these expenses.

The District is not able to pay these expenses. It is imposing a hardship and a burden upon the District of Columbia that it can not bear. It will cripple the growth of the District; it will curtail its capacity for needed expenditures. It is, in my judgment, unwise legislation: it is unjust legislation, and I hope that amendment will prevail, and that we will leave this matter as it has been heretofore.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman has stated that this thing has never been before this House. At the last session of this Congress on the sundry civil bill a similar provision passed——

Mr. MUDD. Passed the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Passed the House.

Mr. MUDD. But it was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman says it is not enumerated in the act of 1878. Neither are the streets enumerated.

Mr. MUDD. I contend that they are.

Mr. HEMENWAY. So that if everything had to be enumerated the General Government would have to pay for maintaining the streets of the city of Washington.

Now, what is it we have here? We are providing for a lot of watchmen in the different parks in this city. They are men clothed with police powers. They are placed there in order to protect citizens of the District of Columbia, as well as visitors and members of Congress, who are passing through these parks at night. They are virtually policemen here in the District of Columbia. Then, there are laborers who take care of the flower gardens in parks around the city. Colonel Bingham, who has charge of the public buildings and grounds, recommends that this amount be paid out of the funds of the District of Columbia, and says it is a proper charge upon the funds collected from the taxpayers of the District.

Who is there in this House that can doubt for a moment that the maintenance of the streets and the pay of the Metropolitan police are proper charges to be paid one-half by the District of Columbia? If that is so, then this is a proper charge. There can certainly be no doubt about it.

The Government does not want the District of Columbia to pay a cent that it ought not to pay, and this is a charge, as I say, a great portion of it, for the police force to guard parks around the city.

Mr. MUDD. The little parks around the city do not have watchmen or laborers either.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman says the little parks around the city do not have watchmen or laborers either. I should like to ask who makes these flower gardens, if the laborers do not do it.

Mr. MUDD. I refer to the little parkings under the control of the District Commissioners. And, if the gentleman contends that the expenditures for these parks should be borne as ordinary municipal expenditures, to be paid out of the District revenues, like other municipal expenditures, ought not these parks then to be under the control of the District Commissioners, instead of under the control of the War Department?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, certainly not.

Mr. CANNON. They are all creatures of Congress.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly not. The original act provides what shall be under the control of the Commissioners, and what under the control of the General Government.

Mr. MUDD. And what should be paid by them, too.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And there is no reason why a policeman on a beat down here, called a watchman, who is there to protect the lives of the people, the same as the Metropolitan policemen are here to protect their lives, should not be paid just as the Metropolitan policemen are paid, unless, as the gentleman says, he is under the control of some one else. What is the difference? Who is he under the control of? Congress has to make the appropriation, whether he is under the control of Colonel Bingham or under the control of the police board here in the city. He performs exactly the same duties, except that he performs the additional duty of a watchman in the park; and he certainly ought to be paid one-half from the funds of the District and one-half from the funds of the Government; and I hope, gentlemen, that there will be no great division upon this point. The committee are certainly right. This amount ought to be divided, and paid one-half out of the funds of the District; and I hope that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with my colleague on the Committee on the District of Columbia in support of his amendment. It seems to me that these are properly part of the expenditures of the District that legitimately come within the provision which requires them to be paid one-half out of the revenues of the Government and one-half out of the revenues of the District.

But the particular point in which I wish to take issue with my colleague is the statement he makes in regard to a deficit in the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MUDD. I only state it from the newspapers. I do not know personally.

Mr. COWHERD. I am not taking issue as to whether there is or probably will be a deficit, but to as whether there ought to be a deficit.

I make the assertion that if the District of Columbia assesses and collects its taxes upon anything like the same basis that taxes are collected in all other cities in the United States, there would be no danger of any deficit in the revenues, and I wish to state that upon a hearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the last Congress the gentleman in charge of the assessment and collection of taxes, when the question was put to him as to why certain property was omitted from taxation, made the statement that there was no need to collect additional revenues for the District of Columbia, because they collected more now than Congress would meet by appropriation.

Mr. MUDD. That is not sufficient now, though.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], who evidently is familiar with the subject, whether it is not a common practice in the District of Columbia to allow personal property to escape taxation?

Mr. COWHERD. That is the very proposition to which I was referring.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Does not the law provide that personal property in the District of Columbia shall be taxed?

Mr. COWHERD. I so understand it, excepting an exemption of, I think, $500 worth of personal property.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman why his committee does not report some measure which will make effective the law taxing property in the District of Columbia?

Mr. COWHERD. That is a question that I can not answer, as I am not in charge of the committee. The matter was under consideration in the last Congress, when a subcommittee was appointed; but the subcommittee, as I understand it, did not report.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I want to state to the gentleman an instance which came under my observation, of an estate which had existed in the District of Columbia for many years, an estate of over $300,000, and had never paid a cent of taxation upon its personal property; and I was told in that connection that the personal property taxation law in this District was a farce; that it was not enforced and was not intended to be enforced.

It is a matter which interests us as Representatives. We must appropriate for one-half of the expenses of the District out of the National Treasury, and then have gentlemen find fault because we ask the District of Columbia to pay one-half of the expenses of public parks, which are intended for the sole benefit of the District of Columbia, when we all over the country have to pay the whole of similar expenses.

Mr. COWHERD. I heartily agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and it was to voice that sentiment that I took the floor.

As I understand the situation in the District of Columbia, personal property practically escapes taxation, and it escapes taxation, as I understand it, as stated by the gentleman in charge of the assessment and collection of taxes in this District, because they do not believe they need any more revenues, for the reason that they have as much now as Congress will meet by appropriation.

Mr. MUDD. Do I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] to state that there is anything approaching a general exemption of personal property from taxation by the Commissioners without warrant of law in this District?

Mr. COWHERD. I do not know whether it is by the Commissioners or by the action of the special officer in charge of that department, or how. But I do say that the practical effect is that personal property in the District of Columbia goes untaxed; that practically all the taxes are borne by real estate.

Mr. MUDD. I do not agree with the gentleman as to the matter of fact. I know that property of various forms escapes taxation in other places besides the District of Columbia; but I deny that it is a general proposition applicable to personal property in the District of Columbia.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. MUDD, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: For chief clerk, $2,000; 3 clerks of class 4; 6 clerks of class 3; 2 clerks of class 2; 2 stenographers, at $1,200 each; 11 clerks of class 1; 5 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 assistant messenger; 1 messenger boy, $420; and 1 laborer; in all, $40,200.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 88, in lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "forty thousand two hundred" and insert "forty-two thousand six hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian Office: For the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $4,000; Assistant Commissioner, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; financial clerk, $2,000; chief of division, $2,000; principal bookkeeper, $1,800; 5 clerks of class 4; 14 clerks of class 3; draftsman, $1,600; stenographer, $1,600; stenographer, $1,400; 10 clerks of class 2; 25 clerks of class 1; 14 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 stenographer and 1 clerk to superintendent of Indian schools, at $1,000 each; 17 copyists; architect, $1,500; draftsman, $1,500; 1 messenger; 2 assistant messengers; 2 laborers; female messenger, $840; messenger boy, $480; and 2 charwomen; in all, $132,380.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, if you will pass H. R. No. 1, the proclaimed purpose being to firmly establish the gold standard, you should be willing that its defects be pointed out and so amended in other respects as to best meet the requirements of the people. This bill turns over to the banks the power to control the issue of bank notes. This should not be so; it should be reserved to the people and lodged with Congress.

When a bank is chartered to furnish the currency on which the people depend to do business, it should be required to issue the full limit of bank notes authorized, and then all power should be taken from it to reduce the circulation. If you grant, as this bill does, to the national banks the right to issue the currency, much or little, as they please, and the further power to withdraw and restrict the circulation at their own will and pleasure, you open up the most perfect opportunity for combinations, and self-interest will bring about these combinations, and you will find the powerful machinery of the national banks combined to control the amount of circulation when it is their pleasure to restrict the circulation and bring about hard times and panics, to the destruction of all business save that of the banks alone.

I say to you, my Republican brethren, who have this bill in charge and are responsible for it, in the passage of this bill you make it possible for one of the greatest combines ever entered into, and you will see a trust formed that will cause all others, as disastrous as they may be and have been, to pale into utter insignificance.

Trusts are to-day the menace of this Republic. Under Republican legislation a system of combines and trusts has grown up that controls all forms of business. I say under Republican legislation; yes, the natural and legitimate outgrowth of the legislation of the Republican party.

In 1898 there were new trusts of nearly $1,000,000,000 formed. There was in amount of stock issued the enormous sum of $873,263,000, and the companies issued bonds for $42,913,000 more; total, $916,176,000. The companies' names and their capitalizations are a matter of public record.

The trusts were greatly on the increase during the year 1899. On March 26 a list of the trusts, including 162, was published in the New York World, aggregating the enormous sum of $2,683,164,467.

Prior to this, J. Pierpont Morgan had succeeded in combining eight railroads in his gigantic coal trusts, with a capitalization of $889,108,756.

Mr. Whitney has also consolidated 22 street-car lines in New York in six years and made for the stockholders $119,000,000. He has also an electric monopoly in New York City with a capital of $25,000,000.

The trusts controlled by the Rockefellers are as follows:

Standard Oil	$97,250,000
Federal trusts	98,000,000
Cotton oil	30,435,700
Sugar refining	75,936,000
American tobacco	35,534,000
Copper	50,000,000
Glucose	37,085,900
Consolidated gas	36,230,000
Total	458,461,700

Meanwhile such men are constantly evading taxes, and thus doubly plunder the public. [Applause.]

With the opportunity for making millions without risk and with but small investment of capital, it is not surprising that when a political party came into power which allowed this wholesale system of robbery trusts should spring up as plentiful as blackberries in July. The first effect of these trusts is to create what appears to be prosperity. The owners of the mills and the stockholders have received cash for their holdings, and that cash is put into circulation. The people generally have money. At such times gilt-edged paper can be placed in the money centers at a small per cent. Profitable investment can not be found for money; it lies idle in the vaults. When the lines of business are well in the hands of the trusts and the individual competitors are driven from the fields of commerce and industry the reaction will come.

There will be no effort to increase trade, but all the effort will be directed toward keeping down the supply to the lowest possible point of consumption in order to secure the highest prices. A large proportion of the laboring men will be out of employment and its baneful effects do not stop with the labor class. When the avenues of individual efforts are closed and business is placed in the hands of corporations, a man with small capital can find no investment. Prices will range higher than now and the wage-earner's dollar will have less purchasing power. The man who sells his interest in a mill can no longer find profitable employment either for himself or his capital. When this condition is complete, the history of other nations teach us that the people of the country become dissatisfied and will rise in revolt.

The recent issue of the national-bank statement by the Comptroller of the Currency shows that between May 5, 1898, and April 5, 1899, there was an increase in individual deposits lying idle in the national banks of this country of $437,914,981.33. This is a large per cent of the entire circulating medium, including all forms of money. Thus a large per cent of the money lies idle in the banks because there is no longer any avenues for individual investment. The New York Journal makes the total capitalization of all the trusts in the country, May 27, $7,416,235,799. The capital invested in these combines increased more than 75 per cent in a little more than a month. It is more than any national debt in the world. It is seven times the bonded debt of the United States. It is $500 for every family in the country; $100 for every man, woman, and child in the land. The menace in these figures almost terrifies. There can be no evading the alternative before the people; either they must crush or be crushed.

Had the $5,000,000,000 for which trusts have been capitalized during the past eighteen months been applied to the opening of new mines and the erection of new mills we would now be enjoying the greatest era of prosperity in all history, for the reason that never before have the conditions in foreign countries been so favorable for the extension of American trade. While the returns of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department show an increase of about 20 per cent in the gross exports of manufactured articles, yet when these exports are analyzed, and those deducted which have been caused solely by the war with Spain, it is found there has been, in fact, an actual decrease in the export of manufactured products.

This is a condition of affairs which every man, no matter what may have been his past political affiliations, should exert his utmost efforts to remedy. It is a serious charge to make against any political party that it has opened the doors to this system of wholesale plundering. The Republican party seeks to repudiate the charge that it has fostered or encouraged these aggregations of pelf, but the facts of history point so conclusively to it as the creator of this condition that no sensible man can doubt that the leaders are chargeable with direct knowledge if not actual participation therein. In 1868 there were but three trusts formed. In 1889 but five. These created such a protest that Congress passed the anti-trust law. Within one year after the McKinley tariff law there were put into operation 34 new trusts. During the first year of the Wilson tariff law there were but four. When the Dingley bill became a law trusts immediately became the rage, and over 200 have been put in operation.

By this act you retire the greenbacks and place the national bank above the Government itself, by charging it with furnishing the currency of the country. Add to this the terrible crime and folly of granting the national banks the right to restrict the currency and bring about hard times and panics at their will, and you will thereby complete the most wonderful blunder of the age, for which the wrath of a long-suffering people will finally overtake you. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In connection with what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] has so well and so eloquently said regarding the power and the sway of the trusts I concur and entirely agree, and I desire at this time to say a few words concerning trusts in this country.

On the 12th, 13th, and 14th of this month there was held in Chicago an anti-trust conference. At that conference there were representatives from almost every State and Territory in the Union. There were over 1,000 delegates to that conference. It was one of the most representative bodies of men and women that ever assembled in this country, and the work it did for the common weal and against the trusts will have a beneficial effect all over this country. The anti-trust conference was a great success.

There is no doubt that the trusts to-day are doing irreparable injury to the consumers, the toilers, and the taxpayers of the country. No one will dispute that proposition. I believe and I charge that the Administration is responsible for the sway, the growth, and the power of the trusts. If the Attorney-General would enforce the law now on the statute books, in my judgment every trust could be dissolved; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the spokesman of the Administration, took that position at the beginning of this session and stated on the floor of this House that the enforcement of the law would crush the trusts. The McKinley Administration is responsible for the trusts. It is owned and controlled by the trusts; it stands sponsor for them, and refuses to do anything to curb their enormous power and their centralization and absorption of wealth.

The greatest trust, however, of all the trusts is the money trust, and the present currency bill which you are about to pass will create the greatest money monopoly and the greatest financial trust the world has ever seen. Its possibilities for plunder are unlimited. This conference at Chicago condemned that gold standard currency bill; this anti-trust conference at Chicago, composed of representatives of the Republican party, of the Democratic party, of the Populist party, and of every political party in the country, unanimously condemned that Republican iniquity, the gold standard currency bill, which intends to turn over to the national banks the money of the people, and creates the greatest national-bank trust the world has ever known. A committee was appointed to bear this protest to Washington and present it to this House.

I now send to the Clerk's desk the protest unanimously adopted against this outrageous bill, and ask the Clerk to read it as part of my remarks. I want it placed on record before the bill is finally passed and sent to the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., February 15, 1900.

By authority of the resolution hereunto appended, I, M. L. Lockwood, chairman of the National Anti-Trust League, hereby appoint W. B. Fleming, WILLIAM SULZER, George Fred Williams, Mrs. Helen Gougar, F. R. Ridgeley, Willis J. Abbott, T. Carl Spelling, William Prentiss, J. B. Weaver, J. R. Sovereign, W. H. Harvey, J. B. Romans, J. W. Wilson, JOHN J. LENTZ, M. C. Wetmore, and C. A. Towne as said committee.

Witness my hand.

M. L. LOCKWOOD, President.

FRANKLIN H. WENTWORTH, Secretary.

Resolution unanimously passed by the anti-trust conference held at Chicago February 12, 13, and 14, 1900.

Whereas there has been passed by the House of Representatives a bill commonly known as the "currency bill," which is now pending in the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas it is proposed by said bill to further extend special and exclusive privileges to favored classes; and

Whereas said bill, if enacted into law, would surrender to the national banks the governmental function of issuing the currency; second, bestow an immense bonus upon the bondholders; third, give a bounty of many hundreds of millions of dollars to the national banks, convert standard silver dollars into mere credit money, and throw all forms of currency upon the Treasury for redemption in gold; fourth, make all debts now existing or hereafter contracted payable in gold; fifth, place in the hands of the banks the power to contract and expand the currency at will; sixth, in short, we believe the measure is calculated to establish a centralized money oligarchy, establish a powerful banking trust which will have the power to practically enslave the people, and in the end destroy the Republic: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this nonpartisan anti-trust conference, assembled in Chicago and consisting of representatives from 32 States and Territories, hereby utters its most solemn protest against the passage of this measure; and be it further

Resolved, That the chairman of this conference is hereby instructed to appoint a committee of seven or more members of this body, whose duty it shall be to immediately visit Washington for the purpose of laying this protest before the members of both Houses of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That we warn the people of the United States against this menace to their liberties and call upon them everywhere to come together and record their emphatic protests against all such legislation.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the committee duly came to Washington and instructed me to present to this House that protest. I concur in every word it contains. I know you laugh and sneer at it now, but it will bear fruit. I know it will not deter you from passing that outrageous bill for the national banks, but I believe in the end this mighty protest will be heard, and in the avalanche to come the cruel gold-currency bill you will soon enact will be swept from the statute books.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended. This is an important matter, and I want to be heard. I will be as brief as I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that at the time this resolution was unanimously adopted in the anti-trust conference over a thousand delegates from all over the Union were present, and the chairman of the conference was a distinguished son of Ohio, a Republican, former attorney-general, Frank S. Monett. He was turned down by the leader of the Republican party, MARK HANNA, at the last Republican State convention in Ohio, over which, I believe, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] presided, because he had the courage of his convictions; because he dared, as an honest, as a faithful, and as an upright attorney-general of the State of Ohio, to do his duty, and began an action against the Standard Oil trust for violating the law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] about the anti-trust law. I think myself it is a fairly good law; but I differ with the gentleman from Ohio in regard to its enforcement. He says it is a good law; but apparently he does not believe in its enforcement. I want it enforced against every trust in the land.

In my opinion, if your Republican Attorney-General was brave enough to enforce that law, there would not be a trust in the country to-day; and if you had not turned down your honest and faithful attorney-general in Ohio, the Standard Oil trust, the greatest monopoly to-day in all the land, would be out of business and not paying 20 per cent dividends every three months on $100,000,000 capitalization. Twenty millions of dollars dividends every quarter of a year on its capital stock, and every dollar taken from the poor people of this country. Only the other day, not satisfied with receiving a profit of $80,000,000 every year on a capitalization of $100,000,000, and most of that water, the Standard Oil trust raised the price of oil 1 cent a gallon.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Three cents a gallon.

Mr. SULZER. Yes, 3 cents a gallon within a short time, but 1 cent a gallon a few days ago. That means an additional profit to the Standard Oil trust of over $10,000,000 a year, and the Republican party stands sponsor for it. [Applause.]

The law on the statute books against trusts is clear and plain, and the highest court in the land has passed on its validity and sustained the constitutionality of its provisions. The anti-trust act of 1890 declares that every contract or combination in the nature of a trust in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States and Territories or with foreign nations is a conspiracy, illegal and void, and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Under the law of our country trusts are criminal, and there is no distinction between a so-called good trust and a so-called bad trust, between a big trust and a little trust. Every trust is contrary to both the spirit and the letter of the law. To seriously contend otherwise as a legal proposition would be preposterous. If we did so, by analogy we might as consistently assert that there were good pirates and bad pirates. If robbery is criminal, it is immaterial, so far as the crime is concerned, whether the robbery is a big one or a little one. The violation of law is the same.

Under this anti-trust act it seems to me every trust in the United States can be prosecuted for violation of law, the charter annulled, and the men behind it punished for conspiracy. Every trust by its very nature is in restraint of trade and commerce and in violation of this law.

If you will read the anti-trust act of 1890 and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the trans-Missouri freight case and the Addyston Pipe Line case, the conclusion will be irresistible to the logical mind that the fault is not so much with the law as it is with the men who are sworn to enforce the law. The law so far as it goes is all right—the do-nothing Attorney-General is all wrong. The imperative mandate of the day is "Enforce the law, and every trust in the country will dissolve." Whenever the trusts have been brought before the courts, and their true character shown, they have been declared illegal.

In my opinion—and I say so advisedly—the Department of Justice under the present law can institute and successfully maintain actions against every trust doing business in the United States. The law is clear and plain, and the facts are within the knowledge of all and too obvious for controversy.

I am unalterably opposed to all trusts, especially the money trust, and I solemnly warn the American people against the money monopoly and the national-bank trust—the greatest of them all—created by this Republican currency bill.

The money monopoly and the national-bank trust menace our Republic to-day. Jackson waged the most bitter and relentless war of his life against the United States Bank and finally destroyed that gigantic monopoly. If he had not, it would have destroyed the Republic. One of the greatest acts of his life was the veto of the bill extending the charter of that bank trust. In the light of what is going on to-day, that veto message should be read by every citizen in our land. The bill now pending in Congress gives to the national banks of the country far greater powers and privileges than were ever enjoyed by the United States Bank. It is a Republican bill, and the Republican party stands sponsor for it and is committed to its passage.

When it becomes a law it will give the monopoly of issuing money to the national banks, and hence the right to expand or contract the currency of the people whenever it suits their convenience. No corporation should have this power to make or destroy. It would deprive the Government of one of its greatest attributes of sovereignty and give to the national banks the right to paralyze, at their own will, every industry in the country. It is the most daring attempt the banks have ever made by law to seize one of the greatest weapons for good or evil known to civilized man. For the Government to surrender this prerogative and delegate away this power is a crime against every citizen in this land and will work woe and misery to millions yet unborn.

I am opposed to the Government delegating away its powers to the national banks. We should vigorously oppose conferring any additional powers on or granting any greater privileges to the national banks. In my judgment they already possess entirely too much power. They are doing precisely to-day, only to a greater extent, what the United States Bank did in the days of Andrew Jackson. The right to coin and issue money is one of the greatest prerogatives of the Republic and one of the highest attributes of its sovereignty. It should not be transferred, assigned, or set over to any national bank, to any trust, or to any monopoly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to welcome this opportunity to place on record the unanimous protest against the Republican currency bill of one of the largest representative, nonpartisan gatherings ever held in this country, and I say to you, pass your bank-currency bill, establish your money monopoly—your bank trust—turn the money of the people over to the national banks, to expand or contract the currency at their will, to make times good or to make times bad, and you will hear from the people on election day; you will hear from them in the coming campaign as they march to the polls to vote for that fearless and intrepid champion of the masses, that pure and irreproachable patriot, that stalwart and gallant leader of the people, William J. Bryan. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I am not a candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States [laughter], and if I were I should have no opposition for that office in my own delegation. Therefore I am not excited about this trust question; but I want to point out now the sort of absurd statements that are being made by men claiming to be members of Congress and being intelligent citizens of the country.

Now, in the first place, I did talk in the beginning of this Congress a few words about the Sherman anti-trust law, and now comes the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and says that the attorney-general of Ohio undertook to enforce the Sherman anti-trust law and war was made on the attorney-general. I pause for the House to absorb the enormous ignorance involved in that statement. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] The Sherman anti-trust law is a law of Congress, to be enforced against violators of the interstate commerce under the provisions of that act, and to be enforced by district attorneys in the United States courts, and not by the attorneys-general of States, and my friend here who goes hippodroming over the country comes back loaded with such nonsense as that. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, next. The Republican legislature of the State of Ohio passed what is known as the Valentine anti-trust law, applicable to the operations of trusts in the State of Ohio. Mr. Monett, as he had a right to do, as it was his duty to do, brought suits under that law in the supreme court of Ohio, and the first step toward adjudication was raised by a demurrer to the petition, raising the question of the constitutionality of the law. It was argued on one side by Mr. Virgil Kline, of Cleveland, and Mr. Neal, of my own Congressional district, both eminent lawyers, and on the other side by the attorney-general and by his assistant; and the supreme court decided by a unanimous opinion upholding the constitutionality of the law, and decreeing its enforcement against the violators of it in the State of Ohio.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman, who is a distinguished Republican from the State of Ohio, why you did not renominate Mr. Monett as attorney-general?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman will find that he has got his foot into that worse than he did in the other. [Laughter.] Mr. Monett has been twice elected attorney-general of Ohio, and there is an unwritten law in the politics of Ohio that, with only one or two exceptions since the formation of the Republican party, has been enforced without any sort of objection, that no man shall be elected to one of these offices more than twice. I never knew an attorney-general of that State to be three times elected. Possibly it has been done, but I think not. I was in the convention; I was not a member, not even a delegate; I was not chairman of it, but I sat and listened and saw the whole of it. Mr. Monett was not a candidate. Think of that! And now the gentleman comes back from Chicago loaded with that sort of stuff. Mr. Monett distinctly refused to announce his name as a candidate, and he received a very few votes in the convention which were given by somebody as a sort of a compliment to a bright, intelligent, capable young man. There were six or eight candidates for the place.

Now, let me summarize and see how much we get out of one of these passionate harangues.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, let us summarize it. The Sherman anti-trust law was passed by a Republican Congress, signed by a Republican President, lay absolutely dead on the statute book during the term of the only full-fledged Democratic Administration we have had in thirty-odd years. The very moment this Republican Administration came in it was put into active motion, and under the instrumentality of the courts of the country the trans-Missouri combination was broken up, the traffic association in New York was broken up, and the court has made a decision that holds that this very law, this Sherman anti-trust law, applies to the manufacture and sale of every commodity that is manufactured in the United States for interstate commerce by a trust. Now, what does the gentleman propose to add to that?

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. What part did the Attorney-General take in the prosecution of these anti-trust cases?

Mr. GROSVENOR. He argued them in the Supreme Court of the United States. It is true, my friend, that the oral argument was presented by the gentleman from Ohio, John K. Richards, the Solicitor-General, a most able lawyer and ex-attorney-general of Ohio, but it is equally true that the Attorney-General, whom you are constantly shouting at, was instrumental in pushing that prosecution just as much as the law of the country requires him to. How often has the Attorney-General gone into the Supreme Court and argued orally? Very seldom; almost never. There is no one of the prosecutions that can be carried on without the approval and direction of the Attorney-General of the United States.

While I have no particular interest in this question, and the gentleman can attack his own citizen, if he sees fit—I do not say that he has—but I have this to say about Attorney-General Griggs: A better lawyer, a clearer-headed administrator of justice, never lived in the United States than John W. Griggs, and no man can put his finger on the time or place where he has hesitated to push forward, under the proper subordinates of his office, every one of these prosecutions. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, this is not a case of the soldiers from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] So it comes about that every law on the statute book against trusts was put there by Republicans, every prosecution begun by a Republican officer, every prosecution that was ended was ended in favor of the Government, and yet the gentleman goes to Chicago and comes back loaded with that sort of stuff.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that all the trusts have increased immensely during the last three years of Republican administration?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The trusts and soup houses never prosper together. [Laughter.] You will never while you live see anything prosper but poverty under Democratic administration.

Now, so much for the national part of this question. Now, I ask, how many States of this Union have anti-trust laws that are not in the hands of the Republicans?

Mr. LACEY. And is it not true that the Democratic legislature of Ohio elected Mr. Payne, of the Standard Oil Company, a Senator from that State?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes; but we do not charge them anything for that. They do not know yet how it was done. [Laughter.]

Now, then, about MARK HANNA having defeated Mr. Monett. MARK HANNA had no more to do with the nomination or non-nomination of Mr. Monett than any gentleman on the other side of the House had. He was not a delegate to the convention; he had no interest whatever in the question of the attorney-generalship. There were half a dozen able lawyers named for the place, and one of the best of them was nominated. This same attorney-general is to-day pushing forward under the Valentine act all the prosecutions that were begun under the administration of his predecessor. The New York anti-trust law, the Ohio law, the Illinois law, all the laws of that character that I know anything about in the United States, outside of Texas, are laws which were passed in Republican States by Republican legislatures, while the Democrats were crying——

A MEMBER. There were other States besides those which the gentleman has named.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, there may be others.

Mr. COWHERD. Missouri, for instance.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; Missouri had one of the earliest of such laws. I admit it.

Now, the matter comes right down to this: All the States of the Union where business activity has been felt and where the evils of these trusts have become manifest have joined together and passed these anti-trust laws.

Now, let me tell the gentleman something: The man who in the campaign of 1900 undertakes to run for Vice-President or anything else upon an outcry about the trusts—howling in the ears of the American people upon that subject—does not know what the American people are made of. The American people, Mr. Chairman, understand one thing, and there can be no dispute about it; they understand that for four years—from 1892 to 1896—business broke down; they starved; everything went to destruction and disaster all over this country. [Laughter and applause.] And they know that it was not twenty-four hours after the election of 1896 before business began to revive. And they will stand by the party that stood by them.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a brief time to reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Perhaps the country will accept the apology of the spokesman of the Administration for the failure of the Republican party in Ohio to renominate Attorney-General Frank S. Monett, but I doubt it. I am glad, however, to hear the spokesman of the Administration now say to the country that Frank S. Monett was an honest, a faithful, and a capable attorney-general; that he was doing his whole duty and bravely enforcing the law against the trusts.

And I desire also to say in this connection that so long as he was such a good man, such an honest official, and such a good Republican—so long as he was doing his duty so honestly, so faithfully, and so conscientiously enforcing the law against the trusts, it seems to me that the old precedent in Ohio referred to should have been turned down instead of Mr. Monett. I ask my friend to think this over carefully. It would have been better, in my opinion, for the people of Ohio and for the people of the country generally if an exception had been made in this case. The Republican party should have renominated Mr. Monett if it honestly was opposed to the Standard Oil trust and wanted the law enforced.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SULZER. I have the floor, and I can not yield now. Perhaps, too, the country will accept the apology of the gentleman from Ohio in regard to the trusts, and MARK HANNA, the leader of the Republican party, the man who absolutely dominates it to-day, the man who believes in brute force, the man who does not believe in reason and persuasion, the man who believes that the American people ought to be driven hither and thither, the man who believes that all he has to do as the master is to snap the party whip and the Republicans from one end of the land to the other will march in serried ranks to the polls and vote as he dictates. But I doubt it.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says I do not understand the American people. I think I do; I believe he does not. I know the great American heart. I believe I understand the nobler impulses of the great civilization on this hemisphere. I think I know the sentiment of the American people; I think I know what they are thinking about; I think I do know how they feel in reference to the imperial march of the Republicans under the leadership of MARK HANNA; I think I know how they feel as they witness your actions here—overriding the Constitution, trampling under foot the Declaration of Independence, and turning to the wall the picture of the great emancipator; and I prophesy now that the people of this country will never submit to the brutal dictation of either the gentleman from Ohio or his royalmaster—MARK HANNA. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe in the people, and I trust the people. Can you say that?

The protest which I offer to-day and which has just been read, coming from the source it does, coming from a large representative nonpartisan body, coming, I say, from as great a gathering of thinkers as ever assembled in this country, will have its effect. It will not stay your mad course in turning the money of the people over to the national banks and allowing them to create the greatest trust in all the world—a gigantic money trust. It will not stop you from enacting that bill into law, because you were sold to do it, sold body and soul to do that very thing by MARK HANNA, your imperial master in the campaign of 1896. He is simply keeping his promise now, and delivering the goods to the national bankers. You are the tools, the agents if you will, to register his decrees and do as he bids. What a spectacle of representative government!

Mr. Chairman, in 1896 MARK HANNA marched down Wall street, his hands stretched out like this [illustrating], collecting money from the Wall street bankers for the McKinley campaign. What a sight that was for honest people to witness. It marked a red-letter day in the history of the Republican party, the party of plutocracy.

He marched down Wall street, from Trinity Church to the Ferry, and every national banker bid him welcome, and every national banker gave most freely and most bountifully to the Republican campaign fund—the largest by millions ever raised—to thwart the will of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. SHATTUC. Not unless he will answer a question.

Mr. SULZER. I will answer the gentleman's question. What is it?

Mr. SHATTUC. What business is it to you what we do in Ohio?

Mr. SULZER. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. SHATTUC. Let him catch his breath, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. There is an old saying that those who laugh last laugh best. The gentleman from Ohio asks what business it is to me what they do in Ohio. That question does the gentleman's intelligence justice. It should be remembered. I will tell him what concern I have. I want to see the imperial march of the Ohio syndicate checked and its corrupting influence crushed forever. I want to see a Democratic Representative returned in your place from Ohio next fall.

I want to see a man who laughs and sneers at the people like you beaten, because in a Government like this you deserve to be beaten. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I want to see Ohio cast its electoral vote for the Democratic nominee for President, because I believe it will be for the best interests of all the people, and if I can judge the future by the past, and if the last election is any criterion, it will be done, and you make no mistake, Mr. Interrupter, you will not be here in the next Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, sir, I want to say that the money MARK HANNA collected in Wall street in the campaign of 1896 was used to carry the country for the Republican party, and he to-day snaps the party whip over you and makes you vote for this iniquitous Republican currency bill to make good his promises in Wall street. He knows he could not pass the bill through this House unless he made you walk into a caucus and be bound by the caucus. Many of you hate to vote for the bill, but you dare not bolt the caucus of your party for fear of the vengeance of HANNA.

Mr. SHATTUC. He gets enough on your side to make up what we lose on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. SHATTUC. How many have you got on your side that voted for the bill?

Mr. SULZER. You did not dare; you could not pass that iniquitous currency bill without making it a caucus matter. MARK HANNA whipped you Representatives into the caucus, and then whipped into line the men who had the courage to protest against its iniquitous features.

Mr. SHATTUC. The majority of your own New York delegation voted for it.

Mr. SULZER. You are mistaken. That is not so. You keep your own household clean. There are many Representatives on that side of the House who did not want to vote for the bill. It was an affront, and made them stultify their records in this House and their promises to their constituents.

A MEMBER (on the Republican side). Name them.

Mr. SULZER. They rebelled at first. They went to the President, begging and imploring him to save them, and bending the pregnant hinges of the knee. They appealed to the President not to pass the bill. They went to MARK HANNA and begged him not to pass the bill, but MARK HANNA, in effect, no doubt, told you, "We must keep our contract with the national bankers, and if we do not keep our contract with the national bankers and give the national bankers what I agreed to—the right to control the money of the people—they will not put up in 1900 as they put up in 1896." That is practically what MARK HANNA said. That is the reason this bill must pass ere this campaign begins.

Mr. SHATTUC. Whom did he say that to?

Mr. SULZER. And I imagine he said to you, "Without boodle, without the necessary wherewithal and plenty of it, we can not carry the country in 1900 any more than we could have done it in 1896."

Mr. SHATTUC. Which Congressman did he say that to?

Mr. SULZER. Now, that is the whole story, that is the secret for the passage of this gold standard currency bill, and I want you and others to read the protest I offered a little while ago carefully to-morrow. You have laughed at that protest. You have mocked the people in their misery, but the people will yet rise up and mock you. Louis XIV said——

Mr. SHATTUC. Who was Louis XIV?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is not in order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised at the gentleman's ignorance. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Louis XIV mocked the people; he laughed at them and scorned them as they begged and cringed. "The State!" said the King, "I am the State." But before the grass was green on his grave the same people rose up against long-continued wrong and usurpation and said: "The State! Nay, Sire, we are the State." They drew aside the royal curtain, and all the world saw the head of a King roll in the basket.

You laugh now; you scoff at petition, and you mock the people in their woe and their misery; but let me say to you, the time is not far distant when they will rise up and you will have to render an account of your stewardship. The Republican party, intoxicated with its power, puffed up with its royal swagger, and mad with its imperialistic sway, impudently spurns the people, and arrogantly declares: "The State! The Republican party is the State."

But in the coming fall the people will rise up against Republican wrongs and Republican usurpations, and in thunder tones declare, "The State! Nay, Mr. HANNA, we are the State." They will draw aside the imperial curtain of Republican corruption, and all the world will witness the triumphant election of a Democratic President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to rise for a moment to ask if the object that is near to the heart of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and of us all has not received sufficient attention, perhaps, for one day, so that we might progress with our bill?

Mr. SULZER. I am glad the gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. CANNON. I am not exactly on all fours with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I must confess to more sympathy than he has with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER]. Perhaps the gentleman from Ohio is not informed about the operation of a great trust. I am in it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], who last addressed the House, is in it. He is trying to get all that side of the House in it, and I am trying to get all this side of the House in it, because it is absolutely patent that it would be a great combination.

Here is the gentleman from New York, who was created to look like the great commoner, Mr. Clay. The great commoner from Kentucky, dead and gone, has been reincarnated, so that we have my friend from New York as a foundation to go upon the ticket, to save the country, to save the party, to save the world. He comes, you know, from Tammany, and Tammany made him, and he jumps when Tammany pulls the string, and he has a tolerably hard road to travel. He has wicked Democratic colleagues from New York who were created by Tammany who did not vote with him on the "infernal, outrageous, evil-begotten, damnable" bill [laughter], and they have handicapped him, in part, because, while he jumps when Tammany pulls the string and takes much for granted in getting upon this national ticket with Mr. Bryan, he is handicapped by these gentlemen, and it is necessary for him to talk two or three times here and to go to Chicago to convince you gentlemen who are not in harmony with this wicked bill that he is not to blame for what his colleagues from New York City did, and it was necessary for him to go to Ohio, that is in the trust, to talk about trusts.

Why, this is the one trust—the nomination on the ticket with Bryan—perhaps, that ought not to come under the Sherman law or under the New York law. It is a great trust. It assembles here in the House, it runs over to New York, it journeys about with Bryan, it goes out to Chicago with Altgeld and Weaver and Mrs. Gougar, and they resolute, you know, and he bears the resolutions down and has read them to the House. Well, now, that is necessary, because he ought to go on the ticket. I am for him on the ticket. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] He and I have agreed about it. We are working to the same end, and I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] never again to interrupt the operation of this agreement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I promise that I never will. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] having made great progress and having got into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the sayings of that wise, nonpartisan body that met at Chicago, headed by Altgeld, Weaver, and Mrs. Gougar, and where my friend shone across the continent and the seas like a beacon in the storm, battling for the rights of humanity and of all the people and the rest of mankind, I think we have done enough for one day, and next Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will stand by the gentleman from New York in a demand for an hour and will hold up his arms in carrying out our agreement. But I think now it would not be apt to go on much longer to-day, because we had better do a little public business to fool the people. [Prolonged laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a word. I am not responsible for anyone on the floor of this House but myself. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may laugh at the protest of the people, and his colleagues may spurn it with contempt, but that protest will be heard when many of the gentlemen on that side of the House are retired to private life and meditating on the power of the people.

The Clerk read as follows:

For an additional force of 150 special examiners for one year, at a salary of $1,200 each, $165,000, and no person so appointed shall be employed in the State from which he is appointed; and any of those now employed in the Pension Office or as special examiners may be reappointed if they be found to be qualified.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose that the delightful witticism of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I raise the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment pending. I want to serve notice now that we must transact the public business. We must read this bill, and so much time has been occupied that it will take almost the balance of the day to read it. I hope gentlemen will not insist upon further general discussion. We have had two days of general discussion, and nearly all of yesterday was taken by general discussion, and the bill must be read and passed.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I think the gentleman could well have afforded to withhold until at least a commentary had been made upon the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. GAINES. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order, or insist on it regularly and enforce it.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GAINES. To complain of the unfair administration of the rules of this House by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. The gentleman raises the point of order against general debate when a gentleman on this side of the House rises to address the House——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order.

Mr. GAINES (continuing). And when a Republican rises he does not object, but permits general debate. That is the point I make.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee at that time had no right to make any point, because the gentleman from Tennessee had not the floor for any purpose.

Mr. GAINES. It is the unfair administration of the rules that I protest against; the maladministration of even a bad rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order, and will take his seat.

Mr. GAINES. "The gentleman from Tennessee" will take his seat, but I do not propose that this side of the House shall be run over by anybody by an unfair administration of the rules of this House without a protest.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am at a loss to understand how the gentleman so speedily arrived at the conclusion that my remarks were out of order. I certainly had not uttered ten words when he made the interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana made his suggestion rather as a warning than otherwise.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I may take it that the ruling of the Chair was also a warning. I supposed that would have to be based upon something said by me.

The CHAIRMAN. It certainly would. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will say frankly that my purpose was to devote five minutes to some comments upon the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. TERRY. Why did you not make that point of order when your side was up?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It was a manifestation of that customary discretion of the person in charge of the bill to act as a rear guard to the wits of the Republican side of the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman certainly can not charge that I have been unfair, as his side of the House has done most of the talking.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I noticed on yesterday that the gentleman served notice that he would make the point of order, but he did not make it when the gentleman from Illinois was addressing the committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I wanted the other side to have their share.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveyor-general of Nevada, $1,800; and for the clerks in his office, $1,500; in all, $3,300.

For rent of office for the surveyor-general, pay of messenger, fuel, stationery, post-office box rent, draftsmen's requisites, fuel, binding records, and other incidental expenses, $500.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 25, page 106, and line 1, page 107, by striking out "one thousand eight hundred" and inserting "two thousand;" in line 2, page 107, by striking out "three hundred" and inserting "five hundred;" in lines 6 and 7, page 107, by striking out "five" and inserting "seven."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would like the gentleman to state in what respect it changes existing law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It increases the salary; it increases the amount provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Nevada, is there any statute other than an appropriation bill which provides this salary?

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is a statute—section 2210 of the Revised Statutes—which fixes the salary of the surveyor-general of the State of Nevada at $3,000. Since that time, by various acts of Congress, in appropriation bills only, the salary was reduced in 1880—or, rather, not reduced—but the appropriation was made in 1880 for only $2,500. In 1886 the appropriation was made for $1,800 only. There is authority of law for a salary of $3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. On the statement of the gentleman from Nevada, the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This salary has been appropriated for at this amount ever since 1876. I want to call attention to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Nevada does not propose to make it the statutory amount. He proposes to raise the amount appropriated for this office.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is within the statutory limit.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And inasmuch as it does not raise it to the statutory limit I think it is certainly a change of existing law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the law, this officer will be entitled to $3,000, upon the statement of the gentleman from Nevada that the Revised Statutes provides that salary; and it seems to me——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman is correct the amendment is in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suggest to my friend that he had better compromise at $2,000, because the point of order is made by him and it will result in the salary being raised to the statutory amount.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We decline to compromise, for the reason that when Mr. Randall was at the head of the Appropriations Committee in 1876 this salary was decreased to this amount. It is a sufficient amount for the services performed, and I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was decreased only by the appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has before him section 2210 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that "the surveyors-general of Colorado, New Mexico, California, Idaho, Nevada, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, and Arizona shall each receive a salary at the rate of $3,000 a year." That being so, the fact that in subsequent appropriation bills less than that sum was appropriated does not change the statute, and so far as it relates to Nevada the point of order is overruled.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The other portion of the amendment which I offered is in relation to the office rent and incidental expenses. I ask to have that raised to $700.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Nevada that he divide his amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will do so.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest that the point of order is made to the whole amendment, and ought to be sustained.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will withdraw my amendment as offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada can modify his amendment, which he now does.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the first amendment read by the Clerk. Section 2210 of the Revised Statutes provides that the salary of these officers shall be $3,000 per annum, and to that amount the surveyor-general is clearly entitled by law. There is but one lawful way to reduce that salary, and that is to introduce a special act reducing the salary from $3,000 to $1,800. In the place of that, the Committee on Appropriations, arrogating to itself all the powers of legislation in this body, has sought to greatly reduce this salary and thus to set itself in plain opposition to the will of Congress as expressed in the act which created this office and authorized this salary. I do not ask for an increase to the amount authorized by law, simply because the surveyor-general of that State has not requested it. He does ask, however, that the salary of that office be increased to the amount now allowed to every surveyor-general in that region by the various appropriation acts that have been passed, namely, $2,000.

The Committee on Appropriations, in reducing these salaries authorized by law throughout the mountain region, have reduced the salaries of the surveyors-general in Montana, New Mexico,

North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, and Colorado to $2,000, and the State of Nevada presents the only exception, and there the salary is fixed at $1,800. I will say in this connection that the appropriation for the State of Nevada for the general service is exceedingly small. The total appropriation provided by this act for Montana is $14,000; New Mexico, $13,000; North Dakota, $9,000; Arizona, $10,000; South Dakota, $8,500; Utah, $9,200; Washington, $12,800; Wyoming, $9,300, these appropriations covering salaries and office expenses. The total appropriation for the State of Nevada is only $3,800. Now, every gentleman knows how vast the area is within the borders of that State. Just now there is a revival of interest in the State of Nevada, and there is probably more prospecting in that State than there has been for twenty years. The surveyor-general of that State writes me that there are more inquiries for public land than there have been for years, and the sum total in the two amendments I ask amounts to only $400 additional appropriation—$200 for the surveyor-general's salary and $200 for the office expenses.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be defeated. The State of Nevada has very little use for this official at all. It is a well-known fact that the population of that State has been decreasing for years, although it is probably at a standstill now. We have this condition, that the amount appropriated in the last bill for the fiscal year 1900 for the mints and for the land office out there amounts to $3 a head for every voter in the State. Think of it, you gentlemen who come from other States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The mint is not under consideration here.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now they seek to increase the salary and increase the office expenses to the extent of $400 in a State where there can be but very little business, and where there is but very little business.

We have this remarkable condition, that for every voter in the State we appropriated on the bills last year $3. And yet the gentleman comes in here and wants to increase this salary for some gentleman who occupies the position out there and who has been performing virtually no service for years and years. These officers at the mints and other public officers in the State of Nevada have been drawing salaries for years without performing hardly any service. We struck out the appropriation in the House for the mint at Carson City a number of times, but for some reason, on the Senate side, these appropriations are put back again, and I appeal to the House to vote down this amendment, because it is wrong. They certainly ought to be satisfied with the salary they are now receiving, and which they have been receiving since 1876, when the Appropriations Committee, under the lead of Samuel Randall, cut down the salaries, this among others. It is useless for me to stand up here and talk, for I have no doubt that the vote on this amendment will be almost unanimous against it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, it would have been more in accordance with good taste and good judgment on the part of the gentleman from Indiana had he confined his remarks to the appropriation now under consideration. I accept his challenge, however, and follow him in the line of debate regarding the total appropriations for that State.

It is true that the population of Nevada is small. It is true that the largest community there now is only five or six thousand people, where there used to be two or three communities aggregating fifteen to twenty-five thousand people. It is true that the great industry on which the prosperity of that State depended has been destroyed by national legislation.

It is true that a mint was sustained there for years, and it is true that in the crucial period of the war over $600,000,000 of gold and silver came from Nevada, part of which was minted there, but the most of which was transported, in violation of the rights of that mint and that community, to the mint at Philadelphia to be there turned into coin. It is true that in every way the Appropriations Committee has sought to limit the appropriations for that State. It has sought to limit the employment of its people in industries belonging to the soil. It is true that silver now lying in the Philadelphia mint, which ought to have been coined in Nevada, has been taken for that purpose 3,000 miles away. It is true that that committee, by reducing the appropriations for the mint there from $45,000 to twelve or fifteen thousand dollars, has reduced it to a mere assay office.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If you should coin silver at Carson City, would you not have to bear the expense of shipping the bullion there and then sending the coined money away? And is not the cost $7 more on every thousand dollars coined?

Mr. NEWLANDS. What we complain of is that the bullion produced there was not left there. We claim that the millions of dollars' worth of bullion produced there ought to have been left there, and that those people ought to have been employed in minting the silver which was transferred to the Philadelphia mint.

The minting should have been done where the mining was done. It was a business belonging to that community which should not have been diverted to an institution 3,000 miles away.

The gentleman referred to the alleged large appropriations made in the past. He alludes to the time when we were appropriating for the mint at Carson. By the bill of last year they have reduced that mint, as I have said, to an assay office, and this year there is an appropriation of only $15,000 for that mint.

Now, I ask not only $200 additional salary for a gentleman who has had an insufficient office force and has by reason of that fact been compelled to do more than the other surveyors-general in adjoining States, but I ask also for $200 additional for the office force, to be expended in binding the records of that office, records which are now going to destruction and for the preservation of which the surveyor-general asked that an appropriation be made; and an estimate has been given by the Secretary of the Interior recommending this appropriation of $200.

Now, this State has a large area; the Government has extensive areas of public land there. Is it not to the interest of this Government to have that State settled? Is it not to the interest of the country to have its mines and public lands surveyed? Is it not to the interest of the United States to sustain this State, which has been kept down by the hand of legislation and which is now making an effort toward resuscitation? And will the House deny it the paltry sum of $400 in this work?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 55.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NEWLANDS and Mr. HEMENWAY were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the other amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 6 and 7, on page 107, strike out "five" and insert "seven," so as to read "$700."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order that this is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 2227 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

There shall be allowed for office rent, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses of the several offices of surveyors-general, such sums as may be appropriated for the purpose by Congress from year to year.

It seems to the Chair that this provision makes it possible to appropriate on this appropriation bill for the purposes named whatever sum Congress may see fit to appropriate. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order; and the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. One word in reference to this amendment. It proposes to increase from $500 to $700 the appropriation for office expenses in the office of the surveyor-general of Nevada, this extra sum of $200 being desired for binding certain records in that office.

I read in this connection a letter from Mr. Hitchcock, Secretary of the Interior, to Mr. CANNON, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, February 16, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to an item in the Book of Estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, on page 84 of said book, which item reads as follows: "Office of the surveyor-general of Nevada, for rent of office for surveyor-general, etc., $500." You will observe by the accompanying note to this item that this amount was intended to read $700, and I have the honor to recommend that the amount of $700 may be appropriated for this object in the legislative appropriation bill now under consideration by the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nevada.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 49, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office First Assistant Postmaster-General: For First Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,250; Superintendent of the Money-Order System, $3,000; chief clerk Money-Order System, $2,000; Superintendent of Free Delivery, $3,000; 4 assistant superintendents of free delivery, at $2,000 each; Superintendent of the Dead-Letter Office, $2,500; 1 clerk of class 4, who shall be chief clerk of the Dead-Letter Office; chief of the salary and allowance division, $3,000; assistant superintendent of the salary and allowance division, $2,000; superintendent of post-office supplies, $2,250; assistant superintendent of the division of post-office supplies, $1,800; 1 clerk of class 4, chief of the correspondence division; 10 clerks of class 4; 18 clerks of class 3; 20 clerks of class 2; 42 clerks of class 1; 45 clerks, at $1,000 each; 37 clerks, at $900 each; 8 assistant messengers; 25 laborers; 2 pages, at $360 each, and 5 female laborers, at $180 each; in all, $266,280.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment to this paragraph of the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out, on page 110, in lines 8, 9, and 10, the words "chief of the salary and allowance division, $3,000; assistant superintendent of the salary and allowance division" and insert in lieu thereof: "superintendent of salaries and allowances, $5,000; assistant superintendent of salaries and allowances."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture, including $1,500 for the office of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, $2,500.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 115, line 4, strike out the words "five hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons permanently incapacitated for performing such service.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after line 18 of section 4, the words of the amendment I send to the desk.

The amendment was read at length.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. BROMWELL. No; not new legislation. But I desire to offer an amendment which is germane to the section itself, and which should properly precede the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HITT. Then I will withhold my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his amendment for the present, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROMWELL. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "service," in line 18, page 124, the words: "For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this section the head of each of the Executive Departments of the Government is hereby directed to certify from time to time to the Civil Service Commission the names of all persons employed in his Department or any of the branches of the public service subordinate thereto permanently incapacitated from any cause from performing the public service in which they are engaged, and upon receipt of said certification the Civil Service Commission shall strike the names of such persons from the classified service."

Mr. BROMWELL. The object of this amendment is to perfect the law as it now stands. We have been informed during the progress of this bill that the heads of Departments have absolutely refused to conform to the law, and are carrying upon their rolls and that the public money is being paid to persons who are permanently incapacitated from performing public service. Now, the object of this provision is to direct the head of any Department in which any of these permanently incapacitated clerks or other employees are engaged to certify the fact of the permanent incapacity of those persons to the Civil Service Commission, in order that their names may be taken from the classified service.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 18, page 124, the following:
"SEC. 5——"

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call attention to the fact that the section has been amended, so that it should read "at the end of the section."

Mr. HITT. "At the end of the section." It makes a new section and becomes section 5."

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the section the following:
"SEC. 5. That permission is hereby granted to J. D. RICHARDSON to compile, edit, and publish, without expense to the Government, the state papers and diplomatic correspondence of the late Confederate States, and access to said papers and correspondence shall be given him for that purpose by the heads of the Executive Departments having such papers in charge, under such regulations as may be respectively prescribed by them."

Mr. HITT. The amendment explains itself. It is simply to facilitate this work which a member of the House is willing to undertake, one whom we know is amply qualified for the task, and it authorizes the officer in charge of these records, which are purely historical, to make them available for this purpose. The resolution provides that there shall be no expense to the Government.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Does this become a public document or a private publication?

Mr. HITT. It simply gives authority to the gentleman named——

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will it be a public document?

Mr. HITT. It will not necessarily. It will simply be what any of us could make if we chose to go there and prepare a historical work. If he will print it, we shall be glad to get it. If it is printed by Congress, we will get it gratuitously. If it is printed otherwise, we will get it as we can.

Mr. DE ARMOND. There ought to be something in the proposition, it seems to me, providing that this publication is not to preclude a similar publication by Congress, if Congress sees proper to undertake it. In other words, it ought not to be turned over to a private individual for individual use.

Mr. HITT. Authority now lies in all the Departments where records are to give access to documents as to scholars and students. This proposition or amendment is offered because I am told that the officer in charge of the records has said he would be glad to have such a resolution from Congress, to more emphatically enable him to put everything at the service of the investigating scholar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It would not prevent the Government doing it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Let us have a proposition to that effect, that this shall not be held in any way to interfere or hinder the Government in publishing the same thing as a public document.

Mr. HITT. I will accept that if the gentleman will put it in such form as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment if the gentleman from Missouri will state it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I can not very well do that without seeing the paper. My impression is that in cases where these documents belong to the Government, publication ought to be made by the Government as public documents for distribution among the people.

Now, I may say, incidentally to this, Mr. Chairman, that more or less of trouble has arisen with members of the House, over different parts of the country, consequent upon the turning over of the plates used in the publication of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, and there is more or less talk about whether the Government ought to publish that work again as a public document, to be distributed among the people, and the suggestion is made sometimes that there is difficulty in doing that, and that great expense will be incurred because the plates have been parted with. There is no disposition on my part to antagonize this, because I have no personal interest in the matter at all, but my own opinion is that generally these things should belong to the public, and where the public has to bear the expense of furnishing the copies they ought to be published by the Government for the public.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that this in no way contemplates that the Government shall make any expenditure whatever.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I understand that. What I am talking about is this proposition of whether the effect of this kind of legislation is not practically to place these things out in private hands, so that the Government, if it sees proper to publish them as a public document, will find itself somewhat hampered in several ways.

Mr. HITT. I foresaw the gentleman's point, and I agree with him in it. No authority is conferred by that proposition to allow any paper to be removed from the Government records in its proper place in the files. It is simply to give authority to the custodian of the records to grant access to them by this gentleman for historical purposes. This is done now in the Departments, giving any scholar who goes there access to them. It is responsive to a suggestion from General Ainsworth himself, as I am informed.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is preparing an amendment to the amendment. When it is prepared, the whole proposition will be reported.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not know that I care to offer any amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I will move to strike out the word "authority" and insert the word "permission."

Mr. HITT. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say a word, but I want to say, so far as the statement of the gentleman from Missouri is concerned, there is no sort of idea of preventing the Government from printing these documents ad libitum. They can print as many as they wish at any time. This authority contained in the amendment will simply allow me to go to the Department and get access to these documents and print them at my own expense and without a dollar's expense to the Government. That is all there is in this resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Pardon me just a moment. I suggest that the last section be changed to 6 instead of 5.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done, in accordance with the rule, without a motion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I have been away a couple of days on account of business, and I find that my name has been called into question by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] on a question of favoritism declared by the Administration in the case of certain banks given deposits, and in his efforts to fortify his side of the case he said that he had sent to each State treasurer in the United States and asked their custom in regard to the payment of interest on State deposits. I know nothing about the custom of other States, but in regard to the State of Connecticut I desire simply to explain——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am compelled to make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am replying to a statement made concerning me during my absence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman invokes the rule in opposition to the gentleman making a statement.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly to be put to the necessity of insisting upon the rule.

Mr. HILL. I will endeavor to get some other time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee rise and report the bill with amendments favorably to the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I had an understanding with the Chair that I was to be recognized to have a statement read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has just invoked the rule, which shuts off all gentlemen.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8347, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments and with a favorable recommendation.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. A separate vote is demanded on the amendment striking out the provision for the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments with the exception of that striking out the provision for the Civil Service Commission.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment striking out the provision for the civil service.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment read.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks to have the amendment reported. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after line 13, on page 28, down to and including line 2, on page 29, as follows:

"CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

"For 3 Commissioners, at $3,500 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,000; 8 clerks of class 4; 10 clerks of class 3; 13 clerks of class 2; 15 clerks of class 1; 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; 2 clerks, at $900 each; 1 messenger; 2 laborers; engineer, $840; 2 watchmen; in all, $91,340.

"For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the Commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, $7,000."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CANNON. Let the House divide first.

Mr. MUDD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the yeas and nays will be given——

[Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. It is the sacred right of any member to demand the yeas and nays, and it is for the House to determine whether they shall be taken.

Mr. MUDD. I will waive for the present the demand for the yeas and nays, and will ask for a division.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MUDD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 93.

Mr. MUDD. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Thirty gentlemen have arisen, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are——

Mr. STEELE. Let us have the other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Seventy-nine gentlemen have arisen in opposition to the demand for the yeas and nays—a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 123, answered "present" 17, not voting 136; as follows:

Until Thursday next:

Mr. FOWLER with Mr. BARTLETT.

Until Monday next:

Mr. REEVES with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. COX. I withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear my name called, and I was giving attention to the call of the roll.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat?

Mr. STOKES. I was in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening to hear his name called?

Mr. STOKES. I was.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

Mr. STOKES's name was called, and he voted "aye."

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if a quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum has voted.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BARNEY.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MCDOWELL. I did not hear the pair announced, but I would like to have my name recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman answer when his name was called?

Mr. BROMWELL. I announced the fact that I was paired with Mr. MCDOWELL.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman say "present" when his name was called?

Mr. BROMWELL. I was present and referred to the fact that I was paired with Mr. MCDOWELL. I did not say "present." I wish to be marked "present."

The SPEAKER. That can not be done.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, when my name was called, I voted "aye." I find I am paired with Mr. BAILEY of Kansas, and I wish to withdraw my vote and be marked as "present."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was announced from the Clerk's desk that I was paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. FOWLER. We have a general pair, but we both voted, and I desire to have the pair withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The pair will be withdrawn.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. MEYER. I voted "aye" on this question under a mistaken idea that Mr. MEYER was present. I find that he is absent, and I request that my vote be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I voted without knowing that I was paired. I have learned since that I was paired, and I therefore wish to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HULL. If he were here, I would vote "aye."

Mr. EPES. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL. We are both present and both voted "aye."

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, Mr. POLK. I voted, and I desire to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires that his vote be withdrawn. The request will be granted, if there be no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. I am paired with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. DE GRAFFENREID. He is absent on account of sickness. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk announced a pair between the gentleman from California, Mr. METCALF, and myself. I wish to withdraw the pair temporarily on this vote.

The SPEAKER. The pair will be withdrawn.

Mr. MCCALL. The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. EPES, through an error, announced that I had voted in the affirmative. I voted "no" on this question.

Mr. EPES. I understood the gentleman to say that he had voted "aye."

Mr. MCCALL. No; that is a mistake.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood that this pair is withdrawn.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, did my colleague, Mr. DE VRIES, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. LOUD. Then I withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be withdrawn, without objection.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, on the second roll call I was in the Hall of the House and was listening for my name, but did not hear it. On the first roll call I attempted to say that I was paired, and supposed that I was marked "present." I wish to be so recorded, as I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MCDOWELL.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I was announced as paired. I am not aware of having joined in any pair.

The SPEAKER. The pair will be withdrawn.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6267. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to suspend the operation of certain provisions of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. WILLIAM E. WILLIAMS of Illinois obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of Henry S. La Tourrette, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. NAPHEN, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURTON, for Monday, February 19, on account of important business.

To Mr. RUCKER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DOUGHERTY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COONEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ATWATER, for one day, on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO PRINT BILLS AND REPORTS.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I ask unanimous consent for the reprinting of House bill No. 4615 and report 214, upon the abandoned-property bill, as reported by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HENRY] from the Committee on War Claims. The copies already printed of this report and bill have been exhausted.

There being no objection, the order for a reprint was made.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill 8245, the bill relating to trade with Puerto Rico, and the report thereon. My information from the document room is that the entire edition of these documents is exhausted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman's request includes the views of the minority?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

There being no objection, the order for a reprint was made.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of expenditures in the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey for the year ended June 30, 1899—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, replying to the resolution of the House relating to occupation of public property by railroads in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8596) to appropriate $10,000 to inclose and beautify the grounds and repair the monument on the Moores Creek battlefield, North Carolina, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 349); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House joint resolution 2, reported in lieu thereof a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 177) in relation to monument to prison-ship martyrs at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, N. Y., accompanied by a report (No. 350); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2538) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 351); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8659) to increase the pension of Thomas P. McCracken; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 8663) to provide a chaplain for each regiment in the United States service, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HENRY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 8664) to authorize the construction of an addition to the public building at Hartford, Conn.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. PEARRE: A bill (H. R. 8665) authorizing and requiring the Metropolitan Railroad Company to extend its lines on old Sixteenth street—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MCCLEARY: A bill (H. R. 8666) to authorize the reimbursement of officers and men of the Army and Navy for medical expenses incurred during leave or furlough—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 19, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, and was interrupted by Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that will not be done. I think there are divers reasons why the Journal should be read. If the Senator will look around the Chamber he will see one reason why it should be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal, and it was approved.

BRUNSWICK (GA.) HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 22d ultimo, a report from H. L. Marindin, assistant, Coast and Geodetic Survey, relative to the amount of work done since his last report on the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., its cost, and its value to the Government, and an estimate as to the annual cost of maintaining the channel across that bar; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the calendar year 1899; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR CLERKS AT CITY OF MEXICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State recommending an increase in the allowances for clerks at the United States consulate at the City of Mexico from $1,200 to $2,400 per annum; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CONSUL AT TORONTO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State recommending an increase in the salary of the United States consul at Toronto, Canada, from $2,000 to $3,000 per annum; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CONSUL AT BOMBAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State recommending an increase in the salary of the United States consul at Bombay from $2,000 to $3,500 per annum; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CONSUL AT WINDSOR, NOVA SCOTIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State recommending an increase in the salary of the United States consul at Windsor, Nova Scotia, from $1,000 to $1,500 per annum; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

J. A. WARE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, a report of the Quartermaster-General of the Army relative to the amount found to be equitably and justly due J. A. Ware under his contract of October 14, 1896, on the part of the United States, by Maj. C. F. Humphrey, deputy quartermaster, United States Army, for expense of lumber and materials used on gravel road from Cache River to the Mound City National Cemetery in repairing damages caused by high waters in the spring of 1897, etc.; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT SANDY BAY, MASS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, together with copies of reports made by a board of engineers constituted in accordance with the requirements of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, relative to the project of improving the harbor of refuge, Sandy Bay, Cape Ann, Mass.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 6267) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to suspend the operation of certain provision of law relating to the War Department, and for other purposes;" and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENROSE presented a memorial of the Tobacco Growers' Society of Lancaster County, Pa., remonstrating against any modification of the present tariff law whereby the products of Puerto Rico, etc., may be admitted into the United States under any lower duties than those now imposed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Williamsport, Pa., and a petition of sundry citizens of Tamaqua, Pa., praying for the establishment of an Army veterinary corps; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I present resolutions adopted by citizens of Emmons County, N. Dak., expressing sympathy for the Boers. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas we believe that "all men are created free and equal, and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Since the declaration of that memorable document, the Declaration of Independence, the idea that "might is right" has gradually lost ground, and the last hundred years of the history of nations have justified the statesmanship of the framers of our National Constitution. Hence the decline of despotism and the progress of liberty; and

Whereas we believe that an unnecessary, heartless, and cruel war of usurpation is destructive of moral progress and free institutions, beneath the dignity of a civilized nation, and contrary to the will of God; and

Whereas Great Britain to-day is waging war against two sister Republics, the Transvaal and Orange Free State, which might have been avoided by arbitration, as desired by President Kruger: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of Emmons County, N. Dak., without regard to religious bias and political affiliations, congratulate Her Majesty Queen Victoria on her former efforts to avert this war, and that we also congratulate those in England who are opposed to this conflict and are using their efforts to bring it to a speedy close; and

Resolved, That we condemn most emphatically the course of Great Britain in this war, because of her refusal to arbitrate; because of her apparent insincerity in the Hague peace conference; because of her hypocrisy in national policy; because of her greedy and tyrannical purpose; and

Resolved, That we heartily commend the course of Senator WILLIAM E. MASON, of Illinois, and Congressman SULZER, of New York, in their effort to obtain, through Congress, an expression of sympathy with the brave Boers, which expression can only demonstrate properly to the world the true patriotism of this nation; and

Resolved, That we express our profound admiration for the heroic struggle of the Boers in defense of their quiet, loved homes and their dearly-bought country; that we express our sincere sympathy with these patriots, and pray that their cause may prevail; and

Resolved, That these resolutions be published and a copy be sent to Senator MASON, of Illinois; Congressman SULZER, of New York; Senators HANSBROUGH and MCCUMBER, and Congressman SPALDING, of North Dakota.

Mr. HANSBROUGH presented a petition of the congregation of the Congregational Church of Oriska, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation to limit absolute divorce in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPOONER presented a memorial of Local Union No. 212, Cigar Makers' International Union, of West Superior, Wis., remonstrating against the adoption of any amendment to the tariff law admitting cigars from Puerto Rico free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

He also presented a memorial of the Trades and Labor Council of Racine, Wis., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 5067, concerning the boarding of vessels; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 85, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Eau Claire, Wis., and a petition of the Superior Trades and Labor Assembly of West Superior, Wis., praying that all the remaining public lands of the United States be held for the benefit of the whole people; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FORAKER presented a petition of Local Union No. 7420, Architectural Iron Workers' Union, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that no grants of public land be made except to actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented petitions of the Warder, Bushnell & Glessner Company, of Springfield; the A. C. Evans Manufacturing Company, of Springfield; the Foos Manufacturing Company, of Springfield; the Thomas Manufacturing Company, of Springfield; the Springfield Malleable Iron Company, of Springfield; the Avery Stamping Company, of Cleveland; the F. Muhlhauser Company, of Cleveland, and of Charles Patterson & Co., of Cleveland, all in the State of Ohio, praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a new fireproof Patent Office building; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of sundry railway mail clerks of Vincennes, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of Robinson & Co., of Richmond, Ind., and a petition of the O'Brien Varnish Company, of South Bend, Ind., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a new fireproof Patent Office building; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CULLOM presented the petition of Joseph Emmert and sundry other citizens of Freeport, Ill., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax upon proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 174, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Joliet, Ill., remonstrating against the cession of public lands to the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the American Federation of Labor, of Carterville, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called subsidy bill and against the cession of public lands to the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Dunlap Grange, No. 919, Patrons of Husbandry, of Peoria County, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide protection for song birds; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Dunlap Grange, No. 919, Patrons of Husbandry, of Peoria County, Ill., praying for the establishment of the rural free-delivery system throughout the country; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented petitions of the National Live Stock Exchange, of Chicago, Ill.; of the Crystal Oil Refining Company, of Cleveland, Ohio; of the Pacific Lumber Exchange, of New York, and of the South Carolina railroad commission, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of Local Union No. 330, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Alpena, Mich., praying that all the public lands be reserved for actual settlers, and for the construction by the Government of storage reservoirs and irrigation works on public lands wherever they are needed; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Richmond, Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to subsidize the merchant marine of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE presented a memorial of the Local Union No. 66, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Lewiston, Me., remonstrating against the adoption of any amendment to the present tariff law admitting cigars from Puerto Rico free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

He also presented a petition of the Free Home League of Oklahoma Territory, praying for the enactment of a free-home law for the benefit of settlers on public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Charles Schmiderer, of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the removal of the charge of desertion standing against his name; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RURAL FREE DELIVERY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago I presented several letters from the masters of subordinate granges in New Hampshire in favor of the rural free delivery of mails, and I now present several other letters from officers of granges on that same subject.

In this connection I will remark that an enterprising newspaper correspondent communicated to a leading paper in my State the remarkable information that I am opposed to the rural free delivery of mails, and I presume these letters are the result of that misinformation.

I have always supported every appropriation that has come before the Senate during my term of office here that proposed to carry on and to enlarge this good work, and I expect to continue to vote for such appropriations, which I trust will be liberal and adequate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I presume the criticism that has been made upon my colleague grew merely out of some request to the Post-Office Department that he might be informed as to the requests that were made there for rural free delivery. I have never had the slightest reason to suppose that my colleague was opposed to the extension of rural free delivery in New Hampshire just as fast as the Post-Office Department should find that it had funds applicable to that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. That, Mr. President, is precisely my attitude. I will, however, add that I have never made any request of the Post-Office Department such as my colleague suggests, and hence the dispatch certainly was based upon an entire misapprehension. I have had no communication whatever with the officers of the Post-Office Department in regard to this subject, except to send a messenger from my committee room with a certain gentleman from New Hampshire to ask that he might present a petition and be heard in regard to extending the service in his part of the State.

The petitions were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as follows:

Petitions of Wesley Adams, district deputy, No. 1, New Hampshire State Grange, of Derry Depot; Daniel M. Spaulding, deputy, New Hampshire State Grange, of Keene; Charles S. Ford, master of Mascoma Valley Pomona Grange, of Lebanon, and of G. D. McDuffee, deputy in the Order of Patrons of Husbandry, of Dover, all in the State of New Hampshire.

VETERINARY SURGEONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I present a letter signed by C. E. Burchsted, veterinary surgeon, of Exeter, N. H., and accompanying it I present a very numerously signed petition in favor of the establishment of a veterinary corps in the United States Army. This petition represents that ours is the only civilized government in the world whose army has not a veterinary corps or any proper provision for the care of the health of its animals and for the inspection of the animal food which its soldiers consume.

I think this is a very important matter, and I trust the Committee on Military Affairs will give it, as I doubt not they will, very careful consideration. I ask that the petition and accompanying letter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to correct one impression that was left by the petition presented in regard to veterinary service. That petition seems to state that there is no such provision already existing for veterinary surgeons. I beg to say that there are existing by law now two veterinarians to each cavalry regiment. It is true we have not created a corps with a brigadier-general and sundry lieutenant-colonels and majors under it, but we have organized a veterinary corps in each regiment of cavalry.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator, if he will permit me, what rank the veterinarians hold? How are they ranked in the Army with the rest?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not sure whether they were in the rank of lieutentant——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no; my impression is that they are noncommissioned officers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, I say I am not sure. That was in the legislation of the last Congress, but I do not think it was agreed to. But they are given the highest rank of noncommissioned officers.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My impression, from what I gathered from the letters and petitions I have received, is that the veterinary surgeon, who as a rule in these days is a college graduate, a man who has devoted his life to the study of diseases of the horse and their cure, finds that he is so labeled and so placed in the Army that it is impossible for him to accept the position, and that the good men, the best men, are never available for this most important branch of the service, because they are not recognized in the Army except in some very subordinate capacity. That was the impression I got from the petitions and letters which I have received on the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to say simply one word more. I think the petitioners as well as the correspondent whose letter I filed for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs are well aware of the fact that some provision does exist for veterinary service in our Army, but their contention is, and I confess that after considerable investigation I think it is well grounded, that they ought to have higher rank and ought to have greater recognition than they are receiving at the present time, and be put on a practical equality with the veterinary corps of the armies of continental Europe.

Mr. HALE. I suppose all of us have been, to some degree, flooded by petitions upon this matter of the recognition of the rank of the veterinarians in the United States Army. I have been, for one, inclined to think that there is merit in it, and that to a limited degree such a recognition might be well in the Army as a part of its force.

But it does not stop with the veterinarians. I am now beginning, as I have no doubt other Senators are, to receive crowds of letters and petitions for Army dentists, to be made a part of the officer force of the Army; that there shall be a corps of dentists incorporated in the Army with rank, and with the significance that attends rank, the official recognition and the pay.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does he think that there could be any more important adjunct to an army in the field than a dentist, who is also, in these late days, usually a university graduate, a specialist, and whose services, especially in an army in a remote country, are more vitally and more imperatively needed and in more instances than those of physicians, and can do more to alleviate human suffering?

Mr. HALE. I do not know but that that is true. I had not made up my mind about it, and I think there is force in what the Senator says. I do not know but that it applies, but I am going along gradually. I had not compassed as much speed as the Senator from Colorado has done. I had been rather converted to the need of improvement in the veterinary service, but it was a new idea to me that dentists should follow the Army. I do not know but that the Senator is right on that point.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, he could not have listened to a speech that I made here a year or two ago, when the Senator from Illinois reported, I think, a bill in favor of a corps of dentists, and I argued in favor of it on account of the kind of food we give our sailors and soldiers. We give them hardtack and tough meat, and if there is anything in the world we ought to do for our sailors and soldiers, it is to provide for their teeth. Now, the Senator omitted to read that speech.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt I heard it, because almost any day I hear a very good speech from the Senator, and he must not expect me to segregate the speeches he makes on dentists from the speeches he makes upon other subjects. They are all good speeches. I do not know but that all of these innovations are right and are needed. Luckily, the Military Committee is rather a conservative committee, headed by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and they are not likely to embark in a very dangerous or wild project. But I hope they will consider all these subjects, and I am willing to announce now that for one, so far as the veterinary service goes, I am converted, not quite perhaps as to the dentists, but that will come later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter and accompanying petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4006) to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, to report it without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. I move that the bill (S. 2258) to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River which has been reported to the Senate from that committee and is now Order of Business 117 on the Calendar be indefinitely postponed, and that the House bill just reported by me be given the place of the Senate bill on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McBRIDE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1393) for the relief of Thomas Paul, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 200) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, heretofore reported by him.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1806) for the relief of W. W. Riley, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, to whom was referred the bill (S. 559) for the investigation of pollution of water supplies, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2870) concerning disbursing officers of the Subsistence Department of the Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 92) to amend section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to taking depositions de bene esse, reported it without amendment.

SUITS BY OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HOAR. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 5493) for the relief of claimants having suits against the United States pending in the circuit and district courts of the United States affected by the act of June 27, 1898, amending the act of March 3, 1887; and I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no suit shall abate or be affected by the act of June 27, 1898, entitled "An act to amend sections 1 and 2 of the act of March 3, 1887," which was pending in any circuit court of appeals, circuit or district court of the United States at the time of the passage of said act; and all such suits which have been dismissed by reason of said act shall be restored to their places in such courts and proceeded with as if the same had not been enacted; and time within which an appeal or writ of error may be taken or prosecuted in any case affected by this act is hereby extended six months from the passage hereof.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask for information——

Mr. HOAR. I can state in one sentence the whole matter, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was going to ask if we have not already passed a bill similar to this measure?

Mr. HOAR. We did, but it did not get through the other House. That was at the last session, not at the present session. This is a House bill.

A few years ago, the date is given there, an act was passed authorizing suits to be brought in the several district courts for small sums against the United States. It was esteemed a great hardship to compel a claimant dwelling in California or Washington or Oregon to come to Washington before the Court of Claims for a claim under a thousand dollars.

Then, after that bill became the law, complaint was made from the Departments that that act was taken advantage of by officers of the Army to have their accounts settled in the courts, and to have suits against the United States instead of having them settled in the Departments; and accordingly the law referred to in this bill was passed, taking away the jurisdiction of the courts from suits brought by officers of the United States.

But that act did not except pending cases, so that under it, as the courts construed it, even matters where there had been adjudication below in favor of the official and an appeal had been taken, whether one was pending in the court of appeals by the United States or the reverse, the whole case was dismissed. This bill simply restores cases that were pending in the courts at the time of the passage of the law or cases which had been determined within the six months, when the right of appeal existed, from the operation of the act. It is a very plain case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONTANA SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I report a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound in one volume for the use of the Committee on Privileges and Elections 200 copies of the following documents:

1. Senate Document No. 2, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, "Memorial of certain members of the Montana legislature;"
2. Senate Document No. 3, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, "Memorial of citizens of Montana;"
3. An index giving the names of the witnesses included in the foregoing documents, with the paging;
4. Testimony taken before the Committee on Privileges and Elections prior to the time of printing; and
5. A temporary index of such testimony.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are those copies for the use of the committee solely?

Mr. CHANDLER. Solely for the use of the committee—200 copies.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would not the committee like to have other Senators have a copy?

Mr. CHANDLER. The committee, I think, do not care to print any more than that number at the present time, and they must have them in order to enable them to go on with their work properly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the evidence completed?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is all in type now. It is a mere matter of making 200 books and putting them together with an index.

Mr. HALE. The evidence is not completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 3215) granting an increase of pension to Andrew F. Dinsmore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3216) granting an increase of pension to Moses F. Woods; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany the bill I present the petition of Moses F. Woods, with sundry affidavits and the record from the Pension Office and the War Department. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3217) granting a pension to Mary L. Jackson; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany the bill I present the petition of the claimant, sundry affidavits, and the military record of James M. Jackson. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3218) to increase the pension of Elwin A. Scutt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3219) for the protection of subsurface pipes, cables, wires, and other metallic constructions in the District of Columbia from danger by electrolysis, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 3220) granting a pension to Helen Gillen; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3221) establishing a clerical corps for the United States Navy and Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3222) relating to sundry officers on the retired list of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 3223) granting an increase of pension to W. R. McMaster; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 3224) granting an increase of pension to Amos L. Hood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3225) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Michael Maher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3226) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James A. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McENERY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 3227) for the relief of the estate of Leroy C. Morris, deceased;

A bill (S. 3228) for the relief of the estate of Louis Delatte; and

A bill (S. 3229) for the relief of the estate of Abirie Duplantier or his legal representatives.

Mr. DEBOE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 3230) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Davis;

A bill (S. 3231) granting an increase of pension to Hannah Markley;

A bill (S. 3232) granting an increase of pension to Alsie Robinson;

A bill (S. 3233) granting an increase of pension to Hans Castor;

A bill (S. 3234) granting an increase of pension to Mary Yowell (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 3235) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Ferguson, of Louisville, Ky. (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3236) granting a pension to Russell M. Cole (with accompanying papers).

Mr. SIMON introduced a bill (S. 3237) to establish a mint of the United States at Portland, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3238) for the relief of the St. George's Episcopal Church, of Fredericksburg, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 3239) for the relief of Richard Allston; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 3240) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3241) fixing the rank of the Adjutant-General of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 90) providing for the acquisition of certain lands in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. McBRIDE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the superintendent of the Indian school at Salem, Oreg., from $1,800 to $2,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the erection of a brick dormitory at the Indian school at Salem, Oreg., and $1,000 for the erection of a cottage for the assistant superintendent at said school, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2264) to provide a government for the island of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2264) to provide a government for the island of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2571) to provide rules and regulations governing the importation of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, cuttings, grafts, and buds, commonly known as nursery stock, and fruits into the United States, and rules and regulations for the inspection of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, grafts, cuttings, and buds, commonly known as nursery stock, grown within the United States, which become subjects of interstate commerce or exportation; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the allowance for support and civilization of Indians at the Mission Agency, Cal., from $1,500 to $10,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,600 for pay of Indian agent at the Mission Tule River Agency, Cal., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to Henry W. Lee $10,000 out of the moneys of the Winnebago Indians of Wisconsin, for services rendered by him to said Indians, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to establish a consulate at Santillos, Mexico, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment relative to the ratification and confirmation of all sales and conveyances of the lands of deceased allottees of the Peoria and Miami Indians by their heirs, which have been duly made and executed by such heirs, and duly approved by the Secretary of the Interior, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TELEPHONE CHARGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HALE. I submit a resolution, and ask for its consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to send to the Senate all facts in their possession relating to the operation of the act of Congress which established rates for telephone service in Washington; what proceedings under said act have been taken in the courts; what decisions have been made therein, and whether legal proceedings have been carried by appeal in any case to the higher or highest courts.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in the last Congress, on the District of Columbia appropriation bill which was approved June 30, 1898, after a very close, animated discussion in this body, the provision was incorporated into that appropriation bill which I shall read. Senators will remember it, and they will remember the contest that took place on the floor:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person or any telephone company doing business in the District of Columbia to charge or receive more than $50 per annum for the use of a telephone on a separate wire; $40 for each telephone, there being not more than two on a wire; $30 for each telephone, there being not more than three on a wire, and $25 for each telephone, there being four or more on the same wire.

The provision that was put on in the Senate, passed the House, received the approval of the President, and became to appearance the law for these companies for the District of Columbia, which is legislated for by Congress. Congress is not only the legislative body, but the board of aldermen and councilmen and the law-making power for the District.

No provision of law could be plainer than that. It is not the first time that Congress has attempted to put on provisions controlling corporations and protecting the people. We tried it with reference to lights, to electrical appliances, and were impeded and our action destroyed by the courts, by some judge or other.

I see by the newspapers that this provision, not passed in a hurry, passed after full debate and ample consideration, has been seized and throttled by some judge, I do not know whom; I will not say, because I have not heard of him before, an obscure judge, for I will assume that he is a judge of some competent jurisdiction; but the action of Congress, I am told, has been arrested; the measure has been seized and the life of it struck out by some judge who has declared that Congress had no business to pass any such law, that it is unconstitutional. My resolution calls the attention of the District Commissioners, who are our representatives in the administrative part of this District, to these facts. I want to have reported to us what proceedings have been taken under that law; how much it was attempted to be made operative; how much the will of Congress was sought to be enforced, and if that will and the operation of that law was arrested at any time, by whom it was arrested, and, if in the courts, what proceedings were taken.

Did the District Commissioners direct the attorney of the Government, who represents the District and Congress, to appear in court and contest this case, or was it a case that went silently and easily and with a greased way to a decision which controverted and overthrew the act of Congress? Has an appeal been taken? Is the attorney of the District instructed to prosecute that appeal and to see whether, as to the government of this District, the protection of its citizens being lodged in Congress, as it has been, it is of any avail that Congress shall legislate upon the consideration of these matters or whether we may as well abandon all efforts in that direction?

The resolution is simple, and only calls for information. I hope nobody will object to it.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I ask him to what resolution he refers? I had not observed that a resolution had been introduced.

Mr. HALE. The resolution I have just introduced, and which has been read at the desk.

Mr. FORAKER. It has been introduced just now?

Mr. HALE. Just now.

Mr. FORAKER. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] for the present consideration of the resolution introduced by him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to the resolution; in fact, I trust no objection will be made to it; I think we ought to have this information; but I do want to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that it is just possible that Congress in passing laws regulating corporations in the District of Columbia may go far beyond the line of propriety.

I have not read carefully the opinion of the judge to which the Senator from Maine alludes. I did casually glance at it, and I think the judge took the ground that the legislation in question was practical confiscation of the property of the company involved, and hence unconstitutional. I do not know that the judge ought to have decided the question as he did, even on that ground, and I am of the opinion that an appeal is to be taken—I have so read in the newspapers—to a higher court, where this matter will be again considered.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. If the law be as it has been stated by the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] who sits on the right of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I do not see how it is possible that a district judge here can interfere. If I understand the Senator from Connecticut, he holds that the power of Congress in this District is absolute.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have said nothing about it.

Mr. BERRY. Not about this particular matter, but about something else.

Now, I am curious to know, if that be the case, how this judge has stopped an act of Congress which sought to restrict the telephone company in this District in its charges. I remember the bill very well, the fight we had upon the floor of the Senate regarding it, and the desperate efforts which were made to beat it; but, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Maine, we succeeded in ingrafting it into the law. If any judge has sought or attempted to stop the operation of that law, I think we ought to know his reason for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, if the Senator will examine the opinion, he will find the decision was made on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the law; and I apprehend that is a valid ground.

Mr. BERRY. I certainly think so; but I say, according to the doctrine advocated by the Senator from New Hampshire and others on that side of the Chamber, you have asserted again and again that the power of Congress over the Territories is absolute and unrestrained by the Constitution. I say if the judge thought the law was unconstitutional, that was a valid ground for his decision; but I can not understand just how, holding the doctrine you hold, you can say so.

Mr. GALLINGER. We will discuss that later, when that question is up. It is not up now.

I simply rose to say that Congress does assume the right to legislate in regard to these matters. There is a great deal of agitation in regard to corporations in the District of Columbia, and I think a great deal of unwise and unjustifiable agitation. We have got the best street railroad system in the District of Columbia which can be found, perhaps, in the world, and the companies have spent millions upon millions of dollars to put their roads in the shape they are to-day; and yet almost every day, in one branch of Congress or the other, we hear of a bill which proposes to reduce the fare on those railroads to a point where, in all human probability, they could not be run even to make the stockholders whole. I suppose it is competent for us to say that 20 tickets shall be sold for 5 cents by those railroad corporations; but if we should do that, I hope there is, or will be, a judge somewhere or a court somewhere who would come to the protection of those corporations and say we have no right to confiscate their property. I think that is what was done in the decision in the telephone case. The decision may not be well grounded. On that point I can not speak advisedly, although I am inclined to think that the decision was a sound one. I trust the resolution will pass, and that we shall get from the District Commissioners all proper information on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is, Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. FORAKER. Inasmuch as the Senator from Maine has asked for the present consideration of the resolution, I should like to have it read.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution be read, as some Senators, I find, have not heard it.

Mr. FORAKER. My attention was diverted for a moment. I did not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary again read the resolution submitted by Mr. HALE.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I wish to be indulged for a minute. Inasmuch as the resolution calls only for information, I have no objection to its being now considered and now adopted by the Senate; but I think it is opportune, in view of what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has stated, to call his attention to the fact, already stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that the decision of the court was placed on the constitutional ground that it was the taking of property without due process of law, amounting to confiscation, and that that was beyond the power of Congress to do.

In answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], there is no difficulty whatever about this case, because by Congress the Constitution of the United States has been extended to and has been made to apply in the District of Columbia, as it has been to most of the Territories of the United States. But for that fact, Congress would be free to legislate with respect to affairs in the District without many, at least, of the limitations imposed by the Constitution according to the opinion of some Senators.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that upon a matter where Congress has so plainly asserted its power and has made so plain a statute it should be countervailed by the decision of any inferior judge without taking an appeal to the higher or to the highest courts?

Mr. FORAKER. I think, Mr. President, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Maine, that it is not only competent, but it is the duty of any judicial officer in the District of Columbia having jurisdiction of the case to decide according to the law and the evidence; and if, according to the evidence adduced, the rates fixed by Congress would amount to the confiscation of property, it was his duty to so decide. It is a question for the district attorney, or the officer representing the Government, to determine whether or not he will appeal the case to a higher court. He may or he may not do that, according to his own judgment.

Mr. HALE. That is not my question.

Mr. FORAKER. I learn by reading the newspapers that the district attorney in this instance has taken an appeal to a higher court.

Mr. HALE. That I had not learned. That is part of the information I seek.

Mr. FORAKER. Of course, when the case gets to a higher court, so far as relates to the evidence it will be a question of fact for that court in so far as it will consider the testimony, as it was a question of fact in the court below to determine on the testimony adduced whether or not there was confiscation within the meaning of the constitutional provision in that regard.

Let me say further to the Senator from Maine that there is not anything unusual about this decision; on the contrary, our courts have been frequently called upon to decide the same question, and in many instances the same kind of decision has been rendered. This is not the first time in the history of legislation in the United States when legislative authority has gone farther in placing limitations upon the right of corporations of a quasi public character to make changes than it had a right in the judgment of the court to go; that they have gone so far as, in other words, to amount to confiscation, and that was held here.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. If in a case like this——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like the Senator from Maine to yield for one moment to have this question fairly before the Senate, as it is not before the Senate now. It is only a question of unanimous consent which is pending. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate. The Senator from Maine will proceed.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to take any more time of the Senate, but I wish to say that I concur in the view the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] have stated, that in a case of this importance, where Congress has so clearly manifested its will, its purpose, the decision of no inferior judge should be allowed to arrest this law, to strangle it, and that the case should be carried to the highest courts. I have not read the decision, but lawyers who are about me here in the Senate say that it is an absurd decision. I would not pretend to pass upon that, Mr. President, if I had seen it; but the case ought to go to the farthest and highest courts. We want to know whether it is of any use for us here in Congress to legislate in that way for the inhabitants, the property, and the interests of this District against monopolies. If we can not, but if these monopolies can apply to a judge, and everything that we do is to be destroyed, we may as well know it. I shall not be content until the case is tried out in the last court of resort and we are there told that we can not pass any such act.

Mr. FORAKER. I certainly have no objection to the case being taken to a higher court, and I assume that it will be taken to a higher court if the officer charged with the defense of the case on the part of the Government judges that that is proper. No one has any objection to that, and in so far as this law is plain and there is no difficulty about interpreting it, that makes it all the more proper that it should be litigated to the end proposed; but that does not constitute any reason why the court should not render the decision it has rendered. The plainer the law the more important the decision and the more appropriate the decision, if the law amounts in its terms and provisions to a confiscation of property, as the court in this case has found.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I thought the Senator was through. I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think there is any valid objection to the passing of this resolution. I think the opinion called for ought to be laid before the Senate. It is entirely proper that we should be in the fullest possession of the facts. The only thing I take exception to is an inference which might be drawn from the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who wants to know whether a judge can arrest a law which has been passed by Congress relative to matters in the District of Columbia, and the Senator calls him "an inferior judge," as if some judges might have a right to do it, and others might not, dependent upon the character and standing of the judge.

Mr. CULLOM. And his rank.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And the rank of the judge. This is a very plain matter, Mr. President. Congress passed a law—I do not know very much about the law and do not recollect about it—but I suppose all laws passed by Congress in reference to the District of Columbia are submitted to the courts when a case arises to determine whether those laws are valid or not; and if a judge, whether he be inferior or superior, thinks they are not constitutional, I suppose it is his duty to say so; and I do not think there should be any reflection upon him for saying so.

Mr. President, the courts of this country are the only thing that stands between us and confusion and anarchy, and I dislike to hear any reflection upon the decisions of a court. When a court decides that a law passed by Congress is constitutional or unconstitutional I submit my judgment to that decision, and I think all the people of the United States must submit their judgment to the conclusions of the courts. Some people did not agree with the conclusions of the high court which was created to determine whether or not a President had been elected; but, to the credit of the American people, they submitted to the decision of that court. I do not agree as a lawyer with the doctrine laid down in the Legal-Tender cases, but as a lawyer and an American citizen I submit, and submit cheerfully and gracefully, to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States or those of any other court which has final jurisdiction in the question of whether a law passed by Congress is or is not constitutional.

I agree, Mr. President, that the case in question ought to be appealed. If there is any question about whether the law was constitutional or not, I assume that the legal officers of the law will do their duty and appeal it, and that we shall finally have the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States as to whether the law passed by Congress was constitutional or not, but I do not see how we can complain of a judge, whether inferior or superior, whether learned or ignorant, because he has rendered a decision in a case presented to him that the law was unconstitutional; and it was with a view of taking exception to what I thought was an inference to be derived from the remarks of the Senator from Maine—that a judge had no right to pass upon the question of the constitutionality of a law passed by Congress, unless, indeed, he was a judge of superior rank and of high attainments—that I have made these remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, our Republican friends seem to be divided here as to their opinion in regard to the power of judges. Sometimes they have great power and at other times they have none. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio to answer me this question: Whether or not Congress can extend the Constitution over a District which the Constitution gives directly and exclusively to Congress—I mean the legislation controlling that District? I will read here the words in the Constitution in regard to the District of Columbia:

> To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States.

Now, if there is anything in this Constitution which gives Congress unlimited power anywhere, it seems to me it has got it in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SPOONER. Congress might have exclusive legislative power, but it has not power to enact unconstitutional legislation.

Mr. BERRY. That is what we say, but you all deny it.

Mr. TILLMAN. But you gentlemen contend, as I understand, that Congress has the power to go into a Territory and extend the Constiution there or not—that it shall never get there until we send it there.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not aware that that question was raised by the resolution. I am not referring to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. That question was not raised by the resolution itself, but we are simply discussing the constitutionality of the proposition of the Senator from Maine. He has asked why an act of Congress in regard to telephones in this District had been nullified by some little judge here in the District of Columbia, and it is said—I will not say boldly or brazenly; but, at least, it is not very clearly brought forward here—that some little District judge, a creature of Congress, can come forward and nullify that law and protect a monopoly in this District; and I want to ask you gentlemen who are contending that Congress has this omnipotent power how you are going to limit it here and then extend it everywhere else? You claim you have the power to extend it everywhere you please or limit it wherever you please.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the inquiry the Senator from South Carolina addressed to me is very easily answered. To begin with, the District of Columbia was originally part of the States of Maryland and Virginia, and the Constitution of the United States applied to this territory as a part of those States. There was never any act of Congress withdrawing the operation of the Constitution from the District of Columbia, but, nevertheless, by the act of February 21, 1871, establishing a government for the District of Columbia, it was thought proper by Congress to again specifically extend and apply the Constitution of the United States to the District of Columbia. I have the act before me, but am not able to point out at the moment the precise provision to which I refer. If, however, the Senator will take the trouble to examine the act, he will find the provision there as I have stated.

Now, Mr. President, the Constitution having been specifically extended and made to apply to the District of Columbia, there can not be any question about Congress being bound in the District of Columbia—I mean in the matter of legislating for the District of Columbia—by the limitations and provisions of the Constitution.

I do not agree, as suggested by the Senator, that when the Constitution has not been made to apply to territory by the United States the Congress is bound by it, except only by certain general negations which are found in the Constitution.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Constitution itself, which you say was extended over the District of Columbia by act of Congress, expressly extends the Congressional legislation without any limitation over the District.

Mr. FORAKER. That is very true. That made it competent for the Congress of the United States, in determining what should be the law of the District of Columbia, to say that the first law should be the organic law of the Union, the Constitution of the United States; and when the Congress of the United States extended the Constitution of the United States to the District of Columbia and made it apply it did nothing more than to say that the Constitution should be the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. It did not say so.

Mr. FORAKER. The Constitution of the United States provided that Congress should say what should be the law in the District of Columbia, and that made it constitutional for the Congress of the United States to say that the Constitution itself should be the law in the District of Columbia. When Congress saw fit to exercise that power and make the Constitution of the United States the law in the District of Columbia, it made all the provisions and limitations of that Constitution apply here to Congressional legislation.

Mr. TILLMAN. We contend that the Constitution applies to the District of Columbia the same as it applies to every other particle of territory belonging to the United States, and that it has always done so, and that this limitation applies only to laws under that Constitution. Now, you say that Congress can apply the Constitution or extend it over the Territories by legislative act.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President, what I say is that the mere acquisition of territory by the United States does not make the Constitution applicable to it, but that it is a question for the Congress of the United States to determine whether or not the Constitution of the United States shall be extended to it and be made to apply. I know that this is a controverted question; but I want to say to the Senator and to others who have the same view he has expressed—and I know others do—that there is an abundance of precedent for both extending and withholding the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States was never extended by act of Congress to any Territory of the United States until we came to provide a Territorial government for New Mexico in 1850; and it was then in order that slavery might have recognition such as the Constitution gave in that and other territory that it was insisted and finally carried that the Constitution should be by express terms extended to that Territory.

Now, however, let me read, while I have it before me, the provision that I referred to a moment ago, found in the act of February 21, 1871, providing a government for the District of Columbia. It is found at the end of section 34 of that statute, and reads as follows——

Mr. TILLMAN. What year?

Mr. FORAKER. Eighteen hundred and seventy-one.

Mr. TILLMAN. How did the District get along from 1788 to 1871?

Mr. FORAKER. As I said a while ago——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must not interrupt a Senator on the floor without first obtaining the recognition of the Chair. The Chair hopes that Senators will observe that rule.

Mr. FORAKER. As I said a while ago, the District of Columbia was originally part of the States of Virginia and Maryland. The Constitution applied to them, of course, as they belonged to the Union, and the Constitution was their organic law. After the District of Columbia was carved out of those States the Constitution was not withdrawn by any specific act of Congress, whether it remained in force or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will allow me a moment until I conclude. I prefer not to be interrupted, at least until I finish the sentence.

Mr. TILLMAN. Just one moment.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not yield now.

No act of Congress was passed withdrawing the District of Columbia from the Constitution, and whether or not it was withdrawn by the fact that it was taken out from and no longer was a part of those States would be a question perhaps about which lawyers would differ, because it was recognized that there was ground for a difference of opinion. But when Congress came to legislate, in 1871, to create a government for this District, that provision, as I was about to read, at the end of section 34, is as follows:

And the Constitution and all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said District of Columbia as elsewhere within the United States.

Subsequently, in 1874, when the government provided by that act was done away with, that act was repealed, except as to that provision and possibly some others, but that provision of the act was not repealed. It has continued in force ever since, and it is in force now. Because of that provision of that statute there is no room to question but that the Constitution of the United States stands first and foremost as a statute law of this District (if I may use that expression in that connection without being misunderstood), and it was competent for Congress, as the Senator has pointed out, by the Constitution itself to say what should be the law in the District of Columbia, and Congress saw fit to say in the District of Columbia the Constitution itself should be the law.

That being the case, we are bound, when we legislate here, by the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution; and if we undertake to pass a bill or make a law which interferes unjustly with property rights, we trespass and go further than we have a right to go under the Constitution, and it is the duty of the courts in construing that statute to decide as in their judgment may be right and just and equitable.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. How could the Constitution of the United States apply to this District or to any other district when it was not itself in existence?

Mr. FORAKER. When what "was not itself in existence?"

Mr. TILLMAN. When the Constitution itself was not in existence. The very first organic law which was framed was submitted to the people for ratification; it had no entity or being or life until it was ratified; and yet that provision there, you say, applied to the power of Congress, limited it and changed it—first gave it and then withheld it?

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President, I am unable to appreciate the difficulty which the Senator now seems to have. I do not understand that the District of Columbia was before the Constitution in the sense in which the Senator speaks.

Mr. TILLMAN. There was no District of Columbia at the time, and there was no Constitution either; but the Senator from Ohio said that this thing had applied to the District of Columbia, which was then a part of Maryland and Virginia, and that this corporation here is subject to our legislative jurisdiction.

Mr. FORAKER. However that may be, Mr. President, there can not be any question about the Constitution being in force here now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Nobody doubts that at all. The only question is whether this judge, who has a limited jurisdiction, has nullified the act limiting the telephone monopoly; whether this little fellow over here, whom we have created, has power to stop our legislation before the Supreme Court of the United States has declared it to be unconstitutional.

Mr. FORAKER. Only one word in answer to the Senator. I do not understand exactly what the Senator means. I do not know whether he intends to claim that the District of Columbia was constituted before the Constitution or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I said the Constitution constituted the District of Columbia when it should be ceded to the United States, and it gave Congress omnipotent jurisdiction to legislate for such District.

Mr. FORAKER. But the District of Columbia was not ceded until after the Constitution was adopted and went into operation, and until it was ceded, from the time the Constitution was adopted, it applied and was in force in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the rule of action in this District has been that of Congressional power and not of constitutional right up to 1871. Is that what the Senator intends?

Mr. FORAKER. It never has been withdrawn, and it was again by act of Congress made to apply in 1871, so that we have the Constitution in operation here. It is in operation here because Congress, which has plenary power under the Constitution to legislate for the District of Columbia, saw fit to make it apply.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FORAKER. I do.

Mr. RAWLINS. Do I correctly understand the Senator from Ohio to say that the Constitution in the District of Columbia, being extended thereto by an act of Congress, simply has the force of an act or a statute of Congress and may be repealed or modified at the pleasure of Congress? If I do so understand the Senator, how would it be possible for any court in the District of Columbia or elsewhere to hold that a recent, late act of Congress could be nullified by a prior act of Congress because inconsistent with it, it always being competent for Congress to repeal any statute that it may have enacted?

Mr. FORAKER. When I used the expression "the first statute," I remarked in that connection that I hoped I would not be misunderstood. I did not mean to have it understood that I regarded the Constitution when extended as nothing more than a mere statute; but what I meant to be understood as saying was that it is competent for Congress to extend it or not; and if Congress sees fit to extend the Constitution, of course Congress is bound by it as the first organic law of that territory, as it is the organic law of the Union, and all subsequent legislation of Congress, so long as the Constitution may remain the supreme law in the territory, must be measured by it.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Constitution in the District of Columbia or in a Territory outside a State has for its sole basis an act of Congress which Congress may at any time repeal, how can the creature be regarded as higher than the creator?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know that I exactly understand the Senator.

Mr. RAWLINS. Does not the Constitution in every case rest upon the consent and authority of the people of the United States to be enforced as they intended it, to be enlarged or qualified only according to the methods which that instrument provides for its own amendment?

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that the Constitution is the organic law of the States in the Union, and it can be made the organic law of territory outside of the Union of States if Congress sees fit so to provide. Wherever the Constitution is extended and made to apply it is, of course, the rule of action.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. I did not understand the answer of the Senator from Ohio. Does the Senator contend that Congress can withdraw the Constitution?

Mr. FORAKER. It has not been necessary for anybody ever to consider the question whether or not, when the Constitution has once been extended, it can be withdrawn. I apprehend there would be some difficulties because of vested rights and other questions that might arise—vested rights, I mean, on account of what might be done under the Constitution while in force. I think the Constitution, having been once extended, would remain in force and in operation there. But that question has never arisen and it has never been passed upon. The other question has been, it seems to me, over and over again.

Mr. CHILTON. It seems to me to be a very important question, because if Congress has the right to push the Constitution into the District of Columbia, that power would carry with it the corresponding right to take it away, so far as future concerns were related.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it would, perhaps. It is a question I have never investigated. The other question I have. The relative right to take it away would seem, upon general principles, to go with the right to extend it.

Mr. CHILTON. It seems to me there is much force in the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, that if the Constitution came into the District of Columbia by virtue of an act of Congress, any subsequent act of Congress would pro tanto operate as a repeal of the constitutional jurisdiction over the District, and hence, that the Constitution would be wholly within the power of Congressional action under that theory.

Mr. FORAKER. Even if that were so, it would not make any difference in the case that led to this debate, because, according to general principles of equity and the spirit of our institutions, the Congress would be restrained from enacting a law that would take property without due process.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, this debate seems to be purely academic. The question whether or not an appeal shall be taken from the judgment of one of the courts of the District of Columbia declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional does not at all depend on the settlement of the question we have had under discussion.

Mr. CHILTON. Is not almost everything that comes up here academic?

Mr. LINDSAY. A great deal of it is.

I wish to state that my opinion is that the rule applicable to the District of Columbia rests on essentially different reasons from those applicable to the Territories acquired since the formation of the Federal Constitution. When nine States ratified the Constitution, the Constitution took effect in all those nine States and in every inch of territory embraced by those nine States. Now, there was nothing in that Constitution which authorized Congress to withdraw the protection and limitations of the Constitution from any portion of those nine States in the exercise of the delegated power to acquire a district to be known as the Federal District.

Among the powers conferred on Congress was the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States." The cession was to be made by a State or States. The district was to be within the boundaries of particular States, not in the Northwest Territory, not in any Territory that had not been organized into a State, but the cession was to be made by States, and Congress took what power? Not exclusive jurisdiction over that territory, independent of the constitutional protection and limitations that existed before. Congress took the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district;" that is, it was to legislate independent of State constitutions. It was to take the place of the State legislatures. It was to exercise all the power of legislation that existed in the States, and the power of legislation was such as was not prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. The same rule is applied to other territory that Congress may acquire from the States for other purposes.

Congress is "to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings;" and

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

So these provisions apply exclusively to territory within the States, the people of which were already entitled to the protection of the Constitution, and there is nothing in the grant which indicates that under any contingency, or by the consent of any legislature, authority was to be given to the Congress of the United States to exceed the powers conferred on it by the Constitution. The reason for that rule does not apply to territories is subsequently acquired by treaties with other nations. They stand upon a footing essentially different in point of fact. Whether the same rule applies or not I do not now propose to discuss, but I do say that the reasons for the rule and the facts upon which the rule is founded are essentially different.

In 1849 an amendment was proposed to an appropriation bill to extend the Constitution to the territories acquired under the treaty with Mexico, and Mr. Webster, who has been quoted here frequently upon the subject, made the point that the Constitution could not be extended to any Territory by act of Congress or otherwise; that the Constitution applied to States and not to Territories, and that the only way to apply the Constitution to any Territory other than that we held at the time the treaty of peace with Great Britain was made was to admit such Territory into the Union as a State, and to that extent the Constitution might be extended to new territory.

Mr. Calhoun denied the proposition in its fullness and claimed that the appropriate provisions of the Constitution applied to all territory within the dominion of the United States; but Mr. Calhoun did not pretend to say that all the provisions of the Constitution, all the limitations of the Constitution, all the guaranties of the Constitution extended over the Territories of the United States, but only those which were necessary or proper or appropriate, leaving at last to Congress to determine which are necessary, which are appropriate, which are proper to be extended.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Kentucky has correctly stated the positions of Mr. Webster and Mr. Calhoun in regard to New Mexico, but did not Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake, in 5 Wheaton, decided long before the New Mexican question came up, emphatically decide that wherever the jurisdiction of the United States extended the Constitution went proprio vigore? Has that decision ever been reversed?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will say that the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the case to which the Senator has reference may bear the interpretation he puts on it, but that case arose in the District of Columbia, where the Constitution had been applied by its ratification by the States of Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator's pardon for interrupting him again. I quote from memory, but I am entirely responsible for the accuracy of the statement. I have read that decision over and over again, and had it here in connection with the first speech I made during the last Congress upon the island question. Did not Chief Justice Marshall in that decision in 5 Wheaton use this language. I undertake to quote it nearly verbatim. I grant that the question in that debate was as to the District of Columbia, but did not the Chief Justice say the Constitution applies not only to the District of Columbia, but to all the territory west of the Mississippi River as much as it does to the States of Virginia and New Jersey?

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, as I remarked, I am willing to say that the language of the Chief Justice in that particular case will bear that construction.

Mr. VEST. Is not that the exact language?

Mr. LINDSAY. But what I mean to say is that the question there arose in the District of Columbia, a District to which the Constitution had always applied; to a people who had always been entitled to the protection of the Constitution, and all that Chief Justice Marshall said about the territories west of the Mississippi River was beyond the question before the court and not called for by the case in hand.

Mr. VEST. The Senator says it was obiter dictum?

Mr. LINDSAY. That Judge Marshall was a great jurist, that Judge Marshall was a great constitutional lawyer, no man will deny, but that every extrajudicial opinion expressed by Judge Marshall is to be conclusive on all posterity I absolutely deny.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. LINDSAY. In a moment. If Mr. Webster had any distinguishing character at all, it was as a constitutional lawyer, and Mr. Webster generally followed in the footsteps of Chief Justice Marshall; but long after that case had been decided Mr. Webster claimed that the Constitution applied to no territory and could be applied to no territory outside of the original limits of the United States except by admitting that territory into the Union as a State. Now I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. RAWLINS. I would ask the Senator how he explains these decisions made by the Supreme Court of the United States arising in territory acquired by treaty with Mexico—the decision holding that under the Constitution of the United States and by reason of its force in the territory Congress could not authorize the punishment of a man twice for the same offense; that Congress could not pass as applicable to that territory any bill of attainder; that Congress could not authorize in a case arising at common law, the value of the thing in controversy exceeding $20, a trial other than by a jury of twelve men; decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that no man can be put upon trial for an offense committed in such territory except he was informed of the cause and nature of the accusation; that he was entitled to be confronted with the witnesses and to a trial before an impartial jury of twelve men? I ask the Senator how he can explain all these numerous cases involving the points which I have mentioned and others to which I could make reference if his contention now is correct.

Mr. LINDSAY. I stated at the outset that Territories occupied a relation to the General Government different from that occupied by the District of Columbia. The academic question we have under discussion is the power of the judge to decide that an act of Congress affecting the District of Columbia is unconstitutional. I have undertaken to show that the Constitution always applied to the District of Columbia and that no department of Government has ever undertaken to withdraw it, and that there was no delegation of authority to the Congress of the United States to withdraw it when the cession was made.

It is not my business to-day to answer all the points made by the Senator from Utah, but Congress has time and again held, and the Supreme Court has more than once decided, and in cases applicable to the Territory of Utah, that the power of Congress over the Territories is plenary, so far as any power can be treated as plenary.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. It has held in respect of the right of suffrage, the power of government, the franchise to vote, which were not conferred by the Constitution, that the power of Congress is plenary; but as to all civil and personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution Congress in legislating for a Territory is as much limited in that regard by all the provisions of the Constitution in a Territory as in a State.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Mine is only a practical suggestion, and that is that this resolution of mine, referring to telephone rates, shall be allowed to pass, and that then this wider debate shall be permitted to roll on by unanimous consent. Let my resolution be passed, and considerable of the interest I have in the occasion ceases.

Mr. TILLMAN. We will take care of the resolution.

Mr. LINDSAY. I feel that the request of the Senator from Maine is a little inopportune——

Mr. HALE. It may be.

Mr. LINDSAY. As I am put upon the duty of answering an inquiry made by the Senator from Utah. As soon as that is done I am willing to adjourn this debate until some time when it will be pertinent to a question pending before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I am delighted to listen to the Senator from Kentucky, only I do not want my resolution to be wholly forgotten.

Mr. TURNER. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. TURNER. I want to ask the Senator whether in any of the decisions of the Supreme Court holding that the Constitution applied to the District of Columbia they placed it upon the ground that he now places it?

Mr. LINDSAY. I am not prepared to say that they have.

Mr. TURNER. Has that ground ever before been discovered?

Mr. LINDSAY. There is one thing that seems to have been forgotten, and that is that the Supreme Court was not set apart by the Constitution to bind all the people of the United States by all disquisitions it may seem proper to make on a question of constitutional law. The case before the Supreme Court is the case the Supreme Court has the right to decide, and its judgment in that case binds all the people of the United States; but it does not take from the Senate of the United States or from the Congress of the United States or from the President of the United States the right to exercise his or their judgment as to what the Constitution is when we come to apply it to a new and independent state of facts.

In 1849 the Constitution was by act of Congress extended to the Territories acquired from Mexico, and I incline to the opinion, although the Supreme Court has not so decided, that once a people become entitled to the protection of the Constitution, once a Territory is brought under its beneficent provisions, it is not in the power of Congress afterwards to deny their benefits to that people, and that any legislation denying them that protection may be held to be invalid as against the Constitution. But in the case to which I refer the Supreme Court did not put its decision on the ground that it was bound by the Constitution, but held that certain things could not be done because they were against the spirit of free institutions.

I for one wish now to protest against the idea that our personal rights to life, liberty, or property grow out of any provision of the Federal or any provision of the State constitution. They were preexisting rights. We had them before we framed a constitution. We rebelled against Great Britain because the Government of Great Britain would not recognize those rights, and when we formed our State constitutions and when we formed our Federal Constitution, their guaranties were intended to protect and perpetuate preexisting rights, and we do not have to go to any constitution to find those rights.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Kentucky sits down, I should like to ask him a question. I was very much interested in what he said, and especially in his statement that the Constitution did not apply proprio vigore to any Territory and the inhabitants there could only get rights under it by an act of Congress and that Congress, having extended the Constitution by proper enactment to the Territory, could not afterwards repeal that act. Will the Senator be good enough, if he is willing, to state his reasons for that proposition, which is very interesting to me?

Mr. LINDSAY. I prefer at some future time to discuss that question, and I will then undertake to give what I think will be a satisfactory reason to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to be a great pity to have the matter go out under the great authority of my honorable friend, who is a great constitutional lawyer and jurist, without having the reason on which so interesting a proposition is based stated also, in a word or two, at least. Will not the Senator give us a hint of his reason?

Mr. LINDSAY. It will go out just as any opinion goes out in a purely academic discussion, and I prefer, as I expect in the future to discuss all these questions, to treat this matter as I think it deserves to be treated and not to give reasons at this time, which deserve more deliberate consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Academic discussions may be taken part in by freshmen or sophomores or juniors or seniors. Now, the Senator is a senior, a post-graduate of great distinction of the academy of which he is now a member. I wish before his graduation that he would expand that thesis of his a little, if he will.

Mr. LINDSAY. This has been a Government of expansion.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, yes. I thought that is what it would lead to. I am satisfied now.

Mr. LINDSAY. We have expanded and extended the application of constitutional law. Mr. Jefferson did not believe we could acquire any territory without an amendment to the Constitution. Yet all of the departments of Government have overruled his opinion. Mr. Jefferson did not believe we could create a State out of territory not included in the original boundaries of the United States, but we have advanced over that doctrine and have admitted a number of States out of territory acquired since the adoption of the Constitution. Mr. Webster did not believe that by act of Congress we could extend the Constitution over a territory except by admitting the territory into the Union. Mr. Webster was overruled in that regard, and the Constitution was extended, and now the only question is whether, its beneficent provisions having once been given to a people recognized as American citizens, the power exists in the Congress to withdraw it. I say from the very nature of the grant it is a grant which can not be withdrawn without a gross violation of faith, and it may well be held that Congress possesses no power to violate faith as between the Government of the United States and people once clothed with the citizenship of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in answer to the inquiry addressed to the Senator from Kentucky by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], and also a word in answer to the inquiry addressed to him by the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. All the decisions recited by the Senator from Utah were involved in cases arising in territory to which the Constitution had been by express act of Congress extended and made to apply as the governing rule of action. It seems to me that distinguishes the cases quoted from everything else that has been said or contended for in this discussion by those who entertain the view opposed to that I have undertaken to present.

Now, in answer to the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], which contained a statement that this denial of the power of the Constitution ex proprio vigore to extend to newly acquired territory is newly invented, let me say to him that I happen to hold in my hand a very succinct account of the introduction into American politics of the idea that the Constitution does extend ex proprio vigore to newly acquired territory, and it is by an authority which Senators here will recognize as competent. I read from the second volume, page 713, of Mr. Benton's Thirty Years in the United States Senate. He says, speaking of the debate that occurred in the Senate in 1850 over the admission of California and the creation of Territorial governments for New Mexico and Utah, that—

> A new dogma was invented to fit the case.

It will be remembered that Mr. Calhoun was contending that the legislation should be such as not to deny to slavery the right to be extended into that Territory.

> A new dogma was invented to fit the case—

That, Mr. President, according to Mr. Benton, is the first time that this idea that the Constitution extended ex proprio vigore was ever heard in our political debates. He says:

> A new dogma was invented to fit the case—that of the transmigration of the Constitution (the slavery part of it) into the Territories, overriding and overruling all the anti-slavery laws which it found there, and planting the institution there under its own wing, and maintaining it beyond the power of eradication either by Congress or the people of the Territory. Before this dogma was proclaimed efforts were made to get the Constitution extended to these Territories by act of Congress; failing in those attempts, the difficulty was leaped over by boldly assuming that the Constitution went of itself—that is to say, the slavery part of it. * * *
> History can not class higher than as a vagary of a diseased imagination this imputed self-acting and self-extension of the Constitution. The Constitution does nothing of itself—not even in the States for which it was made. Every part of it requires a law to put it into operation. No part of it can reach a Territory unless imparted to it by act of Congress.

We at the same time, Mr. President, have a refutation in this language beyond that which was imputed by the inquiry of the Senator from Washington, and at the same time we have also a history of the introduction into American politics of the doctrine that the Constitution made for the States extends proprio vigore beyond the States. We have at the same time also a most excellent opinion from a very competent man as to the view that should be entertained with respect to the question. I will not delay the Senate longer.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, the point raised by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] is a very interesting one, that the Constitution of the United States only existed in the District of Columbia prior to the act of 1871, because that Constitution was a part of the law, or was the organic law itself, of the States ceding to the United States the territory out of which the District was formed; and he holds that the Constitution, having once extended over the territory of the United States, it can not be withdrawn. He holds further that these personal rights guaranteed in the Constitution exist independently of all constitutions, and the United States Constitution guaranteeing them adds nothing to their force and effect.

Now, Mr. President, as a corollary from the first proposition, he holds that the Constitution of the United States does not extend to the Territories, because it was not there in existence when the United States acquired them and has to be extended there after the acquisition. Under the theory that I understand my honorable friend to hold, the Constitution, being a part of the organic law of Virginia and Maryland, extended to the District, proprio vigore, but all other enactments of Virginia and Maryland of a legislative kind did not.

Mr. LINDSAY. All remained in force until repealed by act of Congress.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well. Congress could repeal any of the then laws of Virginia and Maryland, according to the Senator, but Congress could not itself withdraw the Constitution. That distinction is made with a view of holding to the principle that as the Constitution has never extended to our other Territories, therefore its extension to them is a matter of legislative wisdom and legislative grant.

When Virginia and Maryland ceded to the United States, a distinct power from the States, a part of their territory, every vestige of the law of Virginia and Maryland ceased at that moment, unless the United States Government itself chose to reenact those laws or chose to adopt them. Why did the Constitution stay in the District of Columbia? It was by grace of the Congress of the United States under the theory that the Senator from Kentucky holds. Whenever a territory is ceded to a new sovereignty, the sovereignty of the old jurisdiction departs. The sovereignty of Maryland and Virginia was gone; the new sovereignty of the United States attached; and under the Constitution of the United States as interpreted here upon this floor the Congress of the United States is absolutely supreme in the Territories, unchecked by any constitutional provision. You could not get over the difficulty by saying that the District of Columbia brought with it the Constitution of the United States.

The District of Columbia did not, under the theory of some, bring with it the Constitution of the United States any more than it brought with it the laws of Virginia and Maryland; and if these laws could be repealed by the legislative action of Congress, the Constitution itself could have been withdrawn. What was to prevent it? How did the Constitution act ex proprio vigore in that instance and not act in all? The proponents of the theory of Congressional sovereignty are constantly met with this obstacle. They deny the action of the Constitution of the United States in extending itself, and in order to get the District of Columbia under the ægis of the Constitution they have to invent a theory, and that theory is counter to all law regulating the cession of territory to other States.

Now, so far as Virginia and Maryland are concerned, the United States is a distinct sovereignty, and the United States was no more bound by any organic or legislative law of those States than it is bound to-day in regard to the Philippines or Puerto Rico or any of its possessions; not a particle. They stand on the same basis.

And, Mr. President, what about these personal rights? The Declaration of Independence sets out broad principles of individual rights—that every man is entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But would the Senator from Kentucky contend that ex proprio vigore trial by jury was to be had in the Territory to protect those rights? These rights exist independent of constitutions, but laws are made to execute these rights, to preserve these rights, to maintain these rights. If the Constitution proprio vigore carries these personal rights into the Territories, the Constitution goes as a whole into the Territories—the provision relative to personal rights and every other constitutional provision.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, has the Senator from Louisiana finished?

Mr. CAFFERY. I have about finished.

Mr. HALE. I was going to suggest that he will be cut off, as everything will, at 2 o'clock and that this little resolution of mine that is waiting be adopted now.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I ask that a vote be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now, let the debate go on, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate three resolutions coming over from an earlier day and retaining their place by unanimous consent on account of the sickness of two Senators, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW]. What shall be done with them?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That arrangement ought to be continued, I think, until the Senators are able to be in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that these three resolutions retain their place, without prejudice, until the Senators return to the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 17th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 83) increasing the limit of cost of the new building for the Government Printing Office, to meet the increased prices of building materials, and to permit of making the south end of the power-house extension of the same height as the main building.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. CULLOM. It is so nearly 2 o'clock that in the absence of anything else apparently that is ready for consideration, I will call up Senate bill No. 222, to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to make a few formal amendments to the bill which I did not have made on last Friday. I ask that they be made now. These are simply to connect the statutes which are repealed.

On page 3, line 21, after the words "sections thirty to thirty-three," I move to insert "inclusive."

On page 4, line 1, after the words "sections one hundred and fifty to one hundred and fifty-six," I move to insert "inclusive."

On page 5, line 4, after the words "eleven hundred and seventy-eight," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 8, after the words "thirteen hundred and fifty-four," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 9, after the words "fifteen hundred and fourteen," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 15, after the words "seventeen hundred and fifty-eight," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 17, after the words "eighteen hundred and thirty-two," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 19, after the words "sixty-seven," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 21, after the words "three hundred and seventy-one," I move to strike out "to" and insert "and."

On the same page, line 23, after the words "four hundred and thirteen," I move to insert "inclusive."

On page 6, line 1, after the words "six hundred and five," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 6, after the words "seven hundred and fifty-five," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 7, after the words "eight hundred and nine," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 10, after the words "eight hundred and fifteen," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 12, after the words "nine hundred and six," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 15, after the words "eleven hundred and seventy-nine," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 16, after the words, "twelve hundred and nine," I move to insert "inclusive."

On the same page, line 17, after the word "seventy-six," I move to insert "inclusive."

These amendments are simply to make certain the chapters or sections that are to be repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I did not intend, when this bill was last before the Senate, to make any remarks at all, except as they might be called forth in the consideration of the different sections of the bill. But since that time I have concluded that perhaps I ought to say a few words in a general way in reference to the measure as a sort of introduction to the consideration of the bill itself. It is perhaps expected that some member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate should say something, in advance of its consideration by the Senate generally, about the bill reported to the Senate and which is now before this body; and as the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and myself were on the commission appointed by the President to recommend to Congress such legislation concerning the Hawaiin Islands as the commission should deem necessary or proper, it is perhaps expected of us especially to explain the bill.

Going back to a period beyond the passage of the joint resolution annexing the islands, it might be well to say that the joint resolution recited the language in part of the treaty of annexation concluded at Washington on the 16th of June, 1897, where the preamble to the resolution states that the Republic of Hawaii ceded absolutely and without reserve to the United States of America all rights of sovereignty of whatsoever kind in and over the Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies, and also ceded and transferred to the United States the absolute fee and ownership of all public, government, or crown lands, public buildings, harbors, etc.

I desire to say that the language used in the joint resolution was the same language substantially as that used in the treaty which was ratified by the Hawaiian government, but finally not ratified by the Senate of the United States; but the joint resolution was taken up and passed in place of the treaty; so that when the joint resolution in its whereas recites what the Hawaiian government did, it relates to the treaty which had been ratified by the Hawaiian government.

The joint resolution declared also that said cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed and that the islands and their dependencies are annexed as part of the territory of the United States and subject to the sovereign dominion of the United States. The joint resolution of annexation also provided that the laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands, but that the Congress of the United States should enact special laws for their management and disposition, and that all revenue from or proceeds of the same should be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands for educational and other public purposes.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. LINDSAY. With the Senator's consent, I will ask him whether the provisions of the joint resolution of the two Houses of the American Congress were ever ratified or accepted by any legislative action on the part of the government of Hawaii?

Mr. MORGAN. They were.

Mr. CULLOM. I think they did accept it.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. As I said, the joint resolution followed the voluntary cession by the Hawaiian government, as expressed in the treaty which we failed to ratify.

Mr. LINDSAY. The treaty failed?

Mr. CULLOM. The treaty failed here.

I will not discuss the other provisions of the joint resolution further than to say that the public debt of the Republic of Hawaii, existing at the date of the passage of the joint resolution, including the amounts due to depositors in the Hawaiian Postal Savings Bank, should be assumed by the Government of the United States, but the liability of the United States in this respect should in no case exceed $4,000,000.

Mr. President, the commission charged with the duty of investigating and reporting to Congress undertook the duty imposed upon it by the act, and made their report, which is before the Senate, and a year and more ago reported the bill which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, considered and reported to the Senate, but not acted upon by the Senate during that session, but which was reintroduced at the beginning of this session, acted upon by the Foreign Relations Committee, and reported again to the Senate.

The bill under consideration is the result, first, of the work in part by the commission, but subsequently amended in a number of particulars and reported to the Senate for consideration.

I will not undertake to call attention of the committee to each of the sections as they appear in the bill, because it would require more time than I deem necessary to claim at the hands of the Senate, and secondly, because I do not think there will be much opposition to many sections of the bill. The committee undertook to prepare a bill which would be most in the interest of the people of those islands and as near as possible, as we thought, satisfactory to the people of the States. In the first place, we regarded it as proper to name the islands as the Territory of Hawaii, the island of Hawaii being much the larger island of the group.

The bill under consideration provides substantially for a Territorial government, very largely in harmony with the governments of our Territories as they have existed in this country. There is, however, this difference: We found in Hawaii a very substantial, well-administered government existing, and which has existed for very many years. I desire that the Senate shall realize that the government over there, now called the republic, has existed very nearly as it is now for very many years, in other words, that that is an old country and an old government. It is true it has been most of the time under a monarchy, but it is now called the republic of Hawaii. As I said, it has existed for many years; first, under a monarchy and, secondly, under what was styled the republic of Hawaii, with a president and cabinet, with a legislature and constitution and a code of civil and penal laws, with a supreme court, and with circuit courts and other minor judicial offices.

When the commission visited those islands we found that, according to their last census, the population numbered from 110,000 to 120,000 people and that there is about 7,000 square miles of territory, much the larger island being the island of Hawaii and containing 4,210 square miles, the other islands ranging from 760 to about 100 square miles. The population of those islands is composed of about 31,000 native Hawaiians, about 8,000 half-castes, about 2,500 British, 1,400 or 1,500 Germans, between 3,000 and 4,000 Americans, 15,000 Portuguese, 24,000 Japanese, 21,000 Chinese, and then a few hundred from several other nations. It is believed now that there are perhaps 150,000 people in the Territory.

The commission and the committee deemed it wiser to prepare and report a measure disturbing conditions there as little as might be consistent with the best interests of both the islands and this country. Hence the bill under consideration recognizes the existence of their system of courts, recognizes their legislature, and provides for many local offices for administering the laws of the Territory.

The commission also made a pretty thorough examination of the laws then in force, and, in view of the change from an independent government to a Territorial government of the United States, propose to repeal in the bill before us such laws as we found in their statutes would necessarily have to be repealed either by their legislature or by the Congress of the United States; so that in the work which the commission performed the laws to be left in force, if the bill should pass, are embodied as an appendix to the report itself made to the President and laid before Congress.

Mr. President, I know it will be said that these laws referred to to be repealed and laws referred to to be continued are unknown as to exactly what they are by the Senate or by Congress or by anybody else outside, unless they have looked into them. But the laws to be retained are in a volume connected with the report, and the subject was thoroughly investigated by the commission, having on it two gentlemen, President Dole, of the republic, and Judge Frear, of the supreme court, both of them very familiar with the statutes, and both of them assisted largely, if they did not do most of the work, in selecting for repeal those laws which would evidently and plainly be in antagonism with the provisions of the bill which we reported; and most of them also are unnecessary in view of the changed condition of that government into a Territorial government belonging to the United States.

The bill also by its fourth section declares that all persons who were citizens of the republic of Hawaii on the 12th of August, 1898, are declared to be citizens of the United States, and in the fifth section it is declared that all the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable, except as specified, shall have the same force and effect within the Territory as elsewhere in the United States. The section provides, however, that section 1850 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be applicable to the Territory. But it is provided in the sixth section that the laws of Hawaii not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States or the provisions of the bill when it shall become a law shall continue in force, subject to repeal or amendment by the legislature of Hawaii or the Congress of the United States.

The question is raised whether, under that section, any act passed in the future would be subject to repeal or amendment by the Congress of the United States. That section ought perhaps to be amended so that it shall read that the laws of Hawaii now in force or hereafter to be enacted not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States shall continue in force, subject to repeal or amendment by the legislature of Hawaii or the Congress of the United States.

Section 1890, referred to in the fifth section, provides that no corporation or association for religious or charitable purposes shall acquire or hold property valued at over $50,000. This section, if allowed to apply to the Territory of Hawaii, would interfere with the Kamehameha schools and the Young Men's Christian Association ownership of property, as either amounts to more in value than $50,000. Hence it was insisted by the friends of the school as well as of the Young Men's Christian Association that their educational and charity work should not be interfered with.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I inquire of the Senator whether he thinks that the right to hold property by such a corporation should be entirely unlimited or whether some other limit ought to be fixed?

Mr. CULLOM. I think, perhaps, there ought to be a limit, but this school is a great institution, founded many years ago. I suppose that the property came from the Kamehameha estate. I think it would be very unfortunate that such an institution should be interfered with by limiting the amount to the sum specified in the original statutes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the Senator is quite right about that, but the question arose in my mind whether there should not be some limitation as to the amount of property to be held. There is almost always such a limitation in Territorial bills.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true; and if I knew how much the institution held, I might be able to answer definitely as to what the limit should be; but I really do not know. I should be willing to limit the amount to what the institution now has.

The eighth section of the bill provides for the abolition of the offices of president, minister of foreign affairs, minister of the interior, minister of finance, minister of public instruction, auditor-general, deputy auditor-general, surveyor-general, marshal, and deputy marshal of the republic of Hawaii. These offices were, of course, created as a part of the civil establishment of an independent government and, of course, ought to be abolished.

The bill recognizes the legislative department of the Territory, consisting of two houses—senate and house of representatives—after the fashion of our three great departments of government. It also provides that the senate shall be composed of fifteen members, who shall hold office for four years, but that of the senators elected at the first general election seven shall be elected for two years only and the eight for four years each, and the districts in which they shall be elected are as they now exist in the Territory under the republic of Hawaii. The commission thought they ought not to be disturbed at present.

The commission found that under the constitution of the republic of Hawaii the qualification of voters for Territorial senators and representatives, as also the qualifications of senators and representatives, were not the same. The qualification of a voter for a candidate for the senate required that the citizen desiring to vote for a candidate for the senate should own real property in the Territory of the value of $2,500—I think in the law it is $1,500—should pay his taxes on such valuation, etc., and that a candidate for the senate should also own the same amount of real property and pay his taxes, etc., while a voter for a candidate for the house of representatives should not be required to own any real estate, and the qualification of a voter for a senator or a representative was that he should, in addition to the property qualification named, be a male citizen, 21 years of age, and be able to speak, read, and write the English or Hawaiian language, etc.

Since I prepared this statement I have been furnished with a memorandum which I wish to have inserted. It is from the hearing before the commissioners, and is as follows:

Commissioner DOLE. Voters for members of the house are not required to have a property qualification, but the members themselves have a property qualification. The voters have an intelligence qualification.

Mr. COOPER. It is practically a free franchise for native-born people for the house of representatives. For the senate there is a qualification of an income of $600 per annum, or real estate equal to $1,500, or personal property equal to $3,000.

This question of property qualification in addition to educational qualification, I confess, gave me some trouble, and yet the condition existing there and the appeals to the commission for a retention of a property qualification in the bill convinced the commission, and I think the judgment of the Committee on Foreign Relations agreed with it, that some property qualification should be required of voters for senators in the Territorial legislature, while it was deemed unnecessary to be required of voters for members of the house of representatives or of the representatives themselves.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, would the Senator mind stating what those reasons are?

Mr. CULLOM. I will state them before I get through. I would rather the Senator would not interrupt me just now.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but it is a very important matter he is discussing, and most of the Senators seem to be absent. I notice there is no quorum present, and I should like to get Senators here and have them listen to what is being said.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that is a very good idea.

Mr. CULLOM. I think so, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Gallinger,	McEnery,	Rawlins,
Allison,	Hansbrough,	McMillan,	Ross,
Burrows,	Harris,	Martin,	Shoup,
Chilton,	Hawley,	Money,	Simon,
Clark, Wyo.	Heitfeld,	Morgan,	Spooner,
Clay,	Jones, Ark.	Nelson,	Stewart,
Cockrell,	Jones, Nev.	Penrose,	Tillman,
Culberson,	Kean,	Perkins,	Turner,
Cullom,	Lindsay,	Pettus,	Vest,
Davis,	McBride,	Platt, Conn.	Warren,
Deboe,	McComas,	Platt, N. Y.	Wetmore.
Fairbanks,	McCumber,	Quarles,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senate is not disposed to give attention to this subject. If I were permitted to do so, I should endeavor to have the bill passed in their absence, if the Senators present would vote for it. The pending subject is one of very great importance, and it seems to me the Senate of the United States ought to give to it a little attention.

The commission and the committee agreed that the amount of property required, however, by the constitution and laws of the Territory as they now exist ought to be reduced, and hence the bill provides only that the qualification of a senator and the qualification of a voter for a senator should be reduced to $1,000 in real property in the Territory, or to the amount of $600 income for the year previous to voting, and that the voter and senator should be required to pay their taxes, etc. This qualification, in the judgment of the committee, was regarded as proper for the time being, in the belief that in a little while, after matters became somewhat more settled in the Territory, such property qualifications could be safety gotten rid of.

I am not myself certain that such a provision is needed. On the contrary, I am somewhat inclined to the belief that it is not; but for the sake of being sure and safe I consented that this provision should be placed in the bill and retained for the present. The bill provides now for simply an educational qualification for voters who vote for members of the house of representatives and a receipt showing that they have paid their taxes, while a property qualification is required of the voter who seeks to vote for any candidate for the senate, and the same property qualification shall be required of any man who becomes a senator.

This question is perhaps one of as much importance as any other in the bill, and as likely to produce a difference in the minds of Senators as to what is the proper course to pursue on that subject.

I have a paper here, which was prepared by the late attorney-general of the Hawaiian Islands on this subject, which I intend to read, because I think it sets out as well and as fully that side of the question as it can be set out by anybody. It proceeds—

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator state how long this property qualification, which now obtains, as I understood him to say, in the islands, has been in existence?

Mr. CULLOM. There has been a property qualification there for very many years.

Mr. TILLMAN. For how long?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not remember the number of years, but almost all the time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did it exist under the former government?

Mr. CULLOM. It has always existed, under the monarchy as well as under the republic. The republic has only lasted, of course, for four or five years, as the Senator knows, but there was a property qualification before that time under different rulers.

Mr. TILLMAN. So that the innovation of a property qualification for voters is not new under the Dole administration?

Mr. CULLOM. No; it is not new.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is very much less than formerly.

Mr. CULLOM. The property qualification which now exists is to the effect that a representative shall own property as well as a senator, but it does not provide—and I think there has been no such provision for some time back—that a voter for a representative shall own any property, but that he shall simply be able to speak, read, and write the English language or the Hawaiian language.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The members of the upper house were appointed by the monarchy?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question, not particularly pertinent, perhaps, to what he is saying?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. How many voters, if the Senator knows, are there now qualified under the laws of Hawaii?

Mr. CULLOM. I can answer that in a moment, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. The statement continues:

Conceding that the foreign-born Chinese and Japanese will be hereafter, as they are now, excluded from the elective franchise, there remain as factors in the political problem the Americans, the British, the Germans, the Hawaiians, and the Portuguese.

Now I come to that which will answer in part the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The last registration of voters under the monarchy was in 1891 as follows: Hawaiians, 9,554; Portuguese, 2,091; foreigners, 1,770; total, 13,415.

That answers the Senator's question partly.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, partly.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know that I can answer it more definitely without referring to the records.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator able to tell me in the last registration under the monarchy how many qualified voters there were in Hawaii?

Mr. CULLOM. I can not do so for the reason that when the republic was established upon the ruins of the monarchy there was required a more rigid registration, and there has not been a very large vote of any kind since, nor a very large registration. Those who were not entirely satisfied to identify themselves fully with the republic declined to register, and therefore could not vote. Besides that, when there is no opposition the vote is very light, as is the case everywhere else.

Mr. SPOONER. Can the Senator tell me the largest vote under the republic?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think I have the figures here, but I can furnish them to the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,000, was it not?

Mr. CULLOM. In the neighborhood of three or four thousand votes. Ordinarily it was about that many, and it has been about the same under the republic.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator any estimate of the number of people who would be voters under the provisions of this bill, if passed?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt myself that if those who were entitled to vote should register and vote under this bill there would be anywhere from 10,000 to 15,000 voters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]?

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator has already answered the question I intended to ask.

Mr. CULLOM. My views on the question are partially on the information which has been furnished me. I am reading now from the paper of the attorney-general:

My views on the questions are partially based on the facts of this registration above given, which shows that the native and Portuguese vote is largely in excess of the "foreign" vote.

When he says "foreign vote" he means as against the natives of the islands.

This foreign vote included Americans, British, and Germans, but it may be considerably reduced, because the British generally and the Germans to a large extent will not become American citizens.

They seem to be unwilling to identify themselves with the United States to the extent of becoming American citizens.

The number of Anglo-Saxon voters may therefore be decreased, while, on the other hand, the Portuguese male inhabitants who can read and write are largely increasing.

That would give an indication that the vote would be other than that given in the estimate I read a while ago.

Under manhood suffrage with educational qualifications only, you will see that the native voters (9,554) will largely outnumber the white or Anglo-Saxon voters (1,770), and the Portuguese voters outnumber the Anglo-Saxon voters.

The Portuguese number some 15,000, while the Americans, Germans, and English number between six and seven thousand.

Unless some means are adopted to control the native vote the Territorial legislature would probably pass quickly into the hands of the natives, and the only check upon their acts would be the veto of the governor. There is no reason to believe that a single white person or American should be able to obtain a seat in either branch of the legislature if the natives combined, as they might, on racial grounds. Even the Portuguese, as against the Anglo-Saxon, could exclude the latter from taking any part in legislation.

Under the monarchy the upper house was composed of nobles appointed for life.

That is the way the senate would be established.

Under the new constitution of 1887, forced upon the king by the whites, and after the overthrow of the monarchy in 1893, a property qualification was imposed by the Republicans upon the electors for senators. This created a distinct class of conservative men, who held in check the lower house. Without this property qualification, the thrifty—those who had built up the country by their labor and capital, those who were properly regarded as the intelligent part of the community—would have been largely without representation.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. CULLOM. I want to say further—and then I will yield to the Senator—that what I have been stating is not my view, but the view of the ex-attorney-general of Hawaii.

Mr. TILLMAN. Was that the attorney-general under the republic?

Mr. CULLOM. Under the republic; yes, sir. He has resigned his office since the commission was in Hawaii, a year and a half ago.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is he an American?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; he is a native of one of the Hawaiian Islands, and his grandfather lived there before him, I think.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand the Senator to say these are not his views, but yet he has adopted them in the bill he has presented.

Mr. CULLOM. No; I have not fully. I am giving the views, however, of a man who is familiar with the subject, so that the Senate may understand the whole case as it appears to a man who has identified himself with the islands and is now living in Honolulu. He was born on one of the other islands and is thoroughly interested in the prosperity of those people.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if it will not disturb the Senator, I should like to ask another question.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator able to afford any estimate of the number of natives who would have the right to vote upon a fixed educational test?

Mr. CULLOM. Nearly all of them who are of age. The fact is that the native Hawaiians, except the very old, are able to speak, read, and even write the English language, and substantially all of them speak, read, and write the Hawaiian language.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will allow me, I will say, in response to the Senator from Wisconsin, that they have had a compulsory system of education there for many years. Everybody there was compelled to attend school.

Mr. SPOONER. I was aware of that; but I wish to know how many people who are capable so far as education is concerned would be disfranchised because of the want of property?

Mr. CULLOM. It would disfranchise a great many.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator permit me to ask him how many would be voters or eligible to vote for senators under the property qualification? Has he any data upon that point?

Mr. CULLOM. I have not. Does the Senator mean as to the natives?

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply want to know how many voters there would be who would have the property qualification necessary to vote for senators, and I would like to know what their nativity is?

Mr. CULLOM. So far as their nativity is concerned, I do not suppose I could very well answer the question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Or their nationality, I should have said.

Mr. CULLOM. Before we get through with this subject I shall furnish statistics on that point to the Senator or to the Senate, if that be agreeable.

The attorney-general proceeds as follows:

My own experience, as well as that of others who took part in public affairs, convinces me and them that with an excessively large native vote without property qualifications, the government of the islands would be in the control of the natives, to the great detriment of the interests of the whites and of the Territory.

The danger to be apprehended from the native voter: (1) They can cast about 4 votes to the Anglo-Saxon 1, and, under the new provisions of the bill regarding citizenship, may cast even a larger vote in proportion.

That is under the educational qualification.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Natives?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; natives. I may say this is not appropriate here, because the attorney-general is referring to the bill pending in the House of Representatives.

The statement continues:

This enormous power is of itself liable to great abuse. A party of Polynesians dominating over the Americans by 8,000 votes to 1,500 or less will not hesitate to use that power.

(2) The native has lived for one generation under the American system of jurisprudence and American institutions owing to the strong influence of the Americans who have resided in the islands, the most of whom are known as "missionaries." But the native is only one generation removed from serfdom, the despotic rule of the king and chiefs. He had little education or training in the practice of self-government. More than all, he has not acquired the habit of self-government, which is the safety and staying power of the Anglo-Saxon. If Polynesians, recently "civilized," were now capable of self-rule, they would stand as the most remarkable example in history of the rapid rise of a people, and utterly distance the Anglo-Saxon in the rapidity of their development of political wisdom.

(3) The natives yet remain "children of the Tropics," and have hardly parted with the economic ideas which the race has held for over a thousand years. They have had few wants, and a little labor supplied their wants.

I desire to say that so far as the natives are concerned they are a kindly, affectionate, docile, listless class of people, not desiring to give any trouble to anybody or to have any themselves, but wishing to be let alone; and if they could get rid of the demagogues they would always support the Government in its best interests.

Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate by reading further from this paper, but the end of it is that the substantial people there, who have been intimately identified with the government in its struggle for independence, in the effort to get rid of the monarchy, and to assist in the establishment of good government, believe that some property qualification ought to be provided for in the bill, so that, as an experiment, if you please, they would feel that they were safe in not having their statutes overturned and their government and the prosperity of their people destroyed.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps the Senator stated it at a time when I was not in the Chamber. Has there been a property qualification imposed there heretofore?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Under the republic.

Mr. CULLOM. Under the republic. Under the monarchy, as I ought to have stated in the first place, the body equivalent to the senate was a council appointed by the monarch, so that it did not make much difference what the house did.

Mr. TELLER. The house was elected?

Mr. CULLOM. The lower house was elected. I think there was a property qualification for house members, but none for the voters, and that existed under the republic as it is now.

Mr. TILLMAN. As a matter of fact, was not the monarchy which instituted that property qualification under duress and was it not forced by the revolutionary party, led by Mr. Dole and others, to put that very provision in the decree?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to go into a discussion as to how the republic came to be established.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not talking about the republic. I am talking about the property qualification under the monarchy before the republic was established.

Mr. CULLOM. The council, which existed before the senators who are to take its place, was appointed by the monarch himself.

Mr. TILLMAN. Was not the monarch himself largely under the control of Mr. Dole and his associates?

Mr. CULLOM. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all.

Mr. MORGAN rose.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from Alabama wish to say something?

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask one more question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has already yielded to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. The question is whether he does not think that having an educational qualification for voters would enable them to dispense with the property qualification?

Mr. CULLOM. I answered that a moment ago.

Mr. TELLER. It must have been before I came in.

Mr. CULLOM. I said that personally I had been inclined so to believe, but that the commission and the Committee on Foreign Relations both thought a property qualification ought to be required, and so it is in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say to the Senator who has charge of the bill that I should like very much to vote for this bill, but I think some corrections ought to be made. I do wish to hear some member of the Committee on Foreign Relations tell me why at this late hour we are to put in not only an educational qualification, but a property qualification also. I myself am unable to vote for any proposition of that character, and I do not intend to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am not on the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I suppose the question which arises is just this: Under the old régime there had been friction between the native population and the American population, and bitterness and conflict, and the fear is that the native population, so largely outnumbering the American population or the Anglo-Saxon population, may conceive the idea that they can run that government by votes as against the Anglo-Saxon people and the Anglo-Saxon idea, and that they will be liable to be influenced by demagogues—people who still hold, in a way, to the old monarchy—and that there is great danger that all Anglo-Saxon influence there may be overturned. I suppose that must be the situation.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the whole story.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to debate that when I can do it without trespassing on the time of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from Alabama wish to say something?

Mr. MORGAN. I thought I could clear up this question a little by reading from the report of the committee made to the commission on the subject, in which the facts as to suffrage are stated.

Mr. CULLOM. Proceed, if you wish.

Mr. MORGAN. I will premise by saying that Kamehameha III, who was an educated man, drew with his own hand the first constitution of Hawaii while he was King, and had it ordained by an assembly that he brought around him, which he called the house of nobles and the commons or representatives. I have not understood historically that any person assisted him in the preparation of that draft of the constitution. Doubtless he advised with Dr. Judd, who was at that time his great friend and legal adviser, and who did not go out there as a missionary, but as a physician. He may also have advised with an Englishman, whose name I can not call, who was then a member of his cabinet. But Kamehameha wrote that constitution and ordained it, not by a vote of the people, but by the power of his supreme authority. In that constitution he created two houses for legislation; one was the nobles, and the other was the house of representatives. I forget the particular names they gave to those houses.

Mr. CULLOM. A council and a——

Mr. MORGAN. I mean the Hawaiian names.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know, either.

Mr. MORGAN. The two houses sat together. The senators held their appointments for life. The members of the house were elected by the people after a while.

Mr. TELLER. Both houses?

Mr. MORGAN. The members of the house.

Mr. TELLER. I thought the Senator said "houses."

Mr. MORGAN. The subject was referred to a subcommittee of the commission which was sitting there, and they prepared a report on it. It is not long, and I think it will probably give the Senators a more distinct idea of the situation than perhaps could be derived in any other way:

> The question of the elective franchise and of representation in the legislative body is a delicate and most important question, as upon this depends the general character of the local government.
> Two classes of qualifications have been relied on chiefly in the past to preserve a fair standard of membership in the legislature. These are the educational and the property qualifications. The educational qualification merely requires members and voters for members of each branch of the legislature to be able to read, write, and speak the English or Hawaiian language. This qualification has long been required in Hawaii, and no objection has been offered to it from any quarter. Practically all the native Hawaiians possess this qualification.

That is the educational qualification.

> The property qualifications are more restrictive, and this subcommittee, while believing that the time will come when these can be removed entirely, are of the opinion that for the present they should be retained to some extent. The property qualifications should not, however, be increased. They might perhaps with safety be reduced. Conditions in this respect in Hawaii differ from those in the United States. The people of Hawaii have always been accustomed to restrictions in the matter of representation, especially in the upper branch of the legislature. A review of the past will show this clearly, and will show also that the recommendations of the commission are decidedly in the direction of extension rather than of restriction of the privilege of representation.
> Under the present constitution of Hawaii members of the lower branch of the legislative body are required to own property valued at not less than $1,000, or to have an annual income of not less than $600. It is recommended that these figures be now reduced to $500 and $250, respectively.

I believe those are the figures in the bill.

> Under the present constitution members of the upper house are required to own property valued at $3,000 or to have an annual income of $1,200. It is now recommended that these figures be reduced to $2,000 and $1,000, respectively.
> These restrictions upon membership in the two houses are good as far as they go, and yet they are not as effective as might at first appear, for there are always some men of every class who possess these qualifications. The only effective way to obtain a fairly conservative legislature under conditions such as exist at present in Hawaii is to require proper qualifications of the voters themselves.

That the committee has disregarded.

> For many years, under the monarchy, voters for members of the lower house were required to own property to the extent of $150, or a leasehold on which the annual rent was at least $25, or to have an annual income of $75. These restrictions were finally removed under the monarchy. There has been no property qualification whatever for voters for members of the lower house under the republic, and it is recommended that there shall be none in the future.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And there are none in the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. No; none in the bill for the lower house.

> As to the upper house, the people were for many years not permitted to vote at all for its members. At first its members were appointed by the king, and membership was hereditary. Afterwards they were appointed for life. It was not until 1887, under the monarchy, that they were elected by the people, and then the voters were required to own property, real or personal, valued at $3,000, or to have an annual income of $600. Under the republic the amount of real property required was reduced to $1,500, the amount of personal property remaining at $3,000 and the annual income at $600. It is now proposed to remove the personal-property qualification altogether, to reduce the real-property qualification to $1,000, and to allow the income qualification to remain at $600. This seems to be as great a reduction as can safely be made at the present time. This is evident from the history of the past, especially during the last years of the monarchy, when the property qualifications were greater than it is now proposed to make them.
> The qualifications proposed are more liberal than have ever existed before in Hawaii, and under them a large portion of the native Hawaiians can vote for members of the upper house and practically all of them for members of the lower house. The suffrage has been extended in the past in Hawaii by degrees. It is believed to be wisest to continue this process of growth. To remove the property qualifications gradually is probably the quickest way to obtain their entire removal ultimately. To sweep them all away at the present time might prove so disastrous as to produce a reaction, by which the franchise might be restricted much more than it is at present, if not taken away altogether. The two houses sit separately, and by requiring a property qualification for voters for the upper house and no such qualification for voters for the lower house, all classes are fairly represented and each class may act as a check upon the other, since no bill can be passed without the concurrence of both houses.
> To materially reduce the qualifications below what it is now proposed to make them would be to practically turn the legislature over to the masses, a large portion of whom have not yet fully learned the meaning of representative government, and to practically deprive the more conservative elements and property owners of effective representation.
> Heretofore the two houses have been equal in membership, each containing fifteen members. It is now proposed to double the membership of the lower house. This will increase the representation of the masses and at the same time give the lower house greater protection from outside influences.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell us what report that is? Whose is it? Who made it?

Mr. MORGAN. A report by myself and Judge Frear, a subcommittee to the general commission.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is Judge Frear a native Hawaiian? Is he one of the commissioners appointed by President Dole?

Mr. CULLOM. He was appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. He was appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. He is a native?

Mr. MORGAN. No; he is not a native. He was born——

Mr. TILLMAN. He is living there?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. He is interested?

Mr. MORGAN. He has been for years chief justice of the supreme court of Hawaii and is one of the ablest lawyers, I think, I ever knew.

Mr. CULLOM. Is the Senator from Alabama through?

Mr. MORGAN. I merely wished to read the extract I have read; that is all.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Frear is not chief justice, but he is one of the associate justices of the supreme court.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought he was chief justice.

Mr. CULLOM. No; Judge Judd was chief justice and recently resigned. Judge Frear may be chief justice now, perhaps, since I understand the chief justice tendered his resignation on account of ill health.

Mr. President, this goes upon all fours with what is talked here all the time, that these governments must be set up, so far as the United States has anything to do with them, as nearly as we can on a basis which will result in conserving the best interests of the people of that country as well as the United States generally. Hence, if it is thought best to impose a property qualification it is on the ground that the natives are not trained in civil government sufficiently to be trusted entirely with the control of the legislative department of the government. That is all I desire to say on that branch of the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator leaves that part, I suppose the idea that the small minority of white people in Hawaii must be protected in their property and in their civilization against the ignorance of the majority of colored people meets his hearty approval?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator need not suppose anything about it. I do my own supposing.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought that was a fair interpretation of the bill which the Senator has presented here and which he is advocating.

Mr. CULLOM. I can not prevent the Senator's placing his own interpretation upon it. I will answer the Senator by saying I should be sorry to see any condition occur as the result of the passage of any act relating to that Territory which would result in confusion and the destruction of property and breaking down the great business interest of that country, which is as prosperous today as any Territory or section of this country.

Mr. TILLMAN. In other words, the Senator would object, and he is endeavoring to object, by legislation, to having ignorance and vice control intelligence and property.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not say that I want ignorance or vice to control, or that I believe in it. What I do say is that the commission and the Committee on Foreign Relations took into consideration everything they could think of connected with this subject, and the majority of the commission and the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations believed that the provisions of this bill were necessary in the interest of the prosperity and the welfare of that people.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator does not understand that I am arguing in favor of ignorance and vice controlling the white people over there.

Mr CULLOM. I do not say I understand anything of the sort.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator from South Carolina will permit me, the Senator from Illinois, on behalf of the committee, submits the bill here which presents the best thought of the Committee on Foreign Relations as to the proper government to be provided for this new Territory. The report of the subcommittee has been read. The Senator has presented here a bill which, in the opinion of the committee, is necessary in its provisions to secure good government and order in those islands, and to attain that there is a necessity of making certain restrictions on account of the small number of white people.

Now, the Senator from Connecticut says there are seventeen hundred Anglo-Saxons. There are seventeen hundred white people, but a large number of them are Germans and French, as well as English and American; Anglo-Saxons from America as well as from England. But the white people were so outnumbered, as the Senator read from the statistics, that the committee did not think it was safe that the affairs of that Territory should be turned over to a body of voters who for any reason could take control and who would, as he read there, on account of racial prejudice, speedily unite to overthrow what was really the intelligent and dominating influence there even under the monarchy. It was the white influence that dominated then. Everybody will recollect that in the time of Kalakaua it was American interests for Kalakaua against the English interests, which advocated the election of Queen Emma to the throne. Since then American influence has been dominant. It led to the treaty and finally to the act of annexation.

So I take it the Senator from Illinois has presented here what the committee believe to be the very best thing to be done for these islands, and if these restrictions were not necessary they would not be put in the bill. But something had to be done under the peculiar circumstances surrounding that country, this small body of white men owning the land and the large number of natives—about 9,000—who have divested themselves of all they had, and 2,091 Portuguese voters, really not Portuguese but a mixed race from the Madeira Islands, hardly equal to the natives in character. So it was necessary that this provision should be put in.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will only interject right here the remark that I should like to have the Senator from Illinois give us some information as to how far it applies. The fifteenth amendment to the Constitution reads:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

It looks to me like that is a very sweeping provision and covers all these people.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator want to ask a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir. I should like to know whether this article applies to those Kanakas and others who are now being discriminated against?

Mr. CULLOM. There is no discrimination in this bill against any race of people. It simply provides a property qualification in addition to the intelligence qualification which there is in the bill also.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That applies to all races and all colors.

Mr. CULLOM. To all colors and all conditions.

Section 10 provides that all obligations, contracts, rights of action, suits at law and in equity, prosecutions, and judgments existing prior to the taking effect of this act shall continue to be as effectual as if the act had not been passed, etc.

I assume that Congress can not invalidate contracts, but Congress can prohibit the penal enforcement of labor contracts, and I certainly am in favor of doing so; but I think the extension of our labor laws over the Territory will prohibit any criminal prosecutions or penal proceedings for the enforcement of labor contracts that exist in that island to-day. The law of Hawaii permitting the securing of labor under contract has been in force in that island for forty or fifty years and arose from the shipping of men on the whaling ships going into Hawaiian ports, enabling masters to secure sailors for a definite period, to whom they paid an advance in view of a contract for service to be rendered. As we all know, sailors throughout the world are under similar restrictions to-day, and a master of a ship may resort to the law to compel fulfillment of seamen's contracts, even to the extent of imprisonment or other punishment. When the labor laws are extended over the Territory, of course there will be no further right to make contracts to bring in laborers by sugar planters or anybody else.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to ask one question for information. We commit the subject of making laws to the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii. Of course all our laws prohibiting the importation of alien laborers under contract will be enforced there, but will they have the right to continue their laws respecting laborers?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly not. If our labor laws are extended over that Territory, they will prohibit bringing in labor under contract.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But will that prohibit the passing of laws by their legislature after the laborers are there?

Mr. CULLOM. I should think so. If it does not, it ought to; I will say that. I think it does.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand section 5 of the bill contains the provision the Senator from Connecticut inquires about. That section extends and applies to Hawaii all the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Exactly; but there has been a great deal of talk here as to their laws regarding laborers after they get there, by which, if they refuse to labor, they may be punished.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the law of our country on that subject, now in force?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We have no such laws. We have no laws relating to it, I understand. What I want to inquire about is whether there is anything which prohibits the Hawaiian legislature from making laws with reference to contracts which may be entered into in Hawaii between the laborer and his employer containing provisions which we would not think were in accordance with the spirit of our institutions?

Mr. FORAKER. Every law of that island in force now is repealed by this proposed act in so far as it may be inconsistent with the laws or Constitution of the United States. I suppose that will answer the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Not locally inapplicable.

Mr. FORAKER. I think there is still another provision.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the bill as it is will cover that question.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It ought to, if it does not.

Mr. CULLOM. If it does not, it certainly ought to do so; and I shall be favorable to any amendment that will make it absolutely certain, if it is doubtful, that no such contracts shall be made as now exist.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator says he thinks the bill will do that. I have been over the bill with all the care I could bestow upon it. That is one of the things I want to inquire about. If he will indicate that provision, it will relieve me.

Mr. CULLOM. I had the impression that when we extended the labor laws of the United States over that Territory the extension carried with it the prohibition, either directly or indirectly, of any such contracts as exist there now in respect of laborers.

Mr. TELLER. Let me say one word. The difficulty I found was that there are a great lot of Hawaiian laws repealed, nullified, and not having the laws before me I could not tell by the references in the bill whether the Hawaiian labor law, which is practically an enslaving law, is to be repealed or not.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator will find that all such laws are repealed in the repealing sections which we have here.

Mr. TELLER. I hoped to find it, but I could not. I hope the Senator will look it up and let us know about it.

Mr. CULLOM. I will be glad to look it up and find out the exact fact, and bring in an amendment to cover the case if it is needed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I have had the same difficulty that the Senator from Colorado has had. I have examined the bill with some care, and have failed to find any provision which would prohibit the introduction of contract labor. I would be glad if some reference to the provision of the bill which guards against its introduction would be furnished.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think, so far as that is concerned, that extending the laws of the United States over those islands will extend our laws against the introduction of alien contract labor. I think that is so.

Mr. CULLOM. Undoubtedly it does that.

Mr. TELLER. Why not say so in an emphatic manner?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that is provided for in the bill. The only trouble I have had about it is whether the legislature, dealing with contracts between laborers and employers in the islands, made in the islands, could pass obnoxious laws.

Mr. CULLOM. I see the force of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know what the fact is.

Mr. CULLOM. I confess that I have gone on under the impression all the time that the extension of those laws would wipe out all such contracts as now exist and prevent such contracts being made at all hereafter. But we will look at the bill more carefully later.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator from Illinois leaves this point, if he will allow me, I will call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to section 10 of the proposed act. There is a provision which preserves and continues in force all obligations, contracts, rights of action, etc., which have been entered into or have accrued prior to the taking effect of this act. It may be that under that section there would result the consequences which the Senator apprehends. I think that is the section to which we should turn our attention when we take that up.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question, to see what answer he, as a lawyer, will give. There are contract-labor laws there now existing, made perhaps a year ago, to run for three years. Now, what I should like the Senator to answer is whether, if such a contract as that exists and has not yet terminated, when this law takes effect, it abolishes or wipes out the contract or not. I assume that it would prevent the prosecution or punishment penally of a contract laborer who violated it, but whether it annuls the contract civilly, absolutely, has been a question in my mind. I should like to have the Senator make a statement as to what he thinks about that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No, I think not; because section 10 provides that all obligations and contracts and judgments shall continue to be as effectual as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. CULLOM. Suppose that was not there?

Mr. FORAKER. I think it would be well to insert there an exception as to contract labor.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If there is anything in their acts inconsistent with the laws of the United States, then their laws are so far repealed and modified?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But we have no laws on that subject.

Mr. CULLOM. Why have we not? Do we not prosecute people for——

Mr. FORAKER. We have laws prohibiting the importation of contract laborers.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Exactly, and their laws of that sort are undoubtedly repealed.

Mr. FORAKER. But I ask the Senator, would it repeal such a law in view of the provisions of section 10, that every contract that shall have been entered into before this act takes effect shall remain in full force and effect as though this act had not been passed? That is a specific reference to that particular subject, and it seems to me it would control as against the general provision that the laws of the United States should take effect.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the contracts they have entered into there, running three years, with alien laborers brought in under contract are to be preserved to the end of the term——

Mr. CULLOM. Now, can they be annulled by a statute?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Well, if they are to be preserved, I certainly want to know that the penal laws which they have passed punishing these contract laborers for not fulfilling their contracts shall in some way be abrogated and annulled.

Mr. CULLOM. In answer to that I desire to say that I have an amendment now attached to the bill, which I propose to insist upon being adopted, as to the penal portion of the law or the contract. Whether we could annul a civil contract by an act of Congress is more than I know.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have no doubt we could. Whether we ought to do it or not, whether it is policy to do it, or right and justice demand it, I do not know; but I suppose that we can interfere with the obligations of contracts if we choose to do so.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest that we might amend section 10 without doing any violence to the vested rights, it seems to me, by excepting that class of contracts—certainly all such contracts belonging to that class that may have been entered into since the date when Hawaii was annexed—because if any such contracts have been made to run for a term of years they were made with knowledge to everybody concerned that they were in violation of the laws of the United States, which were shortly to be extended. They are certainly in violation of the spirit of our institutions, and such contracts ought to be abrogated if it is possible.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What language does the Senator suppose there is in section 10 which operates to abrogate them?

Mr. FORAKER. No; I say it does not operate to abrogate, but it operates to confirm and to continue them; and I say in that section 10 I think there ought to be an amendment injected excepting the operation of section 10 from those contracts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I did not understand the Senator. I think he is quite right.

Mr. FORAKER. That is the point I make.

Mr. CULLOM. I have an amendment right here that I intended at the proper time to offer, and I will read it. It is to add to section 6, I believe, the following:

Provided, That none of said laws nor the decisions of any of the courts of the Republic of Hawaii shall be in force or effect so as to allow imprisonment for debt or for the nonfulfillment of a labor contract.

Mr. FORAKER. Is there anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding, in view of section 10, that ought to be added?

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment is there, I think, as far as I have read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that is right.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, if Senators are satisfied——

Mr. NELSON. I suggest that the amendment ought to be inserted in section 10, "that all obligations, contracts, etc.," are ratified. There ought to be an amendment in that section excepting contracts for labor entered into subsequent to the time when the island was annexed to the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. I have got this amendment for that section. Perhaps that will help out some. On page 8, after section 10, add the following:

Provided, That no contract for labor or for personal service shall be in force, either by injunction or other legal process.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to offer that amendment at this time?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to both amendments being adopted now, if the Senate desire.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know that I want to have it adopted in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Which amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment just read by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to be heard a little about that last amendment. I think we had better take those amendments up when we come to them.

Mr. CULLOM. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Illinois is in the midst of his speech, and it is by his tolerance that the question is presented.

Mr. CULLOM. My speech is more to get the attention of the Senate to the bill than for a set speech. I want the bill, in some form, adopted as quickly as we can, because it is needed exceedingly in that Territory, and I am ready, so far as I am personally concerned, to yield to any reasonable amendment that will perfect the bill; and of course the Senate has a right to that, whether I am willing or not.

Much complaint has been made against Hawaii because of the existence of these labor-contract laws. They have existed for many years back, and for the reason that it was difficult for sugar-plantation owners to secure labor for the islands adequate to the apparent emergency. That is the way it has come about.

Our laws in this country prohibit the importation of Chinese labor, but do not prohibit Japanese labor, and one of the effects of the labor laws of that country has been to keep out Japanese, who would come there in great numbers if the government of the islands had not exercised authority to keep them out by virtue of labor-contract laws.

That seems to be rather an unusual statement, and yet I am told by men there identified with the business interests of the country that really in the beginning, after the republic was established, the fear was that they would be overrun by Japanese coming to that island, and the labor laws of that country seemed to act as a restraint upon the Japanese coming there except as they wanted to come for labor purposes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the Senator any figures as to the number of Japanese who have come there since the islands were annexed?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; I have them somewhere here.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand there are upward of 30,000 now.

Mr. CULLOM. I think between 25,000 and 30,000 have come in since the flag of the United States was raised over the government building in that island.

Mr. TELLER. How many are there all told?

Mr. CULLOM. There are nearly 40,000 Japanese there.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator from Illinois is wrong about that, because at the expiration of these labor contracts the Japanese have all gone back. Since the contracts have expired they have gone back. They have not settled in the island.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true. They do go back generally when the contracts expire.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to make one more observation about it. All those men retained their allegiance to Japan when they came to the islands and never had any idea of changing it at all, and many of them are alleged to be regular soldiers in the Japanese army.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, that was the plea under which the islands were annexed, that Japanese soldiers had come over there in disguise and would seize the islands for Japan.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course at the time of the annexation that was the fear of people in this country as well as on the islands. But we did not understand that to be the case.

Mr. TILLMAN. No one has any fear of that now?

Mr. CULLOM. I think not.

When our laws are extended over the islands it is somewhat questionable what the effect will be, and whether the islands will not fill up more rapidly with such laborers than they do now. The total number of laborers of the Hawaiian Islands is about 40,000, and about one-half that number is under contract, those under contract being mainly Japanese and Chinese. Very few, if any, of the Portuguese laborers are under contract. As a matter of fact, as I have stated, there have been no importations of Chinese into those islands since the annexation act was passed.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. I should like to state to the Senator, from information I have—I was so informed by a man from those islands—that since the adjournment of Congress, on the 4th of March last, there have been imported into those islands some 18,000 Chinese.

Mr. CULLOM. That is an entire mistake, unless all the testimony that comes to me is untrue. But there have been somewhere between 25,000 and 30,000 Japanese who were brought into that country or who came in; I do not know whether they were brought in or not.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And we have no law against the coming of Japanese.

Mr. CULLOM. They could come here just as freely as they go there, if they choose.

One of the important provisions of the bill which makes some legislation necessary without long delay is the fact that under the annexation act or joint resolution it was determined by the President, on the 11th of September last, that the authorities in the Republic of Hawaii had no power whatever to dispose of or make any agreements touching the disposition of the public lands in those islands.

Mr. President, before going on again with my remarks regularly, my attention has been called to the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to it. It would seem to prohibit the sort of punishment that is provided over there for contract laborers in case they violate their contracts. It reads:

> Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Now, whether that would do away with it or not, I do not know.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand that that would do away with contract labor if a man wants to contract to labor for a term of years.

Mr. CULLOM. But it would do away, I think, with the penal portion.

Mr. FORAKER. I suppose he would have a right to do so.

Mr. SPOONER. It certainly would do away with the right to imprison him for violating a contract. It would do away with the penal part.

Mr. FORAKER. It would do away with the penal part of it.

Mr. CULLOM. That is what I said.

I was referring to the public-land business. The authorities there supposed that as the annexation act provided that until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands all the civil, judicial, and military powers exercised by the officers of the existing government in such islands should be vested in such officer or officers and should be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States should direct, and the Government of the United States took substantially the same view, but upon closer investigation the President came to the conclusion that there was no authority whatever left in the republic of Hawaii to deal with the question of the disposition of the public lands.

Senators will see upon reading the joint resolution of annexation that every vestige of power apparently (and that was the construction the Attorney-General and the President gave to it) was taken away from the authorities of those islands as to public lands, so that they could not under the annexation law do anything looking to the disposition or use of them even. So the whole territory there is held up by the condition that exists, so far as dealing in the lands is concerned, either for homesteads or for uses or leases or in any other way. Therefore it is important that something shall be done, in the first place, to pass a bill getting an organization there and establishing the Territory and putting somebody in authority, as well also as to validate the transactions that have been in good faith carried on there while the authorities in the island supposed that they had the power to go on and sell or lease land or make agreements about them as they chose.

Under this provision the President continued the establishment as it existed when the annexation act passed, and the result was that the authorities supposed that they could go right on as before in the disposition of lands as the situation might require. The result was that sales of land were made, though not to any very large extent, agreements were made, leases were made, contracts for homesteads were made, and on the date I have indicated—the 11th of September—an Executive order was made by the President notifying the Hawaiian republic that that government had no power to make any sale or disposition of the public lands in the islands; and that all contracts or agreements for such sale or other disposition of public lands should be discontinued, and that the purchaser should be notified that the same were null and void, and any consideration paid to the legal authorities on account thereof should be refunded.

This order put a sudden stop to all transactions touching in any way the public lands or realty of the islands, and greatly embarrassed the people thereby, so that the representatives of that government have strongly appealed to Congress to pass some act giving relief, and the committee has placed in the bill under consideration an amendment which reads as follows:

> That all sales, grants, leases, and other disposition of the public domain and agreements concerning the same, and all franchises granted by the Hawaiian government in conformity with the laws of Hawaii prior to the 11th day of September, 1899, are hereby ratified and confirmed.

That is made for the purpose of curing the situation and confirming the contracts that have been made. Senators will find the document in the Document Room, I suppose, which gives in detail every single transaction that has been made by that government or its officers in reference to the lands referred to.

This provision is believed to be right for the reason that every transaction which has taken place on the part of the Government there has been examined, and the committee have found no reason against confirming the agreements which have been made in connection with the lands of that Territory.

Grants were made of 254 parcels of land, which included 15,334 acres, valued at seventy-eight thousand and odd dollars. Of this area, however, about 8,000 acres were granted for land patents made in pursuance of agreements entered into before the act of annexation, and 4,500 acres were granted under the right of purchase lease system, and the applicants for these lands were residents in nearly every case who desired to improve the lands and acquire homesteads, etc.

The committee therefore believed that the sales made after the annexation of the islands and before the President's order should be ratified, because they were all made in good faith and in the interest of the growth and increased wealth of the islands.

The annexation act relative to public lands, as the Senate will remember, provided that all revenue from or proceeds of such lands, except as regards such part thereof as might be used or occupied for civil and military or naval purposes of the United States, or assigned for the use of the local government, should be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands for educational and other purposes, and while the Government has control of the subject whatever may be realized from the lands goes not to the United States generally, but to the islands, for the purposes of education or other public use.

There is no land to be sold for the benefit of the United States Treasury generally, because all the proceeds of it are to go into the treasury there for educational and other public purposes, determined, as I suppose, by that government when we set it up.

I have heard inquiry whether there are any lands really belonging to descendants of the crown. All the lands called crown lands, not now actually owned by individuals, obtained by deed or other conveyance, have been treated and held as any other public or government lands; and according to the record I have no doubt of the fact that whatever title to lands once belonging to the king existed, that title passed to other parties, and that there are no lands in the islands to-day subject to just claim by any descendant of the crown. Whoever may suppose he has a claim will have to go to the courts for its adjudication.

In my judgment, when in 1893 the monarchy ended, the lands reverted to the provincial government and then to the republic.

A word about the leases in connection with the real estate in the island. As the leases expire it is the policy of the Government to dispose of the lands as homesteads for the people as rapidly as it can be done. A large proportion of the sugar plantations belongs to the corporation or individual in fee. The general impression has seemed to be that the great sugar plantations were all government lands, but that is not correct. Some of them, perhaps, are, but the great body of them are lands owned by some individual or corporation having an actual title to them.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator what is to be the final disposition of the public lands and where the proceeds are to be applied. Are they, like the lands of the public-land States and Territories, the property of the United States, and are the proceeds to go into the General Treasury or are they to be the property of Hawaii?

Mr. CULLOM. I have just been stating, if the Senator will allow me, that under the annexation act, the joint resolution, all the public lands of those islands go to the islands for educational and other public purposes. I think the general impression there is that the great body of the money for that purpose will be for educational purposes and for the construction of highways over the island, so that the people can get about from one section to another.

Mr. HALE. Is there a special segregated fund provided for that absorbs this money?

Mr. CULLOM. How does the Senator mean?

Mr. HALE. From the sales of public land for the purpose of education. Where will it actually go?

Mr. CULLOM. It will go into the Hawaiian treasury, I suppose.

Mr. SPOONER. As a school fund?

Mr. CULLOM. As a school fund.

Mr. HALE. As a separate fund?

Mr. CULLOM. As a fund separate and distinct from anything else.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is pretty certain about that?

Mr. CULLOM. The annexation act requires it.

Mr. HALE. It provides for that?

Mr. CULLOM. It provides that it shall go for educational and other public purposes; that to be determined, as I suppose, by the authorities of the islands themselves.

Mr. HALE. That would not be an educational fund? However, I have not examined that act, and I do not know.

Mr. CULLOM. I will read the clause which refers to it.

Mr. HALE. Let us see what that says.

Mr. CULLOM. It is as follows:

> The existing laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands; but the Congress of the United States shall enact special laws for their management and disposition: Provided, That all revenue from or proceeds of the same, except as regards such part thereof as may be used or occupied for the civil, military, or naval purposes of the United States, or may be assigned for the use of the local government—
> That is, portions of the land—
> shall be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands for educational and other public purposes.

I suppose under that provision the Congress of the United States might perhaps control the use of the fund, provided it kept within those limits. I do not know whether that is so or not. It is a matter of construction.

Mr. HALE. The provision as to the educational fund does not seem to be very carefully guarded. I do not see but what that fund might be spoliated for almost any purpose, and under emergencies it might be taken for a great many other purposes. I have not examined as to that.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the joint resolution we passed for annexation.

Mr. HALE. My question led to this point: Whether this bill which the Senator has reported carries out what is evidently the intention and purpose of that act, and whether in form it guards and establishes an educational fund that shall not be spoliated for other purposes?

Mr. CULLOM. There may be some additional legislation necessary to what is in this bill or in the annexation act.

Mr. HALE. I should say so, for that purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to think there ought to be some additional legislation.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The bill has this provision——

Mr. HALE. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. From the Hawaiian bill.

Mr. HALE. What page?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Page 32, line 23:

> All funds arising from the sale or lease or other disposal of such lands shall be appropriated by the laws of the government of the Territory of Hawaii and applied to such uses and purposes for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Territory of Hawaii as are consistent with the joint resolution of annexation, approved July 7, 1898.

The joint resolution says that Congress shall legislate with reference to the subject.

Mr. SPOONER. But the joint resolution does not dedicate the proceeds of the public lands to educational purposes.

Mr. HALE. It does not.

Mr. SPOONER. It says "for educational and other public purposes." It may all be devoted to educational purposes, or none of it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think this provision needs some amendment.

Mr. HALE. I think so, too.

Mr. CULLOM. As a matter of fact, I think the authorities now in control of the islands regard education and the public roads and highways as the most important subjects for attention, and the probabilities are that, if left alone, they will divide that fund for those purposes.

Mr. HALE. That is quite likely; but I do not think we should leave this in the realm of probabilities. Here is to be a very considerable fund. It seems to be the purpose and the expectation that it shall be devoted to education. It consists of valuable tracts of lands; and everybody knows if you leave the disposition of any funds or the avails of any property without guarding it and tying it up for a special purpose, in emergencies it may be taken for anything, and the design will be thwarted.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It is perfectly plain from the provisions of the bill that that whole subject is remitted by Congress to the local legislature.

Mr. CULLOM. To their direction.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But the resolution of annexation retains it in Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. The bill reads:

> All funds arising from the sale or lease or other disposal of such lands shall be appropriated by the laws of the government of the Territory of Hawaii and applied to such uses and purposes for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Territory of Hawaii as are consistent with the joint resolution of annexation, approved July 7, 1898.

The joint resolution of annexation did not dedicate these funds or the proceeds of the sales of public lands to educational purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. Not fully.

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. But "to educational and other purposes."

Mr. SPOONER. "And other public purposes." Under this bill as it stands the Senator from Maine is perfectly right, it seems to me, in saying that the legislature of Hawaii may appropriate the proceeds of the public lands to any public purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not raising any question on that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But there is an unrepealed act of Hawaii that you do not repeal by this bill:

> SEC. 202. All proceeds of sales of public lands shall be set apart as a special fund for the payment of the bonded indebtedness of the government or for the purchase of other lands, as provided by section 191.

Mr. CULLOM. That has been repealed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That has not been repealed.

Mr. CULLOM. It is repealed by the fifth and sixth sections of this bill, if in conflict with its provisions.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is not repealed specially, and many special repeals are made by the bill.

Mr. HALE. But still it would be clearly repealed by a subsequent law which makes other provisions. If the Senator will permit me—the bill, of course, will take some time, as it is important—I think his committee had better prepare an amendment to come in at the end of the section which specifically dedicates this fund for educational purposes, and not leave it subject to any previous determination.

Mr. CULLOM. And by that means amend the annexation act.

Mr. HALE. The annexation act is not so specific; and it is important that this matter should be provided for here.

Mr. CULLOM. It says, "for educational and other public purposes."

Mr. HALE. Even that is simply amending by way of limitation. I would add a provision which would make the intention of Congress certain.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is entitled to the floor, the discussion having proceeded for some time by his courtesy.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have obtained some of the information I wanted to get. I should like to know something about the final disposition of the lands. I assume from what has been said that there will be some amendments offered, because we seem to be sadly out of line in the proposition contained in the bill, whichever way we turn it, with our own land policy. Take our Territories, and even our States. Local legislation as to public lands is not considered either safe or desirable, notwithstanding we have unrestricted suffrage.

If I understand the measure before us, the disposition of these lands will lie with the local legislature. I should like, before we get through with this discussion, to know just what the proposition is. Is the legislature of Hawaii to dispose of the lands, and how? I should also like to know what are the reasons, if there are such, for such a different departure from our present land laws, and why it is that the public lands there are to be handled so differently from the manner in which they are handled here. In that connection I hope Senators will consider the subject of what we are going to do eventually with our own United States Government public lands to relieve the situation between the United States and the several States and Territories.

Mr. TILLMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], I call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the provision in the joint resolution for the annexation of Hawaii, which is as follows:

> The existing laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands, but the Congress of the United States shall enact special laws for their management and disposition.

Therefore, we are not going to turn them over to the Hawaiian local legislature unless we abrogate the implied contract we made with those people when we annexed them. We are doing, however, what we think is right in not turning them over to the selfish fellows there, who are going to steal the balance of the lands.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Illinois, even for a moment, because he has been interrupted until his speech is now scattered over many pages of the RECORD.

Mr. CULLOM. That does not make any difference. We want to get at the facts.

Mr. MORGAN. The question suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and also by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] seems to make it necessary for me to enter into an explanation of some things which I think escaped the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

When the commission got to Hawaii they found a land system there which had sprung from the ancient customs of the Hawaiian people, the chiefs, who are the owners of all the soil. Some time after Kamehameha I established his dynasty there—I think it was in the time of Kamehameha II or III—the government undertook to divide the lands into three parts; one part for the people for homesteads, places to reside, who before that time had no title whatever, but only the mere right of occupancy at the will of the feudal lords; another for the Crown lands proper—lands that belonged to the Crown as an emolument of the Crown and descended with the Crown upon the royal family, or whoever might be inducted into the ruling office; and the other for the chiefs. Thereupon the government of Hawaii surveyed the lands that went to the people, and included in those surveys the homesteads on which they resided.

A Hawaiian plantation, a very good one, ranges all the way from 3 acres up to 20. A 20-acre Hawaiian plantation is a very large one. The people live almost entirely upon taro, a little root which grows in the water and furnishes them with bread. So a man with an acre of taro plant can keep a family of five or six persons supplied with food through the year, hire a Chinaman to do the work for him, and pay him out of the profits of the crop.

Those homesteads were located and the people were located upon the homesteads, plats were made, and title given to every individual who was the head of a family. For those who were not connected with families a separate provision was made. That left, then, the residue of the land to the government—that is to say, to the King and to the nobles and the chieftains.

By a later provision the King was prohibited from alienating the Crown lands, because speculators were going in there, getting the King drunk sometimes, and getting deeds from him for lands that ought not to be sold. So the people demanded of him, and he conceded very readily to that demand, that none of the Crown lands should ever be alienated. The nobles holding their lands in fee simple alienated them to different persons. Out of those lands have come the larger amount of the sugar estates in Hawaii—the lands that belong to the chieftains. Some of the smaller holders, the homestead holders, have sold their lands also; but the larger body of the people of Hawaii still live upon their homesteads and cultivate their taro patches, living as they did originally, having a fee simple title, each one of them, to his own tract of land. The government was benevolent and just in the distribution of the land among the people, and they have always been entirely satisfied with it.

Now, when we look at that situation and look at the fact that each one of those respective homesteads and all of those princely estates held by the chieftains had to be surveyed, mapped, and plotted, and when we come to the fact that they all have been regularly surveyed, mapped, and plotted, we find that a very great work has been done there by the white people who have been in their midst in distributing the land and giving them for the first time homes upon their own property and in their own country.

The government of Hawaii, commencing with the King, not having the right to alienate them, leased the Crown lands to sugar planters. The chiefs, however, sold their lands to the sugar planters. So there are two classes of owners of sugar lands in Hawaii—those who have leased from the government the Crown lands and those who have titles in fee simple derived from the chieftains.

Those Crown lands are assumed by the act of Congress annexing Hawaii to belong to the government and to have passed from the Crown when royalty was banished out of the island, to have passed from that royal government into the hands of the republic.

Mr. DAVIS. And became public domain.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; became public domain. Off of that public domain the Hawaiian government has been selling lands in small quantities to actual settlers. It has not sold any land in large bodies at all, unless it may be a few pieces of land very far up on the heights of Mauna Loa, where there is nothing to be raised except cattle—sold in larger bodies for grazing purposes—but the arable lands, the agricultural lands, have been sold in very small bodies, particularly the coffee lands, to actual settlers, and they had not exactly a homestead right there, but one very similar to it. That was a very just and wise law.

In consequence of this, the number of titles, and the source of title, there has been a great deal of legislation and a great deal of judicial action in Hawaii upon which titles are now based. The Congress of the United States has, since its attention has been called to the subject by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], reserved to this Government the final right of the disposal of those lands and of the proceeds, with the qualification that whatever proceeds were realized from them should be given for the benefit of the people of Hawaii, but in what particular way is not designated in that statute.

There were some funds in the treasury when we got there, derived from the sale of the public lands, and the commission supposed, under the arrangement that was made under this act of Congress, that the local government there, having a general right of legislation and the powers of government, would proceed to sell those smaller parcels of this land and realize funds from those sales. The commission concluded, therefore, that the money that was received from such sales and the money that was in the treasury derived from such sales should be disposed of by the local government; but they provided in section 75 for the investigation of all of these land questions, hoping that Congress would provide for the investigation in this bill, and that it could be sooner accomplished and that we could have a thorough statement of the entire situation there, which, I think, is covered by section 75, which reads:

> SEC. 75. That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to examine the laws of Hawaii relating to public lands, agriculture, and forestry, the proceedings thereunder, and all matters relating to public lands, forests, agriculture, and public roads, bearing upon the prosperity of the Territory, and to report thereon to the President of the United States, which duties shall be performed with all convenient speed.

The first question that arises in the mind of everyone who hears this language is, Why do you propose to confer this power upon the Secretary of Agriculture instead of the Secretary of the Interior? The main reason is that the cultivation of trees in Hawaii is a necessary pursuit for the good of the people. That government now is cultivating large orchards of trees upon the heights of the different ranges of mountains and hills, where the land is very fertile but still high, and distributing those trees through the islands, and thousands and hundreds of thousands and millions of trees have been grown on the islands at places that were hitherto entirely barren.

I will give an illustration. There is a tree that is well known in Texas, called the chaparral plant, or the chaparral bean. That used in Hawaii was introduced from Peru. It is not precisely like the Texas tree, but very like it, and is called the algaroba. It is a tree that bears a long pod, with very fine, rich seed in it. The pod, the hull itself, and all of its contents are as sweet as sugar. The tree bears very abundantly, throws off its pods every morning during the entire year, there being no frost in that country, and furnishes a large supply of most excellent forage for all kinds of industrial animals. The beeves get very fat. The fattest beeves I have ever seen in my life were in Hawaii. They were really disfigured with fat. They were fattened upon these pods.

Another very fine quality of the tree is that it is most excellent firewood, an article that is a little scarce in Hawaii, or was scarce when this new system was inaugurated; but all kinds of fruit, all kinds of flowering plants, and shrubs are cultivated in those mountain ranges by the government, and it is very essential that it should be done.

Agriculture, horticulture, floriculture in Hawaii are very important and very profitable lines of industry. Hawaii without roads, of course, is an impassable country, except to men upon mountain ponies, or to goats, or something of that kind.

That government has devoted itself and the proceeds of the sales of the public lands very largely to the making of roads, so that there is no country I know of now that is better supplied with very fine roads than Hawaii. One road from the volcano to the town of Hilo, 31 miles long, flanked with coffee plantations on either side, is the most beautiful road I think I have ever seen, almost if not entirely, worthy of comparison with Pennsylvania avenue for its solidity, for its grade, and everything else; so that a man can get on a bicycle, they tell me, at the mountain house on the mountain of Kilauea and run into Hilo, 31 miles, without putting his foot on the pedals of the bicycle, except to hold back, and he has not very much of that to do. That is a very beautiful road, and there are other roads of that kind.

The combination of agriculture and road making and the sale and disposal of the public lands are all put under this commission to be reported to the Congress of the United States, in order that we may enact legislation here intelligently, and in the meantime that the money which has been derived from the sale of lands, which was, before this commission reported, in the treasury, and that derived since, can be applied by that government there; that is to say, it will be applied, and no doubt has been applied, by that government to the making of these same roads and to these same purposes. It is to authorize and to justify that action on their part that the bill is in the form in which it is. It may be a little complicated, and I felt it was my duty to try to explain it.

Mr. CULLOM. I was myself quite anxious that the Senator from Alabama should make exactly the explanation he has made on the subject. I shall soon conclude what I have to say, if Senators will be kind enough not to interrupt.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator unless the Senator is willing; but there are so many things in this bill which need explanation that I must be excused if I ask him a question.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I notice on page 32 of the bill something that seems rather remarkable, and it is in italics, which makes it even more remarkable. It reads:

> That all sales, grants, leases, and other disposition of the public domain and agreements concerning the same and all franchises granted by the Hawaiian government in conformity with the laws of Hawaii prior to the 11th day of September, 1899, are hereby ratified and confirmed.

We, in the joint resolution annexing the Hawaiian Islands, took the public domain—the lands—out of the jurisdiction of those people, and set them apart for a specific purpose—that is, for the use and benefit of those people, mainly for education. They may have granted or leased all the lands away. We do not know what has been done or is to be done with them, and yet we are asked to ratify in the dark, without any facts before us, the action of the government which has been in existence since the islands were annexed, now for over a year, without any appeal to our courts as to the justice of these grants or leases, or any statement as to the quantity of the land which has been thus disposed of.

Mr. CULLOM. The trouble with the Senator is that he was not listening when I went over that a while ago.

Mr. TILLMAN. How much land has been alienated?

Mr. CULLOM. I have stated that I believe some 54 tracts or parcels, as the case may be, were alienated; and I explained what some of them were.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator tell me, if he knows, how much land is involved in this legislation? I shall be obliged to him for that information.

Mr. CULLOM. What I was going to say to the Senator was this: There is a document, printed for the use of the Senate and the House of Representatives, giving, item by item, every land transaction which has taken place since the annexation of the islands, or since the flag went up there, to the time when the President of the United States made an order stopping any further dealing in lands by the government of those islands. The Senator can see that and look it over at his leisure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, with a multitude of other matters that are piling in here every day, the Senator must not object to one who is not particularly charged with the subject-matter asking those in charge of a particular bill to explain its provisions.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not objecting to the Senator's question.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator seems to think that I am hypercritical.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not objected to any question of the Senator up to this minute, and I hope to continue in the same spirit.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has always been courteous. I simply wanted to have some light on this remarkable matter.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will secure the document to which I have referred and investigate it. I shall be glad to give him any information I have that will throw further light upon the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the Senator, and I will avail myself of his kindness to ask him a great many more questions about this bill before we get through with it.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt of it.

There have been questions raised as to the court system of those islands. I will leave the land business. We found in the republic a system of courts which seemed to be satisfactory to the substantial people of those islands and to everyone else, so far as I know. They have there a supreme court, composed of three members, who are appointed for life or during good behavior. The Americans in that country desire that the court system should not be disturbed, nor should the tenure of office of the judges. The committee, however, felt that a life-tenure office of a Territorial judge was not in harmony with our ideas in this country, and we determined to fix the term of the judges of the supreme court at nine years.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator will permit me, as he submits to interruptions kindly, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. While the Senator is on this point, I should like to inquire of him how long a term the justices or judges of the supreme court will have after the nine years' term for which they are continued?

Mr. CULLOM. The purpose of the bill was to fix the term at nine years.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But it does not do it, I think.

Mr. CULLOM. If it does not, it ought to do it. The further fact is, as I understand, that one of the judges of the supreme court, the chief justice—who is an American, by the way, I believe an American born—on account of ill health, has resigned, so that there are only two others.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, on that very subject I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the last clause in that section, which seems to me to give the judges a life tenure; and that is in conflict with the other part of the section, which gives them a nine years' term, as the Senator will see if he will read the section.

Mr. CULLOM. There may be some little amendments necessary to that provision in the bill, so as to make its purpose entirely clear.

Mr. PETTUS. The bill says the judges are to hold office until there is a vacancy. I suppose it was intended to mean until their successors should be appointed and qualified.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. That is what I am informed was the intention; but if you will look at the bill, you will see it reads "until there is a vacancy."

Mr. CULLOM. It ought to be until their successors are appointed and confirmed.

The committee believed, as I said, that it was in the interest of good government and in harmony with the wishes of the people of that Territory that we should not overturn their system of government either in the courts or otherwise where it could be avoided consistent with our ideas of republican government.

I want Senators to bear in mind that we are dealing now with an old government, a well-established government of a people, which has existed for many years, and not dealing with a few scattered settlements over the prairies or in a land which has not been settled, but with a government existing, which has been running for years, and a very good government at that, so far as order and honesty and everything of that kind can make it so.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question while he is dealing with the subject of the judiciary in Hawaii?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is any appeal provided by this bill from any judgment of the supreme court?

Mr. CULLOM. Of the Territory?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. None whatever. There is a system of courts there.

Mr. SPOONER. That is peculiar, is it not?

Mr. CULLOM. It is peculiar to that country. It does not exist in our Territories, either in Arizona or anywhere else. There we have an appeal. But the theory of this bill is that they have a supreme court, a circuit court, and other inferior courts, and there are appeals from one to another of the territorial courts, and those judges, either of the circuit or supreme court, have nothing to do with decisions on other statutes than those local to the islands. They exist just as in a State.

Mr. SPOONER. The trouble is Hawaii is not a State.

Mr. CULLOM. No; it is not a State.

Mr. SPOONER. They have in the Territories, of course, the nisi prius judges in the courts, and then they have a supreme court, but there is in certain cases an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. In capital cases. For instance, a man is tried for a capital crime, and he believes that errors have intervened in the trial, or that he has been deprived of some rights under the Constitution, and he has a right to appeal. Why should not that right be given as to this Territory as well as to all the rest of the Territories?

Mr. CULLOM. Possibly it ought to be; but still there is a government which has existed with this system of courts for very many years, and so far as anybody knows justice has been meted out to the people in civil suits as well as in criminal proceedings.

Mr. SPOONER. The same thing may be said of some of our own Territories.

Mr. CULLOM. Possibly it may; but why is it necessary to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court or a circuit court of the United States when there is a system there which already provides for appeals from one court to another and which seems to be satisfactory? The commission thought that all that was necessary was to maintain the condition as it exists there, it being thoroughly established and satisfactory to the people.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems to me, if the Senator will permit me to make the observation, that the difficulty is we are dealing with this as a Territory and at the same time as an independent government.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true, in a sense. Yet is there any reason in the Constitution why we should not have a system of courts in Hawaii just as there now exists?

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any reason in the Constitution why we should have a right of appeal from the courts in our Territories?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know whether it is needed or not, but there is a system, and the people are familiar with it. They have been living under it for years and years, and they understand it, and it seems to answer all their purposes. Now, why upset that and establish a new system when that is entirely satisfactory to the people?

Mr. SPOONER. My suggestion does not contemplate upsetting it, but simply giving in the case of Hawaii as in other Territories the right of appeal in certain cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. If it is the desire of the Senator to add that, I have no objection; but I do not think we ought to incur any additional expense unless it is necessary to good government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again, to remark right here that so long as Hawaii was an independent government of course it was not going to appeal to any other jurisdiction, but now that those islands have become a Territory of this country, it does seem to me a remarkable proposition that their laws were so perfect and are so perfect now and their administration is so just and righteous that we would deny even our own citizens who go there the right to appeal to our court of last resort here?

Mr. CULLOM. When our citizens go there and identify themselves with that country they do not want any, so far as I know. They are very happy as they are, with their present system of courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. That must certainly be the garden of the gods. If it is such a happy place, we ought to emigrate there.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the Senator go there and see if they do not convert him to that system.

I am not going to take up the time of the Senate much longer. The fact is it is pretty difficult to speak here at all with any continuity of thought. I have been disposed to yield to everyone, because I want to bring out as a matter of fact whatever objections there are to the bill, so that we may know how to deal with it.

Mr. President, I believe an amendment is pending here to be offered, the purpose of which is to delay the extension of our customs laws over the Territory to some future time, and in meantime allow the present relation as to customs laws, treaties, and regulations to remain as they are. I am opposed to any such amendment to the bill. There has existed substantial free trade between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands for several years. The great product raised in the islands is sugar and has been for many years. Common sugar comes to the United States free under the reciprocity treaty.

There seems to me to be no reason for delaying the extension of our customs laws over the islands, the States making nothing by such a policy, but, as I believe, will lose; and besides, I am unable to sympathize with a policy of government that reaches out to annex new territory and when it is obtained to adopt a policy detrimental to the territory acquired, lest some interest in some of the States may be in some way affected by treating such territory as we deal with our Territories nearer to us. This Territory occupies a different relation to the United States from any of the acquired territory as the result of war. We may be said to have claimed it for fifty years. The people of the islands who have made the islands prosperous and happy are Americans and as intelligent and patriotic as can be found in any portion of this Union, and let us not deal with them as though they were vassals or unworthy of our confidence.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Before taking up the question of customs and treaties, which will certainly give rise to much debate, I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois in charge of the bill to explain to me the provision on page 20 as to appropriations. It is a very important question. As I understand the provision, if the legislature of the Hawaiian Islands fail to provide the necessary sums to carry on the government and adjourn, the governor can call them in extra session. So far that is the ordinary course. There is nothing remarkable about it.

Mr. CULLOM. No.

Mr. VEST. But in the meantime, before the next legislature meets in extra session or the same legislature, the treasurer, with the advice of the governor, can proceed to expend the money in the treasury on the basis of the preceding year's appropriation.

Mr. SPOONER. It is declared to be reenacted.

Mr. VEST. Yes; for that purpose. I have never seen any such provision as that, and it seems to me it is liable to very serious objection, because there may be very large appropriations during one year which are not necessary in the next year.

Mr. CULLOM. That provision, as the Senator will observe, can only be brought into requisition after the governor, as I remember, has actually reconvened or made proclamation reconvening the legislature, and only for the time, after there is exhausted the appropriation which was made by a previous legislature, until a new legislature or the same legislature can make an appropriation. It is an unusual provision, I admit.

Mr. VEST. There can be no question of exhaustion about it, because it goes on specifically to provide that the treasurer shall advance the money—that is, take it out of the treasury—on the basis of the preceding year's appropriation, and expend it.

Now, the objectionable feature of it, as I was going to say, is to having this extraordinary power, which ought to be exercised alone by the legislature, vested in the treasurer, with the advice of the governor.

Mr. CULLOM. That power is in their constitution now, and it was insisted upon by the commissioners from Hawaii and finally yielded on the part of the commissioners from this side. It has been guarded as well as we could do, so that it will only be used when the governor convenes the legislature and until they can come together and make an appropriation.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But it is until the legislature shall have acted?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If they never act, the treasurer will go on and expend the money.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; the government has to live in some way.

Mr. VEST. I am not indulging in hypercriticism; I think this is a very good bill, but I do not see how this is practicable. I do not see how the treasurer can take appropriations which were necessary and right for one year as the basis for his expenditure when the legislature has failed to make appropriations for another year. That is the trouble. I never saw any such provision.

Mr. MORGAN. We do it all the time here with permanent appropriations.

Mr. VEST. Yes; but the amount is fixed, and we continue it.

Mr. MORGAN. It is fixed and continued by this proposed act.

Mr. CULLOM. Usually by joint resolution we extend the appropriations from month to month.

Mr. VEST. That is the ordinary provision.

Mr. CULLOM. We in that way extend the appropriations heretofore made.

Mr. VEST. That is the ordinary practice in Congress. It is entirely different from this.

Mr. CULLOM. I know it is.

Mr. VEST. Suppose we were to permit the Treasurer of the United States, or even the Secretary of the Treasury, when Congress had adjourned, and for good reasons to itself had not made an appropriation, to take the money in hand himself, and with the advice of the President go on and expend the tax money of the people on the basis of a year which was gone, and when certain circumstances prevailed and Congress had in its discretion made appropriations. Here is a case where the legislature fails or refuses to appropriate. The governor then calls an extra session. He does not know whether that extra session is about to make appropriations or not. And, without waiting for that legislature to act at all, the treasurer comes to the governor and says, "The legislature adjourned without making an appropriation, and I want to expend the money that is in the treasury." There is no case of exhaustion about it. He goes on and expends what is in the treasury. The governor says, "All right." The legislature meets and again refuses to appropriate. It may think that the condition of affairs does not justify an appropriation, and the treasurer in the meantime has expended the money.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, conceding that all that the Senator from Missouri suggests would occur in the contingency he supposes, would not that be better than a suspension of government? Would not the latter be the absolute consequence otherwise?

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, that thing has occurred frequently in Congress and in State legislatures, and there has been no suspension of government. If the government has credit and is a stable government, there is no trouble about existing upon credit or obtaining supplies upon credit. That occurs every year.

Mr. FORAKER. I make this inquiry because when this matter was considered in committee the same ideas occurred to me that have been expressed by the Senator from Missouri; but I thought it was better to incorporate this provision than to have the consequences which would inevitably result if there were not some way to meet the necessary expenses of the government. It did not seem to me a very dangerous provision, because it relates only to the current expenses of government.

Mr. VEST. I do not think it would stop the government. The government can always get money enough to pay.

Mr. FORAKER. It does not cover appropriations that may be made for unusual necessities or for improvements, but only the necessary current expenses of the government.

Mr. CULLOM. The provision reads:

> That in case of failure of the legislature to pass appropriation bills providing for payments of the necessary current expenses of carrying on the government and meeting its legal obligations as the same are provided for by the then existing laws, the governor shall, upon the adjournment of the legislature, call it in extra session for the consideration of appropriation bills, and until the legislature shall have acted the treasurer may, with the advice of the governor, make such payments, for which purpose the sums appropriated in the last appropriation bill shall be deemed to have been reappropriated.

The treasurer will have no right to go outside of the lines specified and spend the money for a purpose for which an appropriation has not heretofore been made, so that if the provision is allowable at all, which I have always doubted a little, it is pretty well guarded, I think, so that there is no probable danger in allowing it to be done.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, one objection to it, if the Senator will permit me, is that the money is to be expended by the treasurer in this emergency upon the basis of a former appropriation and not in view of the necessities of the government at the time the money is to be expended.

But the serious objection to it is that you take the power of appropriation away from the legislative department, where it ought always to rest, and put it into the hands of one man who is advised, not directed even, by another. It is hardly necessary to say that this power of appropriation and taxation has convulsed the civilized nations of the world from time to time. England was drenched in blood in 1688 over this very question of the power of the King in a monarchy to take the tax money of the people and spend it without the consent of Parliament. But I do not want to go into that.

Here is an entire departure from the American system of appropriations. Instead of the legislature fixing the amount to be expended, and whether anything shall be expended or not, if they in their legislative discretion refuse to appropriate and adjourn, here is a treasurer who may be the tool of the governor, and the governor himself not a very reliable person—it might happen, of course—and they take this extraordinary power in their own hands and on the basis of a former year exhaust the treasury.

My friend the Senator from Alabama says it is the same power that we exercise. I do not see that we exercise any such power. Has the Secretary of the Treasury ever had it or has the President ever had it? We have a provision that no money shall be taken out of the Treasury except by an act of Congress—not a dollar—and it is one of the wisest provisions we could possibly have.

Mr. MORGAN. What I referred to, if the Senator will allow me, is the fact that we have a number of permanent appropriations.

Mr. VEST. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MORGAN. And whether Congress meets or does not meet, those appropriations stand and the Secretary of the Treasury can pay the money out on those appropriations, although they are not renewed.

Mr. VEST. But that is where Congress has acted.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all this provides for.

Mr. VEST. That is where Congress has acted. Here there has been no such action.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; the legislature has acted and fixed the basis of appropriations.

Mr. VEST. But for a different year, and have made no appropriation that year, and have adjourned.

Mr. MORGAN. It makes no difference what year it is for. It is a permanent appropriation.

Mr. VEST. I do not so understand it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Illinois will conclude his remarks this morning. I want to see them in the RECORD.

Mr. CULLOM. I want to make only one more remark about the situation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Please pardon me once more. Does the provision giving the governor and the treasurer the power to expend money as though it had been reappropriated carry with it the power to relevy taxes? We know that the power to appropriate money is limited by the amount of money in the treasury, and if there is no more there, this provision can do no harm; but I wish to know whether this gives the autocratic government by one man the power of levying taxes as well as appropriating money?

Mr. CULLOM. There is no power to levy extra taxes. So the Senator is safe on that.

Mr. TILLMAN. The treasurer can go no further than the bottom of the strong box?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the condition of affairs now in Hawaii is most deplorable. Unfortunately for those people, they are now being seriously afflicted and scourged by what is known as the bubonic plague. It broke out there some time ago in what was called Chinatown, and the authorities and people of the islands have been compelled to destroy some 30 acres of the city. The portion destroyed was thickly settled by Chinese, Japanese, and possibly some other nationalities. The whole tract was burnt, not perhaps entirely by order of the authorities, but in attempting to burn a portion of it the fire got beyond their control and the whole 30 acres were swept away. The result is that some 8,000 people are now in quarantine, their property, even much of their clothing, being destroyed. The people of the city of Honolulu are taking care of them largely at their own personal expense, giving up their various avocations of business to that work of humanity.

I understand as a matter of fact that a business man does not open his business door until he has spent two or three hours trying to do something for these unfortunate people, and they close their business houses at 3 o'clock and resume the work of caring for the unfortunate sufferers.

That government is appealing to the United States for action upon this bill, so that they may have as quickly as possible some legal authority for the expenditure of money and for putting the city in such condition as to prevent the further spread or breaking out of that terrible disease. I believe it is true that the President of the United States has authorized the president of the republic, Mr. Dole, to use such funds belonging to the Territory or the republic as may be necessary for the immediate care and protection of those suffering people and for the construction of temporary quarters for their use.

And also the President has authorized the president of the republic to appoint a commission to investigate and allow such amounts as those unfortunate people have suffered from the necessary destruction of their property. All this, however, is embarrassing to the Administration, embarrassing to the authorities of the islands, and call for action by this Government, so that their affairs may be conducted strictly according to law, and that they may know what their rights are in the premises.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President and Senators, that there may not be unnecessary delay in the passage of this bill. Humanity calls for immediate action, and I am sure that the history of the Senate and of Congress has shown their willingness to answer promptly such appeals.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, there is one point to which the Senator from Illinois failed to advert in his explanation of the bill which I wish he would think of over night. I will premise what I have to say about it by stating that I am as anxious to have a bill passed establishing a civil government for the Territory of Hawaii as he is, I think.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But we ought at least to scrutinize it with a good deal of care. I know that is the intention of the committee, and therefore he will pardon me for referring to the matter to which I am about to refer.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will realize from what has happened this afternoon that I am anxious for a free, full, and critical investigation and discussion of the bill, so as to make it as nearly right as we can before it goes out of this Chamber.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do appreciate that. But section 88 proposes to establish a court there which I do not think we have any power under the Constitution of the United States to establish in that Territory. We have been providing governments for Territories now for a hundred years, nearly. It is nearly a hundred years since we acquired Louisiana, and at an earlier period than that we provided a government for the Northwest Territory. But we have never yet established a constitutional court in a Territory. I have always supposed that the reason why we did not was because we could not under the Constitution.

The Constitution says:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

It has been the universal acceptation of judges and lawyers and legislators that that section of the Constitution referred to courts to be established in the States only. Consequently we have one Supreme Court and we have our circuit courts, more recently our circuit courts of appeal, and our district courts in the States. We have never established a constitutional court in a Territory. The courts which we have established in the Territories have been established under the provision of the Constitution which provides that—Congress shall have power to * * * make all all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Those courts have repeatedly been adjudicated to be not constitutional courts, but legislative courts. It has been the practice in constituting the legislative courts of the Territories to give them jurisdiction over cases arising under the laws of the United States and the Constitution of the United States. Admiralty jurisdiction has been conferred upon them, and a variety of jurisdictions, as relating to the laws of the United States. But I am very firm in my opinion that we can not do that which it is proposed to do in section 88. That proposes to establish a court in the Territory of Hawaii in all respects like the district and circuit courts of the United States in the States, and consequently says nothing about the tenure of the judge, as by the Constitution a judge of such a court has to be appointed during good behavior and with life tenure.

I will read the section to show how completely it is such a court as is contemplated by the Constitution, and called there an inferior court, and how completely it resembles and is like the district and circuit courts of the United States. Now listen. There is no escape from it. If it be said that the giving a term of office during good behavior takes it out of the category of constitutional courts, there is other language here which makes it impossible to take it out of that category.

That a judicial district of the United States is established for the Territory of Hawaii—

The judicial districts of the United States are the judicial districts referred to or authorized by article 3. They are judicial districts within the States, not within the Territories.

That a judicial district of the United States is established for the Territory of Hawaii, to be called the district of Hawaii, which shall be included in the ninth judicial circuit of the United States.

It never has been supposed before that you could extend a judicial circuit under the Constitution beyond the limits of the States.

The President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a district judge, a district attorney, and a marshal of the United States for the said district. The district court for the said district shall have, in addition to the ordinary jurisdiction of district courts of the United States, jurisdiction of all cases cognizable in a circuit court, and shall proceed therein in the same manner as a circuit court.

So it gives it the power both of the district and circuit courts of the United States as organized in the States.

The laws of the United States relating to appeals, writs of error, removal of causes, and other matters and proceedings as between the courts of the United States and the courts of the several States shall govern in such matters and proceedings as between the courts of the United States and the courts of the Territory of Hawaii. Regular terms of said court shall be held, etc.

Mr. President, I do not wish to go into a further argument of this matter at the present time. I desire to point it out simply for the purpose of the consideration of the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have listened with very great interest and appreciation to what the Senator from Connecticut has said as to section 88. It is true, as the Senator has stated, that we have never yet in legislating for a Territory seen fit to create a constitutional court in a Territory.

Mr. SPOONER (in his seat). We can not do it.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand that there is any prohibition in the Constitution against our doing it. The practice has been that we have not. If the Senator will allow me to conclude the sentence I was about to utter, then he can interrupt me if he so desires.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not interrupt the Senator by rising, did I?

Mr. FORAKER. No; but the Senator did by a very proper injection. If it were true, as stated by him, that we have no power to do it, that would be the end of this debate. But where does the Senator get authority to say that we have no power in legislating for a Territory to create a United States district court proper there if we see fit to do so?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean by that question the phrase as used in the Constitution, "in which shall be vested the judicial power of the United States?"

Mr. FORAKER. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. I get it from several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. I have read the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I do not get any such conclusion therefrom. On the contrary, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are simply to this effect, as stated by the Senator from Connecticut, that we have never yet seen fit to create a constitutional court, but only legislative courts, for the Territories. But the Supreme Court has nowhere said, so far as I am advised, that it would not be competent for Congress to do so if Congress should see fit.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I will read for just a moment from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the American Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters, 511).

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir; I have it before me.

Mr. SPOONER. The Supreme Court said:

These are not constitutional courts——

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. SPOONER (reading)—

These are not constitutional courts in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the General Government can be vested. They are created by virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the Government; or in virtue of that clause which enables Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories. The jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of the judicial power defined in this article of the Constitution.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, that is true; but what the Senator reads does not meet the question at all. What the Senator reads has reference to the courts that were in fact created, but the Supreme Court does not say in the case of Canter that Congress might not have created a constitutional court in the Territory. If the Senator will bear with me a minute, he will see the point plainly. What Congress did there was to create a court with a limited tenure of office for the judge, and the court was also given a jurisdiction that did not belong to the interpretation of the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States, but local legislation as well. The Supreme Court said these are not constitutional courts, because created as they are they are incapable of receiving the jurisdiction that belongs to a constitutional court of the United States. Then they comment on the fact that they were not intended to be constitutional courts, because they were given a limited tenure instead of a tenure during good behavior, and that was conclusive in that case.

The courts as established in Florida, which were under consideration in the Canter case, have been continued with respect to our Territories, as the Senator from Connecticut said. Their tenure has always been restricted. It has never been a life tenure. The Supreme Court has simply said from that fact it is to be inferred that it was not the intention of Congress to create a constitutional court, but only a legislative court.

I invite the Senator's attention to the case which is the leading case on the subject, McAllister vs. United States, reported in 141 U. S., at page 174 et seq. All the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States made prior to the giving of this decision are here reviewed, and the point I make with respect to them is recognized throughout in all that the court says.

They find that the courts in Utah and the courts in various Territories were not constitutional courts, because Congress had not made them so, had not sought to make them so, and cited as a fact supporting that proposition that they had limited the tenure, which it was incompetent for Congress to do if it was a constitutional court, and they cited the further fact that in all of these Territorial courts the courts were given not only the jurisdiction of the United States district and circuit courts, but the jurisdiction of State courts as well.

Now, there is no objection to Congress giving a life tenure and creating a court with district and circuit jurisdiction alone.

That is recognized in this case to which I have called attention. At page 186 the majority of the court, in discussing the proposition, say that in all of this legislation the significant fact is—I am trying to read the substance of it; I had better read the whole sentence, and that will put it in better form.

Mr. TELLER. That is better.

Mr. FORAKER. The court say:

> The significance of these enactments, as well as of the acts of 1867 and 1869, and of section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, is in the fact that Congress has uniformly proceeded upon the theory that the judges of Territorial courts were merely legislative courts, and were not entitled, by virtue of their appointment and the Constitution of the United States, to hold their offices during good behavior, unless it was so declared in the respective acts providing for the organization of such courts.

In other words, they come back right to the fact that Congress did not see fit in legislating to establish the court to give a life tenure, but they recognized that Congress might have done so if Congress had seen fit, for Congress in so legislating is without any limitations, as I understand it.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator if that language was not used with reference to the question simply whether the President could remove within the term for which the appointment was made—four years?

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President, the language which I have read was not used with reference to that alone. It is true that in this case the question before the court was as to the power of the President to remove a district judge of Alaska. That district judge had been appointed for a tenure of four years. He was removed without any cause except only that the President wanted to displace him and substitute another man. The Supreme Court say that the civil-tenure law which excepted judges of the United States courts did not except this judge, because Congress evidently intended that he should be only a legislative judge and not a constitutional judge, and they interpreted the civil-tenure act to have reference only to constitutional courts and constitutional judges. But, as I say, in disposing of it they recognized, by the quotation I have made from the opinion of the majority of the court, that Congress might have made that life tenure if Congress had seen fit to do so. In all these cases you will find the court is careful to point out that the reason why they are not constitutional judges is, as in the Canter case, that they have jurisdiction that does not belong to the United States courts, the constitutional courts, as well as that jurisdiction, and because their tenure is made for years instead of for life.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator has evidently overlooked a portion of this opinion of the majority of the court. On page 184, after citing all the former decisions, Judge Harlan says:

> These cases close all discussion here as to whether Territorial courts are of the class defined in the third article of the Constitution. It must be regarded as settled that courts in the Territories, created under the plenary municipal authority that Congress possesses over the Territories of the United States, are not courts of the United States created under the authority conferred by that article.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. If the Senator will allow me, that is not at all inconsistent with what I am contending.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think it is.

Mr. FORAKER. They are speaking of Territorial courts as they have been by Congress created. They are not speaking about the power of Congress to create something different, but they say in every instance, reviewing every one of them, the Congress has not seen fit to create a constitutional court, but only a Territorial court.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to read what Judge Nelson says in the case of Benner vs. Porter (9 Howard). He will find it in the McAllister case, page 181.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. After citing the judicial clause of the Constitution, Article III, section 1, the court said:

> Congress must not only ordain and establish inferior courts within a State, and prescribe their jurisdiction, but the judges appointed to administer them must possess the constitutional tenure of office before they can become invested with any portion of the judicial power of the Union. There is no exception to this rule in the Constitution. The Territorial courts, therefore, were not courts in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government could be deposited. They were incapable of receiving it, as the tenure of the incumbents was but for four years.

Then the court cites the case of Marshall.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly, the court give the reason why they are incapable of receiving them, because they are not constitutional courts. Congress did not design to make them such, and Congress evidenced that fact when it denied to them a life tenure and limited them to a term of years.

Mr. TELLER. Then the court quotes from Marshall, who declared that they were not, I think, very emphatically.

Mr. FORAKER. In the Canter case the court decided and gave the reason why they were not constitutional courts, assigning as the reason that they were given a different jurisdiction from that which belonged to United States courts and because the tenure was restricted to a number of years.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, I agree the court gave the reason, but it did not by any means give the reason the Senator is giving.

Mr. FORAKER. I so understand it.

Mr. TELLER. The court said they were not appointed under that constitutional power to appoint courts, but they were appointed under another power.

Mr. FORAKER. What the court said was that these were courts created by Congress in the exercise of the power conferred upon Congress to legislate for the Territories, and that Congress in the exercise of that power had seen fit here to set up a court with a different jurisdiction from that which belonged to United States courts, and with a tenure limited to a number of years instead of a life tenure, and that was a conclusive fact to show that Congress did not design to make them constitutional courts.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. I thought the Senator was through. I just wanted to say a word upon this subject. It seems to me to be too plain to have much controversy about it.

The constitutional courts provided have a limited jurisdiction; the State courts exercise large jurisdiction. It is a peculiar jurisdiction that is conferred upon the constitutional courts. The constitutional court is a peculiar court. It is a special court. Congress does not derive the power to legislate for the Territories under that provision at all. It derives the power, according to some of the authorities, in some places entirely from the power to dispose of the public property of a Territory, but most of the works on constitutional law say that the power to legislate for the Territories would exist independent of any provision in the Constitution. It is a sovereign power that necessarily belongs to the United States, and when Congress legislate for the Territories they do not create a special court. They create a court with general jurisdiction, covering all the jurisdiction that the States exercise and that the Federal Government exercises.

Mr. TELLER. That is it exactly.

Mr. STEWART. It is one complete jurisdiction. It is a different system altogether; and it may be just such a system as Congress may ordain and appoint. But when you come to constitutional courts, they are very different. They are limited, and by the Constitution a limited jurisdiction is prescribed, whereas a Territorial court may be endowed by Congress with all the jurisdiction, as it usually is, that the courts of the United States have in the States and that the State courts have.

It is all combined in one, and it results from the power to govern the Territories, whether that power be derived from the Constitution or from the very nature of the sovereignty. Most all the authorities refer it to the very nature of sovereignty possessed by the Government.

When you say you have got no constitution for the Territories I deny that. We have got a constitution for the Territories, one that has grown up by custom, and it ought to be as binding upon us as the English constitution is upon England. Ever since the formation of the Constitution we have legislated in one direction. We have given the Territories local self-government; we have given them all the freedom that we enjoy. Now, while you might have power to do almost anything to injure the Territories, you might have power to do wrong as any monarch with unlimited powers would have, we have a Constitution by precedent for a hundred years that tells us that we must be governed by the general principles of liberty, justice, and a republican form of government. We have done it in all instances, and that now is binding upon us without regard to the abstract power that Congress may have.

Congress has power to do wrong. So has any unlimited monarch. So far as the Territories are concerned we have that power, and Congress might exercise it if we were not governed by an unwritten constitution that has grown up, that we must give the Territories all the rights and privileges that we enjoy; that they must have republican government; that they must have local self-government; that they must be governed according to the laws of the most enlightened, being republican, as we are. That we have to do unless we violate every principle that governs us at all anywhere.

But there is no constitution for the Territories except that which has grown up by custom. That has become as binding upon us and as binding upon the consciences of Congress as the Constitution of the United States. We dare not violate it, and we are not going to violate it. It is idle to talk about what Congress might do. Any power might do many wrong things; but in view of the constitutional precedents we have, in view of the custom that has grown up to do justice, to give them free government, Congress is not going to change its policy and become a monster and do wrong. It can not do wrong with regard to them unless we violate the unwritten law, the unwritten constitution that has governed this country from its foundation. There is no danger of Congress violating it. If it makes a departure from that we shall hear from the people.

Mr. FORAKER. I am much obliged to the Senator for the question, but he has so prolonged it I do not know just how to answer it.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. I want to complete my reading, however.

Mr. SPOONER. I only want to get at the right of this thing.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. There are some reasons why, if we can create a constitutional court in Hawaii, I think it might be wise to do it. I want to ask the Senator this question, if he will permit me. I suppose he will admit that in creating a constitutional court we have nothing whatever to do with the tenure of the judge.

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. It is fixed by the Constitution?

Mr. FORAKER. It is fixed by the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. And it can not be other than the constitutional tenure for life or good behavior?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, does the Senator think that court a constitutional court as to the tenure of the judge of which we are not restricted by the constitutional provision at all, but are left entirely free to make it two years or four years or ten years or during good behavior?

Mr. FORAKER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not catch the point of his question, if he asked me one. Do I think what?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator regard that court a constitutional court as to the tenure of the judge of which Congress is entirely free?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. To fix it at two years, or ten years, or during good behavior?

Mr. FORAKER. I think if Congress fixes it at anything less than a life tenure that is evidence that Congress did not intend to create a constitutional court. That is the very point I have been making. But if Congress wants to create a court and give the judge a life tenure it is within the power of Congress to do it.

Mr. SPOONER. No; but my point is this: Congress can not create a constitutional court without a life tenure.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly not. That is what I have been contending.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, is any court as to which Congress may create a shorter than a life tenure a constitutional court?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not this a court in regard to which we may make the tenure four years or ten years, if we choose?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly it is; undoubtedly. Mr. President, after a very careful consideration of this question, and that is the reason why I am particular about it here, we propose in the bill providing a civil government for Puerto Rico that there shall be a United States district court; we call it by that name, but the tenure is only for four years. We limited the tenure for the sole purpose of making it clear that we do not intend to constitute a constitutional court, but only a territorial court within the meaning of all these decisions.

Now, Mr. President, there is no ground for controversy here, because in the case to which I have already alluded, at page 188, the Supreme Court expressly say as follows:

> The whole subject of the organization of Territorial courts, the tenure by which the judges of such courts shall hold their offices, the salary they receive, and the manner in which they may be removed or suspended from office, was left by the Constitution with Congress under its plenary power over the Territories of the United States.

And then, as I called attention a while ago, they say in effect, further on, that in all cases it will be regarded as an evidence that a constitutional court was not intended when the tenure comes under consideration unless Congress has seen fit to give the life tenure, indicating clearly that Congress is invested with plenary power and can make a tenure for life or for any number of years it might see fit. If Congress sees fit to give tenure for less than life, that is conclusive evidence that Congress does not intend to create a constitutional, but only a Territorial court.

But, Mr. President, the Supreme Court calls attention in all these cases to the fact that the jurisdiction given is such as also to show that not a constitutional, but only a legislative court was intended to be created. In the Territories they have the Federal side and the State side or the Territorial side, the one contradistinguished from the other, the one having jurisdiction of all local matters, the other having the jurisdiction that belongs to the courts of the United States. There is not, in my opinion, any question but that the Congress can constitute a court in a Territory and call it what it sees fit, and give the life tenure to that judge and invest him with such jurisdiction as Congress may see fit to invest him with.

Mr. President, there is a controlling reason in my mind why this court should be different from the ordinary Territorial court and should have the jurisdiction that belongs under the Constitution and the laws of the United States to district and circuit courts. That Territory is peculiarly situated from any other Territory that we have. It is away off yonder in the sea and must have an admiralty jurisdiction in its most pronounced sense.

I have only another word to add, and that is, conceding that the power is given, that Congress could create such a court there as it may see fit, the question of policy remains. The Supreme Court has said it has plenary power over and over again, as often as it has had occasion to say it. I have had some misgivings about the question of policy, and I yielded to my associates in the committee as to this bill, but when the committee considered this question in regard to Puerto Rico a few days ago, they took a different view as a matter of policy. There is no question about the matter of power to do it.

We thought it would be better to give to that judge in Puerto Rico but a four years' tenure and make it clearly a Territorial and not a constitutional court; but if we had seen fit to give it the jurisdiction that belongs to United States courts, and then to give it a life tenure, I do not see any reason why we should not have made a United States court and judge within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. ROSS. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ROSS. I understand the Senator to concede that if the tenure of a judge has been for four years, six years, twenty years, or forty years, it would not be a constitutional court, but a legislative court.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not concede any such thing. That is a truism under the Constitution, and there can be no argument about what the Constitution explicitly says.

Mr. ROSS. That is true; and it is true, is it not, because the legislature so fixes it?

Mr. FORAKER. No; it is true because the Constitution so fixes it.

Mr. ROSS. The Constitution so fixes it, and it becomes a legislative court. Now, if Congress in an act relative to a Territory fixes the term of office of the judge at life, it is no less fixed by Congress than it would be if it fixed it for two years or four years or ten years, and is it not just as much a legislative court within the terms of those decisions as if it had been fixed at two years or four years or ten years?

Mr. FORAKER. Not at all; not necessarily so, because the jurisdiction conferred might be such as to show it was designed to make only a Territorial court. There are two things to be taken into consideration, one of tenure and the other of jurisdiction. If the Congress confers upon the court which it creates jurisdiction which does not belong to a constitutional court of the United States, that is one evidence that it was intended within the meaning of the decisions to be only a legislative court; and if Congress saw fit, giving it the same jurisdiction as a United States court in one of the States would have, to limit the tenure to less than life, that would be another conclusive evidence that it was intended to be only a legislative court; and so the courts have held in every one of these cases, as I understand.

Mr. PETTUS. Could not Congress repeal the act the next day after the judge was appointed for life?

Mr. FORAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ROSS. What was the question?

Mr. FORAKER. Could not Congress repeal the act after it was enacted and the judge had been appointed? Undoubtedly it could repeal the law.

Mr. SPOONER. Could Congress do that as to the judge of a constitutional court?

Mr. FORAKER. I am not speaking of what the effect would be on such a constitutional officer; but unquestionably Congress could repeal the law. Whether he has a vested right in his office is another question. He undoubtedly would have a vested right of some kind; I do not know to what extent.

Mr. PETTUS. The question I designed to ask was, could not the Congress abolish the office in a week after the judge was given a life tenure by Congress?

Mr. FORAKER. I think so. I do not think the creation of an office and the appointment of an official to hold it binds Congress for the life of the official who has been appointed and who has become the incumbent.

Mr. ROSS. I wish to ask the Senator another question, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ROSS. Does the court in a Territory get its jurisdiction from the act of Congress or does it get it from the Constitution?

Mr. FORAKER. It gets it from the act of Congress.

Mr. ROSS. Then, is it not a legislative court instead of a constitutional court?

Mr. FORAKER. It is a legislative court.

Mr. ROSS. It seems to me the Senator is confounding the matter, because the tenure is for life and the judge is given the same jurisdiction by the act of Congress that he gets under the Constitution. It is therefore not a constitutional court, but it is merely a legislative court, and gets its whole jurisdiction and term of office from the act of Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator did not follow me closely in the remarks I just made or he would not ask that question. I stated at the beginning that the decisions which have been cited, in which it has been held that the court under consideration was a Territorial court, were each and all cases where the Congress had evidenced by the character of the legislation creating the court that it did not intend a constitutional court, but only a legislative court, the court has pointed out that that intention is derived from the fact, first in the Canter case, and in all the other cases, I believe, without exception, that there was a limited instead of a life tenure. In other cases they pointed out the jurisdiction was different, and they have said, not being a constitutional court, the court was incapable of taking the jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution.

I do not know any reason why, therefore, where we extend the Constitution to a Territory, we may not there create a district court. We have here extended the Constitution of the United States, if we pass this bill, to Hawaii. I do not know of any reason why there should not be a district court established there, if we see fit to adopt the policy of establishing such a court, which of course remains after the question of power has been settled.

There is much to be said in favor of making the court in Hawaii a United States district court, and conferring upon it all the jurisdiction which belongs to district and circuit courts of the United States, because, as I was about to remark a moment ago, that is differently situated from any other Territory that we have yet legislated for. It has need for an admiralty jurisdiction, which does not belong to any interior Territory at any rate, and certainly not in the pronounced sense in which it belongs to that of Hawaii, and there is an abundance of work there for a court with that kind of jurisdiction to exercise.

What I rose to suggest was that a court that is given a clean-cut constitutional jurisdiction in a Territory belonging to the United States, to whom we have extended the Constitution, and the judges of which have been given a life tenure, as is the case here, ought not to be confounded with Territorial courts which have been under consideration in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which have been relied upon.

I now yield with pleasure to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ROSS. I was simply going to ask the Senator if he was not confounding the difference between the source from which the power comes in so characterizing the court, rather than the court itself, or the name of the court. The Senator called it a constitutional court.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator define to me what jurisdiction a United States constitutional court gets from the Constitution proper?

Mr. ROSS. It gets just what is named in the Constitution, and it can not have any other given to it.

Mr. FORAKER. I will ask if it is not necessary to legislate with respect to the jurisdiction of constitutional courts just as much as it is with respect to Territorial courts; and if the term "constitutional court" means anything more than it is a court created by Congress within the contemplation of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress to establish courts?

Mr. ROSS. I understand a constitutional court, within the meaning of the decision, extends to the States only. When you go into the Territories and legislate, then with unlimited power you can give the same term of office to the judges of a court in the Territories and the same jurisdiction, or more or less of it, as Congress may please.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not agree with the Senator that a United States court can not be created except within the States. I do not know of any reason why a United States court may not be created beyond the States, to sit and have jurisdiction outside of the States, in the Territories of the United States, to which we extend the Constitution. I do not agree with the Senator that Congress can legislate for the Territories outside of the States without any limitation whatever.

I should like to ask the Senator what he would do were a measure proposed here prohibiting the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press in Hawaii? Would he, because it is outside of the States, vote for it in view of the fact that the first clause of the Bill of Rights says no law shall be passed by Congress doing any such thing?

I call the Senator's attention to that only to show that there are some positive prohibitions in the Constitution which rest upon us as Senators sitting under the Dome of the Capitol, which we can not disregard, which accompany all legislation that we enact, no matter for whom it may be or whether they are in the Union as an integral part of it or not.

I agree with the general proposition that we are unlimited in our power when legislating for Territories to which we have not extended the Constitution particularly, except only by the positive prohibitions which are laid by the Constitution upon every man who sits here as a legislator, no matter what his view upon the general subject may be. Therefore I say when we come to create courts, we simply say, by virtue of the authority conferred on us by the Constitution, there shall be a court here, and it shall have the jurisdiction we give it, or the jurisdiction of a United States district court proper, and we give it a tenure, which belongs to the judge. I do not know why it is not competent for us to do it. If it is competent for you to say that it is not a constitutional, but only a Territorial court, because it is outside of the States which constitute the Union, you can say that just as well with it having one jurisdiction and one tenure, as you can if it be given another tenure and another jurisdiction.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, it is evident that this interesting discussion can not be completed to-night; and, with the Senator's consent, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agree to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 20, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 19, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. WEEKS, leave was granted to withdraw from the House files, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John H. Wilkinson, Fifty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LANE, for this week, on account of important business.

To Mr. DRIGGS, for three days, on account of illness.

To Mr. LIVINGSTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WARNER, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAX ON BEER.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 8620) amendatory of sections 3339 and 3341 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to internal-revenue tax on fermented liquors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out of said section the following:

"In estimating and computing such tax, the fractional parts of a barrel shall be halves, thirds, quarters, sixths, and eighths; and any fractional part of a barrel containing less than one-eighth shall be accounted one-eighth; more than one-eighth, and not more than one-sixth, shall be accounted one-sixth; more than one-sixth, and not more than one-fourth, shall be accounted one-fourth; more than one-fourth, and not more than one-third, shall be accounted one-third; more than one-third, and not more than one-half, shall be accounted one-half; more than one-half, and not more than one barrel, shall be accounted one barrel; and more than one barrel, and not more than 63 gallons, shall be accounted two barrels, or a hogshead. The said tax shall be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent of the brewery or premises in which such fermented liquors are made, and in the manner and at the time hereinafter specified."

And by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"In estimating and computing the tax imposed by law the fractional part of a barrel shall be halves, thirds, and quarters, and any fractional part of a barrel containing less than one-fourth shall be accounted one-fourth; more than one-fourth and not more than one-third shall be accounted one-third; more than one-third and not more than one-half shall be accounted one-half; more than one-half and not more than one barrel shall be accounted one barrel; and more than one barrel and not more than 63 gallons shall be accounted two barrels, or a hogshead. The said tax shall be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent of the brewery or premises in which such fermented liquors are made, and in the manner and at the time hereinafter specified."

SEC. 2. That section 9 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That section 3341 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3341. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared, for the payment of such tax, suitable stamps denoting the amount of tax required to be paid on the hogsheads, barrels, and halves, thirds, and quarters of a barrel of such fermented liquors (and shall also cause to be preparpe suitable permits for the purpose hereinafter mentioned), and shall furnish the same to the collectors of internal revenue, who shall each be required to keep on hand at all times a sufficient supply of permits and a supply of stamps equal in amount to two months' sales thereof, if there be any brewery or brewery warehouse in his district; and such stamps shall be sold and permits granted and delivered by such collectors only to the brewers of their districts, respectively. Such collectors shall keep an account of the number of permits delivered and of the number and value of the stamps sold by them to each brewer.'"

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, let us have a second.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand a second.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a second, and the gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Who demanded the second, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I thought I demanded a second.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I realize the position of the gentleman from Tennessee, and if there is controversy about this bill I shall not feel like taking charge of one side of it by reason of my demand for a second.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts opposed to the measure?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Not necessarily; probably not. Is the gentleman from Tennessee opposed to it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say frankly that I shall not vote against the measure, but I demanded a second in order that the usual time for debate might be had, so that if any gentleman desires to be heard in opposition to the bill he can secure time. My object in asking for a second is merely to control the time.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me five minutes in case I desire it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] to withdraw the demand for a second and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to renew it. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, this bill affects two provisions of the internal-revenue laws—first, that section of the Revised Statutes which authorizes the manufacturers of beer to put up their product in packages as large as a hogshead and as small as one-eighth of a barrel.

In addition to that, it affects the section of the present internal-revenue law which requires the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to provide stamps of denominations applicable to all packages of wood, from the hogshead down to the one-eighth of a barrel of beer. The object of the bill is to abolish these minor packages of beer, to wit, packages of one-sixth of a barrel and one-eighth of a barrel.

I will be frank enough to say that the bill concerns the brewing industry of the country more than it does either the Treasury or the public at large.

The entire brewing interest of the United States, so far as the committee is advised, desires the privilege of putting up its products in packages larger than one-sixth of a barrel, and the object of this bill is to authorize them to do so and to relieve the Department of Internal Revenue of the necessity of providing the small denominations of revenue stamps applicable to the minor packages of beer.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the brewing industry desire the passage of the bill?

Mr. DOLLIVER. The committee is so advised.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. They desire the abolition of the small packages?

Mr. DOLLIVER. They do; and I will say to the House that they claim that the reason for it is the fact that these packages, together with the stamps, are practically more valuable than the contents of the package, and the trade for the last few years has found difficulty in getting the packages back after sending them out.

Mr. MERCER. Is there any opposition on the part of the Treasury Department?

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Treasury Department advises the committee that so far as the revenue is concerned, it will not affect the internal-revenue receipts in any calculable degree.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks me, in his momentary absence, to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. At this moment I will not avail myself of the gentleman's kindness, but possibly will later on.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then I reserve the time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is reserved.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment to the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. No amendments are in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FLETCHER. I so understand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the consideration of an amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the words "Provided, That this act shall not take effect until July 1, 1900."

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, owing to the nature of the instructions by which I appear here, I am not at liberty to give consent to any amendments.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not desire to prevent my friend from Minnesota from making any observations which he desires to make, although I reserve the right, owing to my instructions, to object to his amendment.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FLETCHER] two minutes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only object I have in offering this amendment to this resolution, Mr. Speaker, is on account of petitions which I have received from many of the coopers who are making these small packages by hand. They have a considerable amount of stock on hand, and it is a new proposition to them. If they had the opportunity—until the 1st of July—to work up their surplus stock, which will be entirely destroyed if this bill takes effect sooner than that, they might be saved from loss. For that reason I ask that it may go into effect on the 1st of July, in order to give these poor men, who are making these packages by hand, an opportunity to work up their surplus stock.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, in view of what my friend has stated, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, there is not, so far as I know, and there should not be, in my judgment, any objection to the passage of this bill. I am in favor of it and shall vote for it. It will be of some convenience, I am informed, to the brewers of the country, and I hope no one will raise a single objection to the bill passing by unanimous consent.

The point I desire to make, however, is that this bill is not what the brewers want, because it does not reduce, and, according to the statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, it will not reduce one cent the exorbitant tax now placed on beer. Beer is the poor man's drink, and it should not be taxed out of proportion to other commodities. The brewers of the country pay more taxes on what they manufacture than any other industry in the land. When the war-revenue bill passed this House the tax on beer was doubled. It was then increased from $1 a barrel to $2 a barrel, and under the war-revenue law the brewers of the country to-day are paying into the National Treasury over $75,000,000 of taxes every year, and every penny of this, remember, comes out of the pockets of the consumers—out of the pockets of the people who drink beer. The brewers make the consumers pay the tax, and the burden falls mostly on the toilers.

The war with Spain is over and has been concluded for some time, yet the Republican party continues to levy on the people of this country the enormous, exorbitant, and outrageous war taxes. When the Republican party passed the war-revenue bill at the beginning of the Spanish-American war, and to carry on that war, it promised, through its representatives on the floor of this House, that just so soon as the war was over the law increasing the taxes of the people would be immediately repealed. You have not repealed a single provision of the war-tax law, and, so far as I know and so far as the people of the country now know, you do not intend to repeal or to modify that enormous and unjust war-tax law in any particular. Tax the people into prosperity is one of the chief mottoes of the Republican party.

How long, I ask you now, in the name of all that is fair and just, do you intend to continue the burdens of this exorbitant, unnecessary, and outrageous war tax on the consumers, the taxpayers, and the people of the country? That is the question for you to answer, and that is the question the people intend to make you answer in the next campaign.

Do you intend to keep up the war taxes forever, piling up the people's money in the Treasury in order that your Standard Oil Secretary can loan the money out again to the Administration's pet national banks to charge the borrowers enormous rates of interest, and thus robbing the people coming and robbing them going? If that is the object, I would like to know it, and I think the people who are paying the taxes and bearing the frightful burdens of your imperialistic policy and expensive Government would like to have an answer to this very pertinent question. I pause for your reply. You can not answer, and I feel confident no Republican will have the courage to stand up here and give the desired information.

This bill is merely a little sop thrown to the brewers. You intend it to keep them in good humor. You have heard from them and you know they demand that the war taxes on beer be reduced to $1 a barrel, as it was before the Spanish-American war began. The brewers have sent several representative delegations here asking for the repeal of the war tax, and they have filed hundreds and thousands of petitions in favor of it. But if I know your intentions, and if I am any judge of your policy, their mission has been a failure, their work in vain, and the petitions have been thrown in the wastebasket.

You do not intend to grant the brewers any relief and you do not intend to repeal or to modify the war-tax law in any particular. You are keeping it up, compelling the people to pay these enormous taxes in time of peace, in order to carry out your nefarious schemes in the islands of the seas, in order to convince the people that times are prosperous, in order to pile up in the Treasury a great surplus, in order to maintain a large standing army, and last but not least, in order to deceive the people and cover up the deficiencies caused by the Dingley tariff law.

If it had not been for the Spanish-American war and this war-tax law incident thereto there would be a deficit in the Treasury to-day, caused by the failure of the Dingley tariff law, of over a hundred and fifty millions of dollars. You know that. There is no doubt about it. For one, I stand here and tell you that the people of this country demand a reduction of the war taxes; they demand their immediate modification or their entire repeal. They will not get it, however, from the Republican party. The people of the country can rest assured of this. When the Republican party once gets a tax on a thing it never takes it off. If the people get any relief from the exorbitant war taxes they are now paying, it must come from and through the agency of the Democratic party. The Democratic party will make this question an issue in the coming campaign, and the people can determine the matter.

You will deceive no brewer in this country by the passage of this bill. The brewers of the country know how the Republican party has betrayed them. They have not forgotten your promises in 1896, and I believe you will not get as much help from them in the coming campaign as you did in the last. If the brewers respond again to your cries for campaign funds, they are more foolish than I imagine and deserve to be robbed.

The war taxes the people are now compelled to pay to bolster up the imperialistic schemes, the royal swagger, and the plutocratic policy of the Republicans outrage American rights. In my opinion the war taxes must be repealed, and the people who are struggling under the unjust and oppressive burdens of extravagant government, in the name of justice and common sense and economy, must insist on their repeal. The poor people of the country pay more than three-quarters of all the war taxes.

The rich people practically escape with the payment of a very small part of the taxes, and they refuse to contribute their just share of the expense of Government by the payment of an income tax.

Mr. Speaker, if it were in order, I would offer an amendment to this bill to repeal all the war taxes; but as it is not in order under the rules you have adopted, I content myself with voting for this bill and at the same time entering against the exorbitant and outrageous war taxes the people are now paying my emphatic protest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. I yield two and a half minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, coming from the city of Milwaukee and representing that district, in which exist some of the largest brewing interests of this country, I desire to say a few words in favor of this bill. This bill is intended to do away with the one-sixth and one-eighth barrel package of beer, and it does not in the least affect the amount of the revenue of the Government. It is requested by the brewing interests as a matter of economy. The field that the sixth and eighth barrel once occupied is now filled by bottled beer, and much better. I have here a petition signed by the entire brewing interests of my district, ten large and small breweries, all of them asking for the passage of this bill. In fact, I think it is the almost unanimous request of the brewing interests of the country that this bill should be passed. When Congress placed upon beer a tax of $2 a barrel, the brewing interests of my district felt that it was a burdensome tax—heavier, perhaps, than the business ought to stand—but they are not here to-day hounding Congress for a reduction of that tax. They, as patriotic citizens, believe the condition of the country at the present time will not warrant a reduction of the tax, and are not asking it.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman say the brewers——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. OTJEN. No. I would be glad to, but have only two and a half minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. OTJEN. I want to add this, that when an industry that pays such a vast revenue to the Government simply asks something which will be in the interest of economy in their business and will not in the least reduce the revenue, Congress, it seems to me, ought to willingly and speedily grant that request. I hope this bill will be passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the remarks of my friend from New York a few moments ago, in which he asked why gentlemen on the other side did not repeal the war tax. I thought if they would truly answer his question they would say they could not do it because the result of the Dingley bill without the war tax would leave a deficit in the Federal Treasury. That is the real fact; they are using the war tax to eke out the deficiencies of the Dingley bill that they have so greatly praised, and which has proved the most lamentable failure of any tariff measure that was ever enacted in these United States.

They can not repeal the war tax because of the secret understanding with England. They do not dare to abandon their policy of "criminal aggression." They do not dare to say a word of sympathy in behalf of two sister republics struggling for liberty and life against a monarchy. They do not dare to do it. They may prate as much as they please in their public prints, but the Republican—no, I will not say the Republican party—I will say the present Administration has turned its back ignobly even upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence; and they need money, they need much money, wrung out of the hard earnings of the toilers and taxpayers of this country, to carry on the policy that can only result to the benefit of syndicates, corporations, boodlers, and land grabbers, in attempting to annex to this country a section of land that no plain person of the United States can ever get any advantage of.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. There is so much confusion in the House that I could not hear the pathetic part of the gentleman's remarks. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. TERRY. I thought I was in order, Mr. Speaker. With all the territory that has ever been annexed to the United States, under what they call "Democratic doctrine," the plain people could take their covered wagons, with the yellow dog tied under them, and move in and build up American States and American territory, but where can the plain people of this land get the benefit of the taxation that you are imposing upon them under your war-revenue tariff? They get absolutely none. It is only the rich, the very rich, that can ever derive a cent's benefit from your new policy of imperialistic expansion. When you want to expand, with an expansion on this continent, I am with you. But when you turn your backs on the Monroe doctrine, for the benefit of syndicates and millionaires, who sing, "God save the Queen" at the millionaire banquets in New York, although three-quarters of the American people are in favor of those who fight for liberty, when that is your policy I am against you to the death. [Applause.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has twelve and a half minutes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I yield two and a half minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, representing, as I do, one of the largest beer-producing districts of the country, I think it is proper for me to register my entire approbation of this bill. The brewers of my district are unanimously in favor of it for the reason that the losses resulting from the use of these small packages are enormous. There was a time in the history of that industry when the small packages were a necessity—that was when the bottling process was not yet invented; but to-day, Mr. Speaker, when beer is so cheaply furnished in bottles, and when the bottling process has been reduced to a science, these small packages are no longer a necessity. I have yet to hear a single protest against this bill. I wish to say to my friend from New York that he has no patent upon the idea that the beer tax should be reduced. It will be reduced, but at the present time it will be merely complicating this bill by bringing up the question of revenue. This bill does not affect the revenue in any way, and the question of revenue will, as it should, be taken up at another time. I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK].

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I propose to vote for this bill for several reasons. The first is that the State which I have the honor to represent, Wisconsin, is largely interested in brewing. Another reason is that the brewing industry is carrying the greatest burden to-day of any industry in the whole Union. They paid a tax on barreled beer for six months ending December 31, 1899, of $38,000,000, which would be a tax of $76,000,000 a year, and they simply ask in this bill to be allowed to regulate the size of their own packages. There is another reason, Mr. Speaker, and one which with me is stronger than all the others, and that is that the abolition of these small packages, this one-eighth of a barrel, will be a greater step in the direction of good order and temperance, than any other proposition that is likely to come before this House. Under the present conditions the small package is not used for the ordinary distribution of beer; it is not used by saloon keepers and hotel keepers to tap and to sell to any great extent, but it is sold to boys, to those who want to take the kegs out into barns and bushes and for use Sundays, being sold largely at places where there is no license. This results in a great amount of drunkenness and disorder, and as a rule is beyond the control of the excise officers. I now yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, doubtless this is a proper bill, and I shall not oppose it, but I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are other evils and other onerous provisions in the war-revenue bill which ought to be remedied or repealed. While it may be just for the House to yield to the earnest demand of the great association of brewers in this country in order to give them the relief, partial though it may be, that they ask for, still, Mr. Speaker, we all know that the taxes on proprietary medicines, the tax upon the little mortgages and obligations that people over this country have to give yearly in farm transactions, is burdensome upon the people, and ought also to be repealed.

I need not tell the House, because every member has knowledge of the fact from the papers on file in the committee room or from the petitions and memorials which fill his mail, that there is an appeal from all parts of this country to Congress that this most burdensome tax on proprietary medicines now levied under the war-revenue bill be repealed. There are various small articles which the poor and humble are required to purchase which are subjected to this oppressive taxation, which the consumer has been obliged to pay, because the druggist who sells these articles is compelled to put the tax upon the man who buys them; and the latter is compelled to buy these articles of proprietary medicines because he is unable to employ a doctor. Besides, there are other small articles which the great mass of the poorer people of the country constantly use which are burdened with taxes under the existing law.

Every promissory note which the small farmer or the large farmer or the man in ordinary business gives in order to carry on his farming or his business operations, every mortgage, every check given to draw money from bank, is taxed. The taxgatherer stands at the elbow of every citizen who writes his name upon every promissory note, upon every mortgage, upon every check. The taxgatherer, too, stands at the elbow of the druggist when he sells those proprietary medicines, the tax falling, as I have said, upon the man who purchases these articles for himself, or for his sick wife or child. All over this country there come up from these dealers in drugs and from the poorer classes of people who suffer from this taxation (as the great association of brewers does not) an appeal, begging Congress to repeal this onerous tax.

It is not denied that the existing law in many respects may have been a necessary measure in view of the heavy expense thrown upon the Government by reason of the war. But the day will come when we shall heed the memorials and petitions of the people in the humbler walks of life as well as the demands of the rich—the great association of brewers who are able to contribute to campaign funds and to aid political candidates in their efforts to be elected. I make no charge, of course, that any member of the committee has been influenced by any such consideration—far be from me any such suggestion. But I mean to say that the humbler classes of our people are entitled to be relieved from these onerous taxes—taxes which were cheerfully submitted to while the country was engaged in a foreign war, but which no longer should be continued. The Ways and Means Committee ought to see to this matter soon; the House ought to see to it speedily, and Congress ought to hasten the day when this burden which has been put upon the country—upon the poorer classes as well as the rich—shall be removed and when we shall come back to that system of taxation which will be as little onerous as possible upon the toiling millions of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have we remaining?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] whether he wishes to use his five minutes.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I think I will not use the time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then we will not use our time.

Mr. MADDOX. I should like to have two or three minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] a question.

I do not understand this bill exactly. I should like to know whether there is now any law compelling brewers to use these small packages.

Mr. DOLLIVER. There is authority for their use in the section of the Revised Statutes which this bill undertakes to amend.

Mr. MADDOX. If the brewers are in favor of discontinuing the use of these packages, can they not do so of their own accord without legislative action?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Well, they have had difficulty in regulating this matter by any business arrangement of their own, as long as the authority to manufacture these packages exists and as long as the Secretary of the Treasury furnishes the stamps applicable to such packages.

Mr. MADDOX. Is it a fact that this bill would tend to increase the revenue? To what extent would it do so?

Mr. DOLLIVER. The Internal-Revenue Department, in a communication which is printed in connection with the report of the committee, says that it will not.

Mr. MADDOX. It will not?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It will not.

Mr. MADDOX. That is all I desire to know.

Mr. GAINES. Then why do you want to change the law if this bill is to have no effect?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is a mere matter of convenience to the industry interested. The public has no interest in it except that to which my friend from Wisconsin alluded, and the Treasury has no interest in it. The committee has made its report because under the circumstances, no public interest being involved, we think that this reasonable request of a great taxpaying industry ought not to be denied.

Mr. GAINES. As the gentleman seems to be interested in yielding to the demands of the taxpayers, I will ask whether taxes are reduced in any way by this bill?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not at all.

Mr. GAINES. Why do you not reduce taxes?

Mr. DOLLIVER. We have not considered that question.

Mr. GAINES. Then you continue the war taxes unchanged?

Mr. DOLLIVER. We certainly do not intend to reduce taxes, if the statement of my friend from Arkansas is true, that there is a deficit in the Treasury but for the war-revenue receipts.

Mr. GAINES. I do not suppose there will be any deficit in the Treasury so long as the Secretary of the Treasury is allowed to sell as many bonds as he chooses.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. Is this the unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It is. Mr. Speaker, I ask a vote on the proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe I have some time still remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] as much time as he desires.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say a word upon this question.

I represent a district that makes a very large quantity of beer, as well as other drinkables, and I feel that this bill, coming as it does with a unanimous report from as cautious and able a committee as that of Ways and Means of this House, ought to meet the approval of all the members present.

When the late war broke out, the brewers of the country were paying a little over $33,000,000 annually as a tax to the Government. By reason of the war duties levied this tax was about doubled, and I understand from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the tax now collected amounts to about $66,000,000 and upward on this single industry, which is more than is paid by any other industry, or any other single article, within the tax laws in the United States.

This bill is not presented with a view of lessening the tax paid to the Government, but is simply an accommodation to the brewing interest, which pays such an enormous proportion of the taxes, and it seems to me that a measure which would enable them to conduct their business more satisfactorily, as this bill proposes, ought to meet the approval of the House of Representatives without question.

I know how the brewers feel on this question. I know how they were imposed upon by reason of the doubling of their taxes because of the war revenue; and they have been clamoring for some little relief, even such as this bill provides for them. If, therefore, it meets their approval, it should meet the approval of the House and become a law.

That is all I desire to say upon the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill passed.

TRADE OF PUERTO RICO.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes, and pending that, I desire to see if we can not arrange with gentlemen on the other side as to length of the debate.

I have already had some talk with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], in which he has substantially agreed that the debate is to be continued this week, that the general debate shall close on Saturday, and that on Monday the bill shall be taken up for amendment, in committee, under the five-minute rule, the amendments offered by the committee reporting the bill to be considered first, and that at 2 o'clock on that day the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to.

I ask unanimous consent that this may be made the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed on Saturday next, that on Monday the bill shall be considered until 2 o'clock by paragraphs under the five-minute rule, and that at 2 o'clock the committee shall rise and report the bill, with such amendments as may have been adopted, to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, before that I would like to ask my colleague on the committee a question. Is it proposed to give to the House an opportunity to vote on the proposition recommended by the President in his message as an amendment in the nature of a substitute under this arrangement—that is to say, to vote on the proposition reported by the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York, which was in the language of the recommendation of the President in his annual message, that being the matter which gave the committee jurisdiction of the subject? I want to know if you propose to vote on that proposition as a substitute?

Mr. PAYNE. That would be for the House to determine. I will say to the gentleman, however, that I do not intend to offer any such amendment myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We can not consent to any agreement which would preclude the offering of a substitute that the minority want to offer. When the occasion arises, I want the privilege to have a vote on the substitute, and when the proper time comes we shall offer such a substitute.

Mr. PAYNE. As I have already stated, that would be for the House to determine.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all right. But I desire to give notice that we will offer the substitute when the proper time comes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. Pending the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill to which he has referred, the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed on Saturday next, and that on Monday morning the bill be opened for consideration under the five-minute rule for debate and amendment, and that at 2 o'clock the committee shall rise and report the bill back to the House with any amendment which may have been agreed to——

Mr. RICHARDSON. And also coupled with the understanding that the minority may have an opportunity to submit a substitute for the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not consent to that. That is a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But we do not want the bill reported back without the opportunity to have a vote on the substitute.

Mr. PAYNE. It would be in order in the House, I suppose, unless the House had first ordered the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, if we can have an agreement that we may offer a substitute, that is all we desire. We do not want to be precluded by any rule or any agreement from offering a substitute.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, this only includes the reporting of the bill to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, as the gentleman knows, it must be reported with the pending propositions, and if there is no substitute pending there could be none offered in the House.

Mr. PAYNE. There could be, unless the previous question was ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman concedes that we may offer it that is all we ask.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as stated by the Chair?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object unless it is supplemented by the request which I make.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will agree to it, because that will make our arrangement satisfactory. I ask the Chair to submit my request also, that the substitute of the minority may be pending also, with the report of the Committee of the Whole, on next Monday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. I can not consent to that at the present time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill referred to.

LATE CONSUL TO TRANSVAAL.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, before the motion of the gentleman from New York is put, I should like to ask him if he will permit me to make a privileged report. It is unanimously agreed to and will take but an instant, and I suppose the Chair would have the right to recognize me for it anyhow. It is a report on a resolution of inquiry. If it is permitted, I will move the previous question, and have it passed in an instant.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to accommodate the gentleman from Illinois, but I have asked several gentlemen who have been promised recognition to wait until to-morrow morning.

Mr. HITT. Am I not entitled to make a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 149.

Whereas Charles E. Macrum, late a consul of the Government of the United States at Pretoria, in the Transvaal Republic, over his own signature, charges "When this (his) mail was finally forwarded to me after Colonel Stowe, the American consul-general at Cape Town, had secured its release, I had the humiliation, as the representative of the American Government, of sitting in my office in Pretoria and looking upon envelopes bearing the official seal of the American Government opened and officially sealed with a sticker, notifying me that the contents had been read by the censor at Durban:" and

Whereas he further states in the same article, "When I accepted my post as consul I knew nothing of any secret alliance between America and Great Britain:" Therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of America, That the Secretary of State is directed to inform the House of Representatives if said Charles E. Macrum, as consul of the American Government, informed the State Department that his official mail had been opened and read by the British consul at Durban; and if so, what steps, if any, have been taken to obtain an explanation and apology from the British Government.

SEC. 2. That he is further directed to inform the House of Representatives what truth there is in the charge that a secret alliance exists between the Republic of the United States and the Empire of Great Britain.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred House Resolution 149, beg leave to report the same back with the following amendments, and recommend its passage as so amended:

On page 2, line 1, strike out "consul" and insert in lieu thereof the word "censor."

On page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out "to obtain an explanation and apology from the British Government" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in relation thereto."

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the amendments made by the committee are unanimously agreed to, and they are also in accord with the views of the gentleman who introduced the resolution [Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky], they having been submitted to him. The resolutions meeting everyone's view, I will move the previous question.

Mr. BERRY. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs if the gentleman who introduced the resolution is here?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is all right.

Mr. HITT. I have submitted the amendments to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TRADE OF PUERTO RICO.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of this act shall apply to the island of Puerto Rico and to the adjacent islands and waters of the islands lying east of the seventy-fourth meridian of longitude west of Greenwich, which was ceded to the United States by the Government of Spain by treaty concluded April 11, 1899; and the name Puerto Rico, as used in this act, shall be held to include not only the island of that name, but all the adjacent islands as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act the same tariffs, customs, and duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported into Puerto Rico from ports other than those of the United States which are required by law to be collected upon articles imported into the United States from foreign countries.

SEC. 3. That on and after the passage of this act all merchandise coming into the United States from Puerto Rico and coming into Puerto Rico from the United States shall be entered at the several ports of entry upon payment of 25 per cent of the duties which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles of merchandise imported from foreign countries; and, in addition thereto, upon articles of merchandise of Puerto Rican manufacture coming into the United States, customs duties equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax which may be imposed in the United States upon the same articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture; and upon articles of United States manufacture coming into Puerto Rico customs duties equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax which may be imposed in Puerto Rico upon the same articles of Puerto Rican manufacture.

SEC. 4. That the customs duties collected in Puerto Rico in pursuance of this act, less the cost of collecting the same, and the gross amount of all collections of customs in the United States upon articles of merchandise coming from Puerto Rico, shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury, but shall be held as a separate fund, and shall be placed at the disposal of the President to be used for the government and benefit of Puerto Rico until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, an incident of the late Spanish war was the invasion of Puerto Rico by the Army of the United States. At that time it seemed to be almost the universal desire of our people that Puerto Rico should be added to the territory of the United States; but another incident of the war had put our Navy in command of the harbor of Manila and also a portion of the city; and when the commissioners met at Paris and negotiated a treaty the grave question that confronted them was not what was to be done with Cuba or Puerto Rico, but what was to become of the Philippine Islands.

It can not be denied that many of our people were not in harmony with the idea of annexing those islands, so distant from our shores; but as the question was investigated we found that the victory of Dewey at Manila Bay had carried with it grave consequences to those people and grave responsibilities to us. We found that while we had gone to war to give freedom to Cuba, as an incident of that war we had destroyed the Spanish power in the Philippine Islands. The question arose, What was to be done? Some said, "Let Dewey sail away with his fleet and leave the islands to their fate." But that would not settle the question; nor would it settle the duty of the people of the United States. It would have been moral cowardice; and when the treaty came out of the Paris conference, it came with a clause ceding not only Puerto Rico, but also the Philippine Islands to the United States, with a requirement that we pay out of our Treasury to Spain $20,000,000.

The treaty was not made in a corner. Its contents were known to the world, and all its provisions were known to all the citizens of the Republic. It could not be carried through by the President of the United States alone. It could not be ratified and put into force by any one political party. It needed the assent of other parties before it became binding upon the people of the United States. It went to the Senate. There was long deliberation there. In that body a majority were hostile to the Administration and hostile to the Republican party. Still, under the Constitution, the treaty required a two-thirds vote before it could be ratified. It was ratified. It was a matter also that was an open secret that the great leader of the Democratic party in the last campaign and the leader to be in the campaign to come came to Washington and personally urged his friends to vote for the ratification of this treaty.

The acquisition of Puerto Rico and the acquisition of the Philippine Islands was a matter, then, that was ratified by both the great political parties of the United States. But it did not stop here, Mr. Chairman. The House of Representatives had a duty to perform, a matter of discretion, and a matter of right. When a treaty came before the House of Representatives in 1796, a treaty with Great Britain, while there were among the members of the House of Representatives men who had helped to frame the Constitution, or who were contemporaneous with the framers of the Constitution, when the debates upon the subject were fresh in their minds, at a date to which we look back for our interpretations of the Constitution, the question of the duty of the House of Representatives in regard to a treaty came up for discussion in the House. This resolution was introduced in 1796, on the 1st day of April:

Resolved (as the opinion of this House), That when a treaty is made which requires a law or laws to be passed to carry it into effect that in such case the House of Representatives has a constitutional right to deliberate and determine the propriety or impropriety of passing such laws and to act thereon as the public good shall require.

That resolution was adopted. During its consideration speeches were made upon it, the power and the duty and the rights of the House of Representatives in such case were fully discussed, and it was determined by a decisive vote of 57 yeas to 35 nays that they had the rights set forth in the resolution, and they adopted it as an expression of the opinion and deliberate judgment of the House of Representatives.

This question came up again in 1804, and came up at a subsequent period in the House of Representatives; and this determination of the House was received, accepted, and adopted as the opinion of the House. It is a precedent, as our friends would say, of a hundred years, and of course was binding upon them, and was binding upon us when we came to consider the question of the appropriation of $20,000,000 to carry this treaty into effect. It was not only ratified by the President and two-thirds of the Senate, but it came to this House for a vote.

The question was debated for a short time in the House. Debate ran fast and furious on the subject, but when we came to vote it was found that there were 219 yeas and only 33 nays; and among those who voted to carry this treaty into effect were three gentlemen in the minority of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN], and the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who have signed these minority views; and the then leader of the Democratic House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and the would-be leader of the Democratic party in this Congress, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], ratified, by their votes in the affirmative, the carrying of this treaty into effect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all political parties have approved this treaty and accepted the cession of the Philippine Islands to the United States and the island of Puerto Rico to the United States. As patriots, instead of trying to make some political capital for the Presidential campaign, we should sit down with deliberate, dispassionate judgment and consider the questions that confront us with reference to these islands.

The island of Puerto Rico, with which the bill deals, is one of the richest islands of the West Indies, a small island, about 80 miles in length and 40 miles in width, in the form of a parallelogram, running east and west, with a mountain range running along the center, some 3,000 feet high at the summit, and cultivated from the summit clear down to the seashore, with level lands along the line of the sea at the foot of the hills averaging in width from nothing to 5 miles, on which sugar is raised, the higher lands adjoining fitted for the cultivation of tobacco and pasturage, and the higher lands of the mountains on which coffee is cultivated. It is said to be the most densely populated of any land in the whole world.

The citizens of Puerto Rico accepted the conditions. They could not very well do anything else. We had the consent of the governed, but the governed were too weak to yield up anything except consent to the powers of Spain and the powers of the United States. As the gentleman from New York said the other day, they received the troops with open arms, but whether, if Spain had come along the next day, they would not have received them still more gladly he was not able to say.

The superficial area of this island is about 2,000,000 acres, Mr. Chairman, of which 76,000 acres are used for the cultivation of sugar cane, 182,000 acres for coffee, 18,000 acres for tobacco, 185,000 acres for minor crops, 17,000, as the reports say, for "small items under cultivation;" pasturage, 1,148,000 acres—considerable more than one-half; underbrush, 140,000 acres; wood, 165,000 acres, and not classed, 65,000 acres. It is said that these last three items, containing 370,000 acres, are such that it will never be possible to bring them under cultivation.

Its population, estimated, now is 1,000,000 people, although the Spanish census in 1896 disclosed only 900,000 people. These were divided into negroes, 76,000; mulattoes, 242,000; whites, 582,000. The testimony before the Insular Committee was that the whites were generally full-blooded white people, descendants of the Spaniards, possibly mixed with some Indian blood, but none of them negro extraction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have acquired the control of the territory of Puerto Rico, what are we going to do with it? What is our first duty toward that island? It appears that of the whole population only 12 per cent can read and write, and 14½ per cent can read only. In other words, the number and proportion of illiterates is overwhelming. The educated reside mostly in the cities and the large towns, and in the country there is a dense mass of ignorance. Not that these people are not willing to learn, not that they are not apt to learn, for the testimony of our Army officers who went down there and citizens who went there is that they are quick to learn, eager to learn, and especially eager to learn and speak the English language. The difficulty has been that Spain has not provided schools for these children. No building was ever built for a schoolhouse in the island of Puerto Rico until about four months ago. They had schools scattered over the island, but they were rented places.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. PAYNE. I will yield this time, but I do not like to be interrupted.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not true that when the war between the United States and Spain broke out there was a university at Manila with in the neighborhood of 800 students in it?

Mr. PAYNE. I am not talking about Manila.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I understood you to say that there were no schools there.

Mr. PAYNE. I am talking about Puerto Rico. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will resume. Our people have increased the number of schools. As I said, the only schoolhouses were rented buildings, generally rented from the teacher himself. They were without school furniture, many of the children bringing a chair or stool to sit upon. They tell the story that in one schoolhouse there was a hammock thrown across the room, and when asked what it was for the teacher said that was where he reclined when school was in session.

Of course, under these difficult circumstances it is not to be wondered at that not more than 12 per cent of these people can read or write. When our people got control and possession of Puerto Rico they went to work to establish schools. They built a high school at San Juan, and they propose to build a normal school to instruct teachers how to educate children, because the Administration believes, and I believe, as every good citizen will believe, that the paramount duty of the United States is to educate these people, to furnish them schoolhouses for every part of the island; and I do not care if they put up the American flag over every one of them and teach patriotism as well as the English language. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Spain collected in taxes from these people over 5,000,000 pesos annually. A peso is a Spanish or Puerto Rican silver dollar, containing about 93¼ per cent as much silver as an American silver dollar. It is worth now in the market 41 cents; but by an Executive order it was made exchangeable in United States money at the rate of 60 cents for a peso. So it was worth 60 cents of our money. Spain collected these 5,000,000 pesos from these people. But instead of building schoolhouses or providing a school system they took about half of this money to support the Spanish army and navy and to help out poor Spain from year to year.

The exports of the island were about 17,000,000 pesos and the imports about the same amount. The three principal items of export were coffee, sugar, and tobacco, in the order named. About 60 per cent of the total exports was coffee, about 20 per cent sugar, and about 5 per cent tobacco. The market for the coffee was found principally in Spain, and also in Cuba. That which went to Spain found its way to France and Germany, and some of it to the United States, where it is sold for the best Mocha and the best Java, and I am told by competent experts that the best grades of it are fully equal if not superior to any Mocha or Java coffee that can be bought anywhere in the world.

When the war was over Spain put a prohibitive duty on coffee, as she did upon tobacco, and a corresponding duty upon sugar. Cuba, which we hold in trust, demanded of the United States that we put a duty upon Puerto Rican coffee and Puerto Rican tobacco. A large portion of the tobacco crop was brought to Cuba in the years gone by free of duty; and there it was made up into cigars, sometimes mixed with Habana tobacco and sometimes not, but most of it came to the United States in the shape of the best Habana tobacco. The better qualities of this were exported. There were some minor grades that went to Europe, principally to Germany, selling at 5 or 10 cents a pound.

The export of tobacco was 4,000,000 pounds annually. One year it went up to 6,000,000 pounds, but the normal average exports were 4,000,000 pounds. They raise a million or two pounds more, which are consumed in the island. These were made into cigars and cigarettes by the natives and sold there.

Of sugar about three-fifths came to the United States and two-fifths went to Spain. That is about the proportion that has been exported to the two countries for the last ten years. Some of the time perhaps we got two-thirds of it. So that a part of the sugar market was in Spain and the rest in the United States. Spain cut off the market for sugar, cut off the market for coffee, cut off the market for tobacco, which was 85 per cent of their exports, and left the people without a market for these commodities, save that they had in the United States.

In addition to that, Cuba demanded of the Government not only a duty on coffee which was prohibitory, but a duty of 35 a pound on tobacco, which was also prohibitory, and under which not a pound could be exported to Cuba.

Well, these Puerto Ricans began to feel as though they had been made the victims of misplaced confidence. When they saw the flag go up and knew that "prosperity followed the flag," as a matter of course they expected to get a little of that prosperity themselves. Instead of that, the first result was to cut off these markets. More than that, on the 8th of August last there occurred there a storm, or hurricane, which swept that island from end to end; such a storm as had not been known there since 1867. It occurred at a time when they were getting ready to harvest the crop of coffee, which bade fair to be a great crop.

One man, an extensive coffee planter, estimated that the entire output of coffee would exceed that of any previous year by 7,000,000 pesos in value. The normal crop is somewhere about eight or ten million pesos. This crop, which was expected to be a double crop, was by this storm wiped out of existence, because the winds swept the berries from off the bushes, and then the rain descended, so that when the sun came out there was nothing left but the dry and shriveled part—of no use whatever. Not 10 per cent of the ordinary crop was harvested in consequence of the effect of that storm. And that was not the worst of it. The market had been tied up for a year by these adverse tariff rates in Cuba and Spain; the coffee crop of the year before was sheltered in their little huts and in crudely constructed buildings all over the land. The wind razed these huts to the ground, destroying the greater portion of the crop of the previous year. So a double calamity came upon these people.

The winds did great damage and occasioned great desolation. In addition to the damage to the sugar crop and the tobacco crop, more than 2,000 people perished in the storm, while hundreds of thousands were turned out of their rude homes, shelterless to the blasts that beat upon them.

This was the condition in August last. And these people who had begun to despair under what had come to them from the loss of markets had still more reason to despair because of the devastation of this terrible storm.

Mr. Chairman, after I had heard these representations from the gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Insular Affairs, particularly the report of that honorable, able, and competent official, Brigadier-General Davis, who is now the military commander, it seems to me that Congress ought to afford some relief as quickly as possible to the people of these islands.

The President had recommended that we give them free trade with the United States. The Secretary of War had also recommended it in his report, and without consultation with anyone, on my own individual motion I introduced a bill and had it referred to the Committee on Ways and Means establishing customs ports in Puerto Rico, giving to the people of that island free trade with the United States, and between the United States and the ports of the island, and also extending the internal-revenue laws to the island and the islands adjacent to Puerto Rico. I wanted to relieve these people from the position in which they were placed.

My own sympathies were entirely enlisted in their behalf. I sympathized with their distress then as I sympathize with them to-day. They have not rebelled; they have not raised their arms against the Government of the United States; they have submitted quietly, and I wanted to do something for them for their relief. We could not help them with reference to their coffee, because coffee is free in the United States from whatsoever port it comes. It must depend therefore upon the good will of the United States to give them a market for their coffee. The War Department officially did give to these people, I agree, the right that coffee might be imported there free, and the order putting on a duty was rescinded.

But Cuba is only a market for the small remnant of coffee that is left over after the great storm of 1899, and the price of coffee has gone back to the old figure. If Puerto Rico only had enough coffee and the market for it, this would help at least to the extent of 60 per cent to the inhabitants of the island who are depending upon that industry for their support.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit me, I think I am in sympathy with the gentleman in the views that he has expressed, and I should be very glad if I could be able to vote for the bill; but I would like to be informed upon one point, and ask him to yield to me for a question.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I should be glad also to help the gentleman in helping the Cubans. But I think in giving the value of the peso, a few minutes ago, he said that it amounted to about 40 or 41 cents of our money.

Mr. PAYNE. No; the gentleman is mistaken. I said that 93½ per cent of the peso was silver, and that it was worth 41 or 42 cents in bullion; but by Executive order the value was fixed at 60 cents on the dollar.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. This increase was made by Executive order? Now, if an Executive order can increase the value of the peso in the proportion the gentleman has stated, why can not an Executive order make it equal to a full dollar in value, and help the people in that way? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is drifting off from the subject. But I will amuse him a little on my way. There are about $5,000,000, of pesos, in the Puerto Rican Islands in circulation, and when the United States gives 60 cents in good United States money for each of them it makes them worth that amount, of course.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. No, I can not yield; not even for the first gun fired in this war.

Mr. GAINES. Well, you are going to hear a good many fired before you get through with this question, I can tell you.

Mr. PAYNE. These questions, Mr. Chairman, are only taking up my time, and I do not desire to occupy very much of the time of the committee, as there are other gentlemen who desire to follow me, and I am already occupying more time than I had expected. The first thing that was to be considered in devising a plan for the revenues of the island—because the money was to be expended there—was to provide a government for the island. General Davis, a careful investigator, says that the expenditure would amount to $1,943,678.71 next year. It would only allow about $350,000 for the schools and about $300,000 for the highways. We must meet this question, therefore, and provide revenue for the support of the island. If we are to provide for these necessities it must be done by taxation in some way, or else we can not help the island. Where would it be best, then, to direct our attention in placing that taxation? That was the nature of the question that confronted us, and that we had to consider.

I sought General Davis. I sought other men who were acquainted with the circumstances, knew the imports, knew the revenues, knew all the surroundings in Puerto Rico, and I was assured that we could collect not exceeding $500,000 from the tariff and $500,000 from the internal revenue, in all a million dollars, to meet $2,000,000 of expenditures. Then I began to look around me and saw what effect the internal-revenue taxes would have upon the people of these islands.

They manufacture there annually a million and a half gallons of rum. It is sold all over the island. It is a necessity of life, or they think so, for the poor people of that island. These million and a half gallons retail at from 25 to 40 cents a gallon. The internal-revenue tax upon that, under the law that we were about to extend, would amount to $1.20 a gallon. The price to these people would be multiplied by four. How could they get their rum? We were cutting it off.

Well, now, some gentlemen may say they would be better off without the rum. I think that myself, that constitutionally and in the matter of laying up money they would be better off without the rum, but they have been used to it all their lives. They are poor people, and when a government comes along and arbitrarily cuts off rum from a community that has been accustomed to it, every man of whom wants it, why there is bound to be trouble, and there would have been trouble with those Puerto Ricans if we had passed that act in that way to cut off their supply of rum.

In addition to that, Puerto Rico has been importing from Cuba a million and a half pesos' worth of cigars from year to year. The Puerto Ricans have made a million pounds of their own tobacco up into cigars and cigarettes and sold them over the island each year.

General Davis says it will be very difficult to collect this tax on tobacco. "I suppose there are two or three thousand shops in Puerto Rico. A man has a hut in which he lives in one room, and in another sells a little rum, rolls cigarettes and sells them, and sells tobacco, and cigars, and fruits, and beans, and codfish, and has a general store, and he is in himself a tobacco manufacturer and retailer, saloon keeper and grocer."

Suppose we applied our internal-revenue taxes to these items? This is the cheap tobacco, cheaply made up, thrown together into cigars for the poor people of the island, these people whose coffee crop has been annihilated, and hundreds of thousands of whom have depended upon the charity of the good people of the United States to keep them from starving and to furnish them shelter, the only relief that they have received thus far from becoming a part of the territory of the United States.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. If it is on this subject, yes. If it is about something else, no.

Mr. TERRY. It would seem to me, from the logic of the gentleman's position, that he is in favor of giving these people cheap luxuries and high-priced necessities.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the gentlemen will know more as he grows older. I am not to blame for what "seems to him" now.

Mr. Chairman, the taxation would simply have destroyed these industries and would not have given us any appreciable revenue, no money for schools, no money for highways, no money for anything except the hard, stern realities of governing those people. So as a revenue raiser the bill which I first introduced was a failure, and, as I understand it, the first and paramount thing in a tariff bill, under the idea of the Republican party, always has been to raise sufficient revenue to support the Government as we go along.

Then the further question came along, Mr. Chairman, how much we were giving to these producers of sugar under the bill as first introduced. It would only benefit a moderate percentage of the people. They had been selling and sending abroad 58,000 tons of sugar, on an average, annually.

According to the statistics, they have 76,000 acres in sugar plantations. Other gentlemen say that they average a production of a ton to an acre, and that it takes a man to cultivate an acre, or 60,000 people to cultivate this sugar during the season. These men would be benefited by free sugar, and the owners of the plantations, some of them small ones and some of them with 700 and the largest with 1,500 acre plantations, would receive the direct benefit. If the Puerto Rican is the shrewd man that they say he is, and I hope and trust he may prove so, the laborers on those sugar plantations would get a part of this benefit, but largely, of course, as we all know, it would go to the planter and to the factory and to the merchant.

I understand there are some 3,000,000 pounds of tobacco now in the hands of the merchants ready to be exported. Who will get the benefit of the reduction of the duty on tobacco? Why, the merchants in the first instance; afterwards the planter. Would it not be fair that these people who get the greatest benefits should pay the expenses of the government?

Suppose we cut off 75 per cent of the duty which they now have to pay to get into our markets and present it to them. How much does that mean to the producers of sugar and to the producers of tobacco in these islands?

The estimate is that they will produce and sell and export 45,000 tons of sugar this year. It must all come to our market, because the Spanish market is absolutely cut off. Suppose we remit this duty. What does it mean?

This will not injure our industries. We consumed 2,000,000 tons of sugar last year. We imported about 1,400,000 tons on which we paid duty. We also imported 300,000 tons from Hawaii, which came in free of duty. The balance was produced in this country. Our increased consumption amounts to from fifty to a hundred thousand tons annually. If this 60,000 tons comes in from Puerto Rico, it will be but a drop in the bucket. Even should it double in quantity it could have no influence on our market. Our sugar producers have nothing to fear if we stop with sugar from Puerto Rico at the duty in this bill.

Nor will this bill injure the tobacco industry. Their tobacco is quite different from ours. The best of it ranks with the Cuban or nearly so. Nearly all of it is filler tobacco and very little is fit for wrappers. My own impression is that it will add to the sale of wrappers in the United States and make a better market for our tobacco growers. I have yet to see the tobacco man who fears the introduction of the Puerto Rican product.

Their great fear is that if we should give free trade to Puerto Rico we should follow it with free trade with the Philippine Islands, and ultimately with Cuba. Neither they nor the sugar producers fear anything from Puerto Rico alone, and when Congress asserts its power under the Constitution to deal in the manner proposed by this bill with this territory, it gives them renewed confidence to believe that Congress has the power and can be trusted to care for their interests when we come to deal with the other islands.

I find from the Bureau of Statistics that the sugar imported into this country in 1898 under 16 Dutch standard of color brought an average price of 2 cents, and in 1899 an average price of 2.2; that the averege duty paid upon the sugar was 1.57 in 1898 and 1.63 in 1899—that is, $1.63 a hundred pounds, an average of $1.60 a hundred for the two years upon sugar such as these men would export to the United States. That makes a pretty figure if you remit all that duty of $1.60 a hundred pounds, or $35.84 for a long ton, a total of $1,600,000 on the 45,000 tons that they will export to the United States this year. Suppose we take a quarter of that and give them three-fourths.

Suppose we take $400,000, or rather give it into the hands of the President of the United States, in order to carry out the benevolent object of building roads and building schoolhouses for these Puerto Ricans; are we not dealing more generously with these whole people to do that—that is, to provide schools on the mountains and on the mountain sides, where the poor coffee planters are struggling along for an existence—than to give the whole of it to the sugar planters and let the schools go? [Applause.]

So with tobacco. I find that the whole duty on their 4,000,000 pounds of tobacco, at 35 cents a pound, would amount to $1,400,000. We might give this to the tobacco planters, because on all these articles, gentlemen, make no mistake, the price of sugar and the price of tobacco is made in the United States, and they have to pay these duties to get into our markets. And if we remit the duty, we remit for them. Suppose we say, then, we will divide with these people; that we will give them $1,000,000 out of their duty on tobacco, and take $350,000 and add it to the revenues to come from these islands.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. If it is on this point.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. These schools that are to be built—are they to be built by taxes raised off the people of the United States or are they to be made from taxes raised on the Puerto Ricans?

Mr. PAYNE. We are to raise the taxes under this bill on the products coming from Puerto Rico.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Then you are going to build them out of the taxes they have to pay?

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman can figure it out that we have to pay this tax, I can not. I suppose he is in favor of them having free trade with the United States?

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Yes, I am.

Mr. PAYNE. Then he proposes to give them all of this.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. PAYNE. We propose to reserve a portion of it to build schools with. That is the difference.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, if you will not take all of my time.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Does the gentleman believe that as soon as the ratification of the treaty of peace was made that the Puerto Ricans were citizens of the United States or does he think that they fell outside of the Constitution?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, well, now, I may possibly get down to that subject if you do not consume my time; but the gentleman from Tennessee ought to know that that is a question that has nothing to do with sugar.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. I think there is a good deal of sweetness in it, and I thought it should be touched with this.

Mr. PAYNE. So, Mr. Chairman, I myself suggested this substitute to my colleagues on the committee. I called the Republican members of the committee together—I do not mind giving away secrets since they have been published in the newspapers—and we went over the whole field, and determined at that time that the better thing to do was to provide a sufficient revenue to run this government. Where are we going to get the balance? We expect to get a million dollars of customs duties paid on goods imported from foreign ports and from the United States into Puerto Rico. That will make $1,750,000. That is not all of it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I would rather that the gentleman did not ask me a question at this time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to ask it in reference to the revenue on sugar that you have spoken about, and to ask it for information. Is this tax levied in order to give schools to the Puerto Ricans, or is it levied for the purpose of giving the benefit to the producers of sugar in this country?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see how any man could ask such a question as that—how a tax of 20 per cent is a protection to any sugar interest in this country.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. You introduced this bill giving the Puerto Ricans free trade with the United States. Now, was this bill introduced until the representatives of the beet-sugar producers and the tobacco producers and all other sugar producers in the United States had been before the Committee on Insular Affairs and stated that free trade would be disastrous to their interests?

Mr. PAYNE. I think it was; and right here, lest I forget it, I want to say that the gentleman who represents the beet-sugar industry, Mr. Oxnard, came before the Committee on Ways and Means and made a statement before the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And before the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. PAYNE. I was not present there, and I only heard him make it before the Ways and Means Committee. I made this inquiry: "Mr. Oxnard, do you fear the disastrous influence of the importation of sugar from Puerto Rico, bearing in mind the fact that the United States consumes 2,000,000 tons of sugar annually; that it is increasing by 100,000 tons every year; that we import 1,400,000 tons and pay duty upon it? Do you think the free importation of only 58,000 tons, and supposing it should be doubled to 120,000 tons, from Puerto Rico, would affect your industry?" He said, "No; that is not what I am afraid of. What I am afraid of is"——

Mr. HENRY of Texas rose.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, let me make that statement.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to make a statement of what he said before the Insular Affairs Committee.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, you can not do it in my time. He said what he was afraid of was free sugar from the Philippine Islands, and he was afraid that when prosperity came to Puerto Rico under free sugar Cuba would be knocking at the door for admission, and that all sides of the Chamber, imperialists, expansionists, anti-expansionists, and every other kind, would vote to admit Cuba into the Union; and if we extended free trade to Cuba with her one thousand million tons annually, which she is capable of producing, it would break down all the sugar industries.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I shall have to decline to be interrupted, because the questions do not seem to elucidate the subject, and I want to get through with it.

Mr. GAINES. I rise, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. I am already taking the time that belongs to others now.

Mr. GAINES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PAYNE. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GAINES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor and declines to be interrupted.

Mr. GAINES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. GAINES. Does the Chair rule that I can not rise to a point of order?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. PAYNE. I can not yield any further; my time is being frittered away.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the beet-sugar industry has been something of a pet of mine since I have been in Congress. I have been as anxious as any man in the United States to see it succeed. I had something to do with framing the schedule of the Dingley bill and the McKinley bill and framing the bounty in the McKinley bill, and I have watched with interest in the past ten years the progress of this industry in the United States, commencing with the most feeble beginning and gradually growing year by year, until this year the crop will be more than 100,000 tons against the forty or fifty thousand tons a year ago.

It is increasing every year, and already they have made contracts to build 51 beet-sugar factories in the United States during the coming season. It will double, probably, this year. Farmers are getting interested in it, and the people of the United States are getting interested all over every section of the country, and, as I said in the debate on the conference report on the Dingley bill, Mr. Chairman, I look to this as the one means of meeting what gentlemen call an octopus, the sugar trust, because I believe there is nothing which will so tend to destroy the sugar trust as beet-sugar factories in every Congressional district in the United States; and if they get incidental protection against the future out of this bill, I am glad of it.

I want to go a step further than that and declare to the country and to the world that when we legislate for this island, when we propose a tariff, we have the duty and the power and the privilege, under the Constitution, of imposing a tariff on all articles going to the territory belonging to the United States from the United States, or coming to the United States from the territory belonging to the United States. I want to make a precedent that all men can read with reference to the Philippine Islands; and if Cuba shall come, I want to give notice to Cuba that we propose to protect this industry when it comes to the question of admitting the 1,000,000 tons that will come from Cuba. So I was glad to bring in this substitute, this new bill, that we might assert this principle, that we might give them incidental protection against a threatening future, and at the same time that we might furnish revenue and take care of the needs of that island.

A further thing: We could not extend the internal-revenue laws to that island for the reason that it would destroy other industries; and it occurred to me at once that if we allowed Puerto Rican cigars to come in here without paying an internal-revenue tax, it placed our people at a disadvantage. Our manufacturers would have to pay the 25 per cent of the duties under the Dingley law and in addition to that they would have to pay the internal-revenue tax. I thought the Cigar Makers' Union had a just grievance against the proposition. So we put it into the bill that in addition to that 25 per cent they must pay the amount of the internal revenue.

It occurred to me afterwards that these same people would have to put the internal-revenue stamps on the boxes of cigars whenever they were taken out of the custom-house for consumption; and that is the reason that I wanted to reserve the right to amend the bill if it should become necessary before we get through with it. But we want to give our people at least an equal chance with the people in Puerto Rico in making cigars; and we will do it by this bill.

Wages are cheaper there—30 cents a day in gold; 50 cents in pesos. Can our people compete with that? Well, not right off; but I am glad to hear that those people are learning to realize the value of themselves and the value of their labor. One gentleman who went down there to make cigarettes told me they got a sort of corner on him, and he had to pay $36 a month in gold for making cigarettes, while he could get similar labor in the United States for $1 a day.

I doubted both propositions, because I did not believe the last. Yet I did believe that those people were beginning to realize the worth of themselves and the worth of their labor; and if we put into the hands of these sugar planters the means of paying those people better wages, we have taken a long step in advance in giving prosperity to the poor people of those islands.

Thus we shall encourage them; we shall encourage the sugar planters; we shall encourage the coffee men in the island of Puerto Rico; we shall help to make the people there contented and happy; we shall help to build up a proper school system. And in doing this we are raising the money from those best able to stand it. Of course we might impose a tax of $1 an acre on the poor coffee planter whose land is now mortgaged, and might, perhaps, realize a considerable amount. We might squeeze the money out of some of those people. But why not stop part of it that flows into the coffers of the sugar planters and tobacco planters in Puerto Rico?

Mr. Chairman, I have here a table showing the tariff on various articles—ad valorem duties exacted by Spain and equivalent ad valorem duties under the present bill on those articles going from the United States to Puerto Rico. This table I will print as part of my remarks. It shows an increase in some items, but a great decrease in all items of food. The average Spanish tariff on articles of food was 20 per cent.

Under this bill the article rice paid a duty of 16 per cent. That is a pretty high duty; but you know we put that on to benefit your Georgia planters in raising rice. We did not have to do it. We did not get a vote from your side by reason of doing it. But out of our national spirit we put it on and forced you to take this tariff. But on the article of codfish, for instance, the duty, instead of 20 per cent, is 4.43 per cent under our bill; on flour, 6.25 per cent; on pork, 5 per cent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] be allowed to continue and conclude his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. I would like the gentleman to state how the Spanish tariff on products of the island compares with the provisions of the present bill. I mean the general provisions, and I mean on products, not on imports.

Mr. PAYNE. It is very difficult to get at that. In the first place, they had an export tax from Puerto Rico, and then an import tax, and then a consumption tax, so that when you get all through you can not tell exactly what their tariff amounts to. But under our tariff and under the Spanish tariff, our tariff being nearly 80 per cent ad valorem on sugar, we imported from Puerto Rico two-thirds of their crop and Spain one-third. That shows comparatively what the tariff must have been.

Now, I was about to speak of the item of flour. The Spanish tariff on flour for 1897 was $4 for 92 kilograms, or 200 pounds. In addition to that there was a consumption tax of $2.30, making $6.30 on 200 pounds of flour coming from the United States. The tariff from Spain on flour was smaller than that. The tariff on wheat was $3.15 on 200 pounds. This was on a silver basis.

The idea was that no bushel of wheat should ever be ground in Puerto Rico. Spain bought American wheat, ground it in Spanish mills, and sent it to Puerto Rico at a little under the price at which American flour could be sold there. We got a part of the market even under that tariff of $6.30 upon a barrel of flour. We got a part of the market, but Spain got the most of it. Her tariff as against Puerto Rico, collected at Puerto Rico, was not large on flour.

The whole tariff on food products was 20 per cent. We furnished the most of them. Aside from flour it was not so high; but there was a tariff on our wheat going to Spain which was collected in Spain; and then there was an export duty; and then there was a consumption tax; and when they got through with all this they had pretty nearly equaled the $6.30 tariff that they exacted on American flour, but not quite, so as to hold the market. This bill gives them flour at 6½ per cent ad valorem—the tariff under the Dingley bill being 25 per cent ad valorem on flour.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have not time to go into all of the details of these figures. As I have said, I will have published a table which will give the information, if gentlemen desire to examine it. If the bill passes, it will give to Puerto Rico a better system and a better condition of things than anything they have ever dreamed of under the Spanish tariff rule, which was said to be a nominal tariff and ad valorem in its operation. They will have better trade relations with the rest of the world and cheaper food supplies than they have ever had before.

The rate on cotton cloth—an ad valorem rate—runs a little higher, it is true, than the Spanish rate. But then we consider the fact that the cotton cloth the island consumes is of a cheaper grade and comes in at a cheaper rate under our tariff bill—which is only about 10 per cent on cotton cloth where it is 7 under the Spanish—and Spain herself exported every yard of cotton cloth sent into the island, amounting to about $2,500,000 a year on the cotton cloth that went into Puerto Rico.

Some gentlemen who came here from Puerto Rico, some of them bankers and some engaged in other occupations, sought to induce the committee to authorize a loan to be issued by the island of Puerto Rico; that bonds should be issued and placed upon the market to the amount of some ten to fifteen millions of dollars.

They said, as an inducement to allow the issue of these bonds, that Puerto Rico was out of debt, which is a fact, excepting that there are some $600,000, perhaps, of municipal indebtedness existing; but the island itself is absolutely out of debt. Ten million dollars, these gentlemen said, could be floated as a loan at 7 per cent interest, and they were desirous of taking it up.

Then, if this indebtedness had been incurred and the money received, they could go on and build schoolhouses and roads and spend the money for the benefit of the people of the island, and everything would be glorious and prosperous until some time in the future some man would come around asking them for the 7 per cent interest and finally come around asking for the entire principal of indebtedness.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the last thing that we ought to do is to put this island under bonds against the future industries of their people and for the purpose of raising money for the necessities of the island.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Are these municipal taxes to which the gentleman refers collected by our Government?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; and I will say to the gentleman that they have been reduced to $552,000, including postal receipts. The estimated expenses for postal service is included in the estimate for expenses made by General Davis.

It is estimated that under the operation of the bill the total receipts of the first year will be in the neighborhood of $2,300,000 and the expenses about $1,900,000, giving a surplus of some three hundred and fifty or four hundred thousand dollars if we get the revenue that is contemplated to be raised by the bill. Of course there is a question as to the operation of the bill in the first year. But after that undoubtedly the amount would be increased, and we can reduce taxation.

I would rather await the operation of such a measure as this than to authorize the issuance of bonds and put that poor people in debt. The issuance of bonds is not at all necessary. Tax the man who can afford to pay the tax; that is not hurtful to anybody, and you will get money enough to run the government, to build your schoolhouses and roads, and do whatever is necessary for the convenience and comfort of these people.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. How much school fund comes out of that?

Mr. PAYNE. About $300,000 was estimated for this year. But there will be $350,000 of surplus, and General Davis has now about $500,000 on hand, much of which, I hope, will be available for school purposes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had designed to discuss the meaning of the Constitution of the United States——

Mr. LACEY. Before my friend goes on to that question, I should like to know what the arrangement now is by which the municipalities are obtaining the money to run their affairs?

Mr. PAYNE. By local taxation.

Mr. LACEY. And this does not propose to interfere with such system as they now have under the military government?

Mr. PAYNE. Not at all. But it is said that we have no power under the Constitution to discriminate and fix the duties between the United States and Puerto Rico under this bill. I do not propose to go into a discussion of the dicta of the Supreme Court, which are claimed by the minority to be against our contention in this case. In none of these cases is the question directly involved, and none of them were decisive.

The cases which bear out our contention, some of them directly and others indirectly, are cited in the majority report. I will add a reference to but a single case. That of Endleman et al. vs. United States (86 Federal Reporter, 458, 459), argued before Gilbert, Ross, and Morrow, circuit judges. Morrow, Chief Justice, said:

> In support of the first ground of demurrer it is contended that the law upon which the prosecution is based is unconstitutional, because, among other things, the Government of the United States can exercise only those specific powers conferred upon it by the Constitution; that the Constitution guarantees to the citizens the right to own, hold, and acquire property, and makes no distinction as to the character of the property; that intoxicating liquors are property and are subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic, like any other commodity in which a right of property exists; that, inasmuch as the power to regulate commerce was committed to Congress to relieve it from all restrictions, Congress can not itself impose restrictions upon commerce by prohibiting the sale of a particular commodity; that if Congress has the power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors within the Territories as a police regulation, it can only enact laws applicable to all the Territories alike.
> The answer to these and other like objections urged in the brief of counsel for defendant is found in the now well-established doctrine that the Territories of the United States are entirely subject to the legislative authority of Congress. They are not organized under the Constitution, nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are the creations exclusively of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control. (Benner vs. Porter, 9 How., 235, 242.)
> The United States having rightfully acquired territory, and being the only Government which can impose laws upon them, has the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and state. (Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Pet., 511, 542; Cross vs. Harrison, 16 How., 164, 193; National Bank vs. Yankton County, 101 U. S., 129, 133; Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S., 15, 44; 5 Sup. Ct., 747; Late Corporation of Church Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints vs. United States, 136 U. S., 1, 42, 43; 10 Sup. Ct., 792; McAllister vs. United States, 141 U. S., 174, 181; 11 Sup. Ct., 949; Shively vs. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1, 48; 14 Sup. Ct., 548.)
> Under this full and comprehensive authority Congress has unquestionably the power to exclude intoxicating liquors from any or all its Territories or limit their sale under such regulations as it may prescribe. It may legislate in accordance with the special needs of each locality and vary its regulations to meet the conditions and circumstances of the people. Whether the subject elsewhere would be a matter of local police regulation or within State control under some other power it is immaterial to consider. In a Territory all the functions of government are within the legislative jurisdiction of Congress and may be exercised through a local government or directly by such legislation as we have now under consideration.

It is now universally conceded that we have the power to acquire territory by conquest or by treaty. I find no limit in the Constitution to this power. It may be for the purpose of removing all fetters from the mouth of a great river, or for coaling stations, or for the building of an isthmian canal, the opening of guano beds, or the formation of States, or any other end which may suit the purpose of the American people.

Having acquired, the nation may dispose of territory. This is inherent to the right to acquire, and it is as broad as the right. We never lose these rights until we give to the Territory the attribute of a State or otherwise extend the Constitution over it. This right also comes from the express language of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

In governing the Territories, Congress has all the powers of the State and of the United States combined. Such has been the legislative construction of the Constitution for a hundred years.

Congress has always assumed that its power was supreme. By the act of October 31, 1803, in respect to Louisiana, "All the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion." Here is an absolute government set up, without any provision for the right of habeas corpus, trial by jury, or any other guaranty of the Constitution to the citizens of the United States.

The act of March 26, 1804, in respect to Louisiana, was drawn by Madison, with the advice of Jefferson. It declares, "In all criminal prosecutions which are capital the trial shall be by jury of twelve good and lawful men of the vicinage, and in all cases, criminal and civil, in the superior court trial shall be by jury if either of the parties require it." What becomes of the guaranty of the Constitution that all criminal cases and all civil cases involving $20 or more shall be tried by a jury? If the fathers believed that the Constitution ex proprio vigore extended to a newly acquired Territory, solemnly annexed, of what use are these words?——

> The inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, * * * and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted.

If the inhabitants of that Territory were entitled to self-government, why did they provide in the fourth section for a government consisting of a governor and thirteen councilors, to be called a legislative council, to be appointed annually by the President of the United States? Evidently the fathers believed that the Constitution did not extend to a Territory unless by an act of Congress, and that the Congress had full and absolute power to govern the Territories regardless of the restrictions of the Constitution limiting their powers as to the States.

Over the States they had only such powers as were granted under the Constitution, one of which was uniform duties, excises, etc. As to the territory belonging to the United States their power was unlimited. These various ordinances in regard to Louisiana are but a sample of those applied from time to time to other territory which afterwards belonged to the United States. Precisely similar legislation was enacted concerning the Territory of Florida in 1819 and again in 1822.

Mr. Roscoe C. Brown discusses this Florida case in an interesting manner in The Open Court, from which I quote:

> This same question came up with reference to Florida in 1822. The bill was modeled on that of Orleans in its administrative features, and contained a section forbidding the Territorial government to transgress the personal rights guaranteed to the people of the States by the Constitution. Mr. Montgomery, of Kentucky, tried to substitute a clause that all the principles of the Constitution and all the prohibitions to legislation, as well with respect to Congress as the legislatures of the States, be "declared to be applicable to the said Territory, as paramount acts." This was voted down, and the following is Benton's comment on the incident (Benton's Abridgment, Volume VII, page 295, note):
> "This prompt rejection of Mr. Montgomery's proposition shows what the Congress of 1822 thought of the right of Territories to the enjoyment of any part of the Constitution of the United States. * * * The only question between Mr. Montgomery's proposition and the clause already in the bill was as to the tenure by which these rights should be held—whether under the Constitution of the United States or under a law of Congress and the treaty of cession. And the decision was that they should be held under the law and the treaty.
> "Thus a direct issue was made between constitutional rights on one hand and the discretion of Congress on the other in the government of this Territory, and decided promptly and without debate (for there was no speech after that of Mr. Rea on either side) against the Constitution. It was tantamount to the express declaration: 'You shall have these principles which are in the Constitution, but not as a constitutional right; nor even as a grant under the Constitution, but as a justice flowing from our discretion, and as an obligation imposed by the treaty which transferred you to our sovereignty.'"

Justice Story, in his Commentaries, section 1328, has thus stated this doctrine:

The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled.

Cooley on Constitution, page 36, says:

The Constitution was made for the States, not for the Territories. It confers power to govern the Territories, but in exercising this the United States is a sovereign dealing with a dependent Territory according as in its wisdom shall seem politic, wise, and just, having regard to its own interests as well as to those of the Territories.

And he cites cases to support this proposition:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. (Const., art. 4, sec. 3.)

The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions, or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled. (2 Story—Const., 1328.)

It will be remembered that the original charter of the United States Bank, of February 25, 1791, authorized the directors to establish offices of discount and deposit "wherever they shall see fit within the United States." When Louisiana was annexed they desired to establish a branch in New Orleans. Believing that they had no right to do this, they sought the authority of Congress. On the 23d of March, 1804, the President approved an act authorizing the directors to establish branches on the terms of the original act in any part of the Territories or dependencies of the United States. This was another legislative construction of the meaning of the term "United States." It will be noticed also that the word "dependencies" is used in this act. They seem to have questioned whether the word "Territories" would authorize the establishment of this branch in New Orleans.

It is worthy of note that the first internal-revenue tax on spirits distilled in the United States, and which became a law on the 3d of March, 1791, directed "that the United States shall be divided into fourteen districts, each consisting of one State." No attention was paid to the Territories of the United States, although they were becoming populated and large towns existed in some portions of them. So, too, the original law for the collection of customs duties, of April 31, 1789, divided the States into districts, but did not extend over the Territories. Tennessee had no custom-house until it was admitted as a State, when Congress extended the customs laws to the State of Tennessee. Goods were admitted free into the Territories until 1799, when for the first time customs laws were put in force in any part of the Northwest Territory.

When Vermont was first admitted into the Union Congress did not believe that the tariff law extended over Vermont; hence a special enactment was passed extending these laws over the State of Vermont.

From time to time during the first half of the last century Congress was kept busy, by special enactments, in extending the Constitution over the United States. Finally the following general law, which became section 1928 of the Revised Statutes, was enacted:

The Constitution and all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within all the organized Territories and every Territory hereafter organized as elsewhere within the United States.

A part of the same joint resolution by which the Hawaiian Islands were annexed provided that they are—

Annexed as part of the territory of the United States and are subject to the sovereign dominion thereof, * * * and until legislation is enacted extending the United States customs laws and regulations to them the existing customs regulations of the Hawaiian Islands with the United States shall remain unchanged.

Yet no one charged that this legislation was unconstitutional, and no charge of imperialism was made. This happened only eighteen months ago. But it was some time before the treaty of Paris, and no one had thought to make political capital out of the false cry of imperialism.

During all these one hundred years no citizen of the United States, feeling aggrieved by these alleged imperial laws, has gone into the United States court and sought redress. This uniform interpretation of the Constitution by Congress has not been questioned by any citizen of the United States in any court.

In respect to Puerto Rico, we are not hampered by treaty stipulations or by act of Congress. There has been no law extending the Constitution over the island. In this it differs from the status of every formerly acquired territory. We have absolute power.

This principle for which we contend was claimed in the debate on the first Louisiana legislation and was enacted into the law. It has been repeated in the legislation as to each and every part of the territory belonging to the United States. No citizen claiming to be injured as to his rights has seen fit to question the power of Congress as absolute over the territory belonging to the United States, except in the few cases cited in the report. This principle has not only been ingrafted into the laws, but has been sanctioned through the century by the acquiescence of the people.

But now the opposition say this is imperialism. You are but reechoing the cry of the opposition of a hundred years ago. Still the majority moved on, and the American people approved their course. The Territory of Louisiana, in the plenary powers given to the President, survived and flourished until 1812, when part of it was organized into the Territory of Missouri, with a legislature at that late day composed of a legislative council appointed by the President and an assembly elected by the people. Here again we had "imperialism," but the fathers wisely waited until this people were fit for self-government before they extended the limitations and the privileges of the Constitution to them. The same is true of the Territory of Florida.

Only a year and a half ago Congress, by a two-thirds vote in the House and a two-thirds vote in the Senate, annexed Hawaii by an act modeled after the Florida and Louisiana acts, which was in these words:

Until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands all the civil, judicial, and military powers exercised by the officers of the existing government in said islands shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct; and the President shall have power to remove said officers and fill the vacancies so occasioned.

The debate was strong and furious, but according to my recollection no gentleman in the opposition raised the cry of imperialism against the manner in which Congress asserted the right to its absolute power to provide any sort of government for this new territory. Nor is there danger in all this. Congress, representing the American people, is ever swift to put the power of government into the hands of any people "of the territory belonging to the United States."

I want to make this further suggestion. Gentlemen who are lawyers are honestly divided on this question—this constitutional question. We believe that the United States means the United States, in the Constitution, and that the words that are added, giving us power to dispose of and make rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States, refer to a different subject from the United States itself—to territory belonging to the United States. We believe that there is that plain distinction. Some gentlemen profess to believe otherwise.

If this bill is passed it will give the Supreme Court of the United States the first opportunity it has ever had to meet that question fairly and squarely and say whether the limitation for uniform taxation in the United States refers to the United States or to the United States and the territory belonging to the United States. It may be an important question to be considered in the future when we come to legislate for the Philippine Islands, when we come to legislate, if we have to, with respect to Cuba, and I think it would be a good proposition to submit that question now to the Supreme Court. If you are right, gentlemen, in your contention we shall have difficulty when we come to legislate for our other islands. We shall have difficulty in protecting the interests of the people, the manufacturers, the farmers of the United States. If we are right in our contention, our way is more simple.

As for the people of Puerto Rico, I would move as fast as their own good will warrant. Pass this bill, which even the gentleman from Massachusetts admits is a well-considered measure from a fiscal standpoint, and give them better markets and abundant revenue. Do not tie down their destinies to the whim of the 88 per cent illiterate or to the caprice of the 12 per cent of the educated, who have known no government except Spanish misrule. Keep them all in leading strings until you have educated them up to the full stature of American manhood, and then crown them with the glory of American citizenship. In the meantime give them all the rights accorded to our own people under the Constitution, consistent with their best interest and well-being.

Our duty now, Mr. Chairman, is, in the first place, to restore, nay, to give law and order in the Philippine Islands, then to investigate, then to legislate, remembering that these people are uneducated, remembering that it would be unsafe to give the full power of government to the illiterates or to those who can read and write.

The rights of neither would be preserved. The rights of either would be unsafe.

We can proceed as did the fathers a hundred years ago, who had no scruples on that question, but believed that Congress had the absolute power over the territory of the United States.

It is our duty to take these poor people and educate them and lift them up and give them the privileges of the Constitution and the privileges of government as they shall grow in education and in knowledge.

And finally, whether we send them forth among the nations of the earth or annex them as States in this Union, we will bring them up to the full level and stature of American manhood. Wherever the flag is raised it shall not go down until it covers beneath its folds a people enjoying the blessings of civilization, of freedom, and of sovereign citizenship. MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LITTLEFIELD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 854. An act for the relief of Lieut. Horace P. McIntosh; and

S. 392. An act to pay the General Marine Insurance Company of Dresden the sum of $1,434.12 for certain coupons detached from United States bonds, which said coupons were lost on the Cunard steamship Oregon, sunk at sea on March 14, 1886.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5493) for the relief of claimants having suits against the United States pending in the circuit and district courts of the United States affected by the act of June 27, 1898, amending the act of March 3, 1887.

TRADE OF PUERTO RICO.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RICHARDSON rose and was recognized.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] may be permitted to conclude his remarks without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may conclude his remarks without interruption. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not an alarmist. Those on this floor who know me and have done me the honor to listen to what I have had to say on former occasions when speaking to pending measures will bear me witness that I have not been accustomed to indulge in extravagant statement or vehement denunciation. I endeavor at all times to be conservative, and I may add I am naturally inclined to optimism. With this much of preface of a personal character, I begin by saying that in my judgment the pending bill is more dangerous to the liberties of the people of this Republic than any measure ever before seriously presented to the American Congress. It will prove more far-reaching in its provisions and disastrous in the results that must of necessity follow if it should be enacted into law than any act ever passed by Congress. These statements are broad, I confess, but that they are true I do most solemnly assert, as the result of my best and most deliberate judgment.

The objects and purposes of this bill are as follows:

The first section declares that its provisions shall apply to Puerto Rico and its adjacent islands, ceded by treaty of April 11, 1899, by Spain to the United States.

Section 2 provides that all merchandise imported into Puerto Rico from ports other than United States ports shall pay the rate of tariff duties collected on merchandise from foreign countries imported into the United States.

Section 3 imposes a tariff tax on all merchandise coming into the United States from Puerto Rico, and into that island from the United States, at a rate equal to 25 per cent of the duties collected on merchandise imported into the United States from foreign countries; and further provides that duties collected in United States ports upon manufactured goods from Puerto Rico shall be equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax imposed by the United States upon the same articles manufactured in the United States, and in addition thereto 25 per cent of the duties now collected by law upon like articles of merchandise imported from foreign countries, and that duties collected in the island upon manufactured goods from the United States shall be equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in Puerto Rico upon articles manufactured therein, and in addition thereto 25 per cent of the duties now collected by law upon like articles of merchandise imported from foreign countries.

Section 4 provides that the net collections under this act in Puerto Rico and the gross amount collected on merchandise from the island into the United States shall be placed at the disposal of the President for the expenses of the island.

The bill is framed upon the idea and the assumption that Congress enters upon the government of Puerto Rico unrestrained by the provisions of the Constitution.

This assumption we deny. Those of us who oppose this measure, I believe without exception, maintain that the bill can not be enacted into law without a total disregard and violation of not simply the spirit but the express letter of the Constitution. In the report the majority of the committee say:

Upon the whole we conclude:

First. That upon reason and authority the term "United States," as used in the Constitution, has reference only to the States that constitute the Federal Union and does not include Territories.

Second. That the power of Congress with respect to legislation for the Territories is plenary.

Third. That under that power Congress may prescribe different rates of duty for Puerto Rico from those prescribed for the United States.

The claim or contention thus made was never before set up on the floor of Congress in so far as I know. This country has grown from a small and feeble territory on the Atlantic Ocean, with about 827,000 square miles, to the mightiest republic of this earth, with an area of 3,500,000 square miles. It has increased in population from three to over seventy millions. This marvelous expansion to continental growth and grandeur has all taken place within about one hundred years. The Louisiana territory, Florida, Texas, California, New Mexico, Oregon, and Alaska have all been acquired under our Constitution without a jar or strain to any of its wise and beneficent provisions and without any demand for its amendment. This growth was natural expansion. Then these acquisitions were of desirable lands without people, but we should beware of the acquisition of undesirable people without lands. I am partisan enough to stop here a sufficient time to call attention to the fact that every foot of this vast domain was acquired and annexed under Democratic Presidents. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

An exception to this statement may possibly be taken by some so far as it applies to Alaska; yet it will not be denied that Alaska was acquired while Andrew Johnson, a Democrat, was President. These acquisitions of territory were wise and proper to be made. The Democratic party has always favored proper expansion. Here permit me to say with great emphasis that those of us opposing this measure are not basing our opposition to it on the ground that it is a measure for expansion. This is not a measure of expansion. Whether the Constitution of the United States is extended to the island of Puerto Rico, ex proprio vigore, or not, it must be admitted that when we enter upon legislation for the island, as Congress will do if it passes this bill, that question will be put at rest and the territory will then be a part of the United States.

The control of the President and of the military will have ceased and the expansion as to the island will have been completed. Legislation by Congress for the island at once makes it a part of the United States. If this bill passes, it must follow that it is then a part of the United States. This being true, the proposition which this bill carries for unequal taxation of the island as a portion of the United States is the baldest form of imperialism.

The opposition to this bill plants itself upon this ground. The measure is imperialism itself. In the former acquisitions to which I have referred no such measure as the pending one was ever proposed or deemed necessary. When the Louisiana territory was acquired, when Texas was annexed, when California and Arizona and New Mexico and other Territories were acquired, did any man rise in this House or the other body of this Congress and offer such a legislative proposition as the pending one? This effort, therefore, clearly marks the dividing line between all former acquisitions and that of Puerto Rico, if it be conceded that the enactment of the proposed bill into law is required.

All former acquisitions of territory were made in a constitutional way. It is true, as we were informed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] a few days since in a most interesting speech, that the great founder of the Democratic party, Mr. Jefferson, at first doubted the constitutional right to acquire the Louisiana territory. But this doubt was soon dispelled, and all agreed that an amendment was unnecessary. All former acquisitions were first held as territory (except in the case of Texas, which was admitted into the Union as a State), and by easy and gradual steps were prepared for statehood. Nearly all such territory has been made into States.

Every provision of the Constitution, the grants of power as well as the limitations of that instrument, have been smoothly and regularly applied to these Territories, and in no instance has it ever been considered wise or necessary to make the slightest infraction of our great charter. Is it so now? Can we, in conformity with former rules and regulations and laws which controlled us in annexations of territory, do so now without violating our organic law? If not, the argument to my mind is strong, and perhaps unanswerable, that such annexation should not be made. They will cost us more if this be necessary than they can ever be worth. If we are determined to make such annexations, and if they can not be made and the territories governed without violating the Constitution, then as wise legislators and as patriots we should set to work to so amend the Constitution as to allow us to accomplish the desired end. We should not march to that end over the dead and mangled form of the fundamental law we have sworn to protect and defend.

I am not speaking here of the Philippine Islands, as they are not involved in the pending measure. As to Puerto Rico, we may be able to govern it as we have governed all territorial possessions in the past. I believe we can, though the task will not be free from difficulty. The territory is a small one in area. The population is not large. It is near by us. The inhabitants have given every assurance that they desire to be with us and a part of us, to enjoy our free institutions and our civilization. The chief objection to having the island annexed, to my mind, consists in the fact that there is so little room there for an increase in the population. It is already far more densely populated than our own territory, and there is no room or but little room for more people in the island. The population is about 300 to the square mile, or more than ten times as great as in the United States.

Being a part of our possessions as the result of a war which we did not, by our own declaration, wage for conquest, I might be willing to accept it and try the experiment of governing it as we have controlled all of the territory in the past. I can never agree to the plan of dealing with it as is proposed in the pending bill. Sir, this is but the beginning of our troubles if we enter upon the policy of imperialism. The box of unmeasurable evils fabled to have been presented to Pandora by Jupiter, from which, when opened, countless ills and diseases issued forth to afflict mankind, was as nothing as compared to the ills and diseases that will afflict us in our body politic when the policy of imperialism is developed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is a tax measure. The power to tax is the power to destroy. This is the language of the Supreme Court, if it be not unlawful at this period of our history to quote the language of that high tribunal. All taxes are burdens to be borne. They are necessary burdens. They are borne without murmur and without complaint, no matter how high they may be and onerous they are, if they are only equal and uniform in their burden. Under our beloved Government, with a Constitution approaching perfection, all its blessings fall, share and share alike, on all its citizens everywhere, and all its burdens, great and small, are laid equally on the people. The wisest clause in it, perhaps, is that one which declares that all taxes shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Equality of taxation, equality of governmental exactions, equality of contributions to the nation's revenue are the privileges expressly guaranteed every citizen of the Republic. Upon no other principle or theory can we hope to raise the millions and hundreds of millions necessary for governmental purposes. When these exactions are equal and uniform none can complain or murmur. When they are unequal the complaints will be loud and long, and will eventually rend us and destroy the Government. Mr. Jefferson announced a great truth when he said that "all taxes to be just must be uniform."

The power of Congress to levy taxes is derived from section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

In construing this section we must first decide what is meant by the term "United States" as here used. Does the term include simply the area actually included within the boundaries of the States, or does it cover all the territory belonging to the United States?

The committee in framing the pending bill proceed upon the idea and make the contention that the term "United States" as used in the Constitution has reference only to the States that constitute the Federal Union, and does not include Territories. They assert that the power of Congress with respect to legislation for the Territories is plenary, and that Congress may prescribe different rates of duty for Puerto Rico from those prescribed for the States.

I dissent in toto from this conclusion. I insist that the meaning of the term "United States" as here employed (whatever definition may be given to the term when used elsewhere) is the designation of the whole of the American Republic, which is composed of States and Territories.

I shall cite decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which in my judgment are absolutely decisive of this question. As I read and understand our early history one of the leading objects in calling the convention which adopted the Constitution was to make duties and customs equal and uniform. When the Constitution was framed and adopted it was declared by its makers that "We do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." When this was done we then owned the great Northwest Territory, as large or larger in extent than the original States. It was expected and intended that this vast territory would be peopled by many who were then inhabitants of the thirteen old States and their descendants. The framers of the Constitution most assuredly did not mean that these people were not to enjoy its benefits and the blessings of liberty.

This Territory must have been, in the opinion of the framers of the Constitution, included within the term "United States" as they used it. I have just stated that one of the chief objects the framers of the Constitution had in mind was to make customs duties equal and uniform. The complaint was at that time that New York could lay and collect a different duty from that levied and collected at Boston, or Charleston, or other ports. The Northwest Territory was adjacent to Canada and the Great Lakes, and also was bounded by the Mississippi River, opening a market to the world by way of the Gulf. There were ports and landing places on these Great Lakes and the Mississippi River within this Territory, and, as stated, it bordered on Canada. It was not to be supposed that it was intended at that time that these ports would not be bound by the equality of rates of duties while in a Territorial condition. There could have been no reason for the requirement that uniformity should be observed at the ports within the thirteen States, with all the other ports and landing places in the Territory open to different rates.

It is not necessary for me, however, in attempting to make answer to the contention of gentlemen who favor the bill, to tax the patience of the House with arguments of my own. The question has been squarely met and passed upon by the Supreme Court. If I shall be able to adduce even one decision of that court defining the term "United States" as used, a decision that has never been overruled, it seems to me that the controversy should end. I shall offer the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, possibly the greatest jurist who has ever adorned that high tribunal. In this case he spoke for the entire court.

The case referred to is Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, page 319), and was decided in 1820. The decision has stood for eighty years as the solemn adjudication of the court upon a pending question, and has been acquiesced in by the bench, the bar, Congress, and the whole people of the land. I will not read all the case, but will submit so much of it as bears directly upon the matter in controversy.

Judge Marshall said:

> The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" for the purposes thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words, which modify the grant. These words are: "But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend.
> The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania, and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises shall be observed in the one than the other. Since then the power to lay and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is obviously coextensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises; and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States.

The United States, said Chief Justice Marshall, are a great Republic of States and Territories; and yet these gentlemen come to the lame and impotent conclusion in their report that the term "United States" means the original thirteen States and the States that have been added to the American Union, and no Territories. [Applause on Democratic side.]

I know, gentlemen who make other contention will insist that this opinion is obiter dictum, and therefore not binding. I can not agree that this is true. The court was required to construe the word "taxes" in the clause quoted, and in doing so properly took into account the whole clause. If it were dictum it was such a declaration of opinion as has stood the test of time and has never been overruled. But it was not dictum.

I repeat, this opinion of Chief Justice Marshall has stood for eighty years. It was given in a case in which he was compelled to rule upon and give construction to the very language we are construing here to-day. He says that "the United States" means all the States and the territory of our great empire, and I wish no higher authority.

The committee, as authority for their action, quote clause 2, section 3, of Article IV of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

What is meant by this provision of the Constitution? The friends of this measure say that this provision means "that the power of Congress with respect to legislation for the Territories is plenary."

The meaning of plenary in its largest sense is full, entire, complete.

If it be meant that the right to legislate for the Territories is full, entire, and complete within the limits of the Constitution, the position assumed is correct. If it be meant that Congress has the right to legislate for the Territories in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution and along the lines that are prohibited by that instrument, I can not agree that the position is correct. When it is asserted that this power to legislate is plenary by the advocates of the pending bill, they mean to say that there is no prohibition, no restriction, and no limitation on the power of Congress in legislating for the Territories. The language of the Constitution is that—

Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

This is a reasonable provision, and a highly proper one. It is necessary that the authority for the exercise of the power here given should be lodged somewhere, and very properly it was lodged with Congress. But I can not see where there is reason for the contention that the power given can be exercised contrary to the Constitution. If it be true, as is contended, that Congress has plenary power over the Territories to the extent claimed by the advocates of the pending measure, and as they attempt to apply that power to Puerto Rico in the bill, then it follows that Congress may enact laws which would be unconstitutional within the limits of the States of the Union, but which would be constitutional within the Territories.

This can not be true. The words they quote do not sustain them in their contention. It is monstrous to suppose that Congress is not restrained by the Constitution from passing laws imposing customs duties on the minerals and ores of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, the furs and fish of Alaska, the lumber of Oklahoma, and of all products of these Territories when imported into any of the States of the Union, and also upon all importations of products of every kind into the Territories from the States, or any one of them. If the action it is proposed to take by this bill in respect to Puerto Rico can be taken, it must inevitably follow that Congress can pass laws imposing customs duties affecting all the Territories as indicated above.

There are limitations upon governmental absolutism imposed by the Constitution upon the Government of the United States in all places over which it has territorial jurisdiction. Let us see where we will be placed by the contention of the advocates of the bill. There are limitations upon the Government in that part of the country in which "State" governments exist, but I am not discussing these limitations here. The constitutional limitations upon the Government of the United States which run with the Government in all places throughout the country I will in part enumerate, that the importance and magnitude and far-reaching effects of the contemplated legislation may be better realized and understood. The enactment of the bill into law means the abolition of these just limitations. They are:

The Congress shall pass no bill of attainder or ex post facto law, nor define treason to be anything but the levying of war against the United States or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States.

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.

No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

That the Government shall not arrest by general warrant; shall not suspend the writ of habeas corpus in time of peace; shall not require excessive bail; shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for redress of grievances, or respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; shall not raise revenue except by bills originating in the lower House of Congress; shall not appropriate money except by a legislative act for a public purpose; shall not take property for a public purpose without making just compensation therefor; shall not prosecute for felonious crime except through the form of grand jury indictment; shall not authorize any unreasonable delay in the trial of a person held for crime; shall not deprive an accused person of the right to have counsel, nor deny to him information of the nature and cause of his arraignment, nor prevent him from confronting the witnesses against him, nor refuse him compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, nor prosecute him the second time for the same offense, nor compel him to give testimony in a criminal action against himself, nor impose excessive fines, or cruel or unusual punishments; shall not levy and collect any duties, imposts, and excises, except they be uniform throughout the United States; shall not seize property nor authorize its seizure by general search warrants; shall not quarter soldiers in any house in time of peace without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner prescribed by law; shall not deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny the right of trial by jury in suits at common law.

Others might be mentioned. But with these limitations to be found in the Constitution, and the others that might be mentioned, it will appear that if the contention of the friends of the pending measure be allowed, the foregoing just limitations may or may not be applied in the Territories as the Congress may from time to time decide.

Mr. TERRY. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the provisions he has just read are from the Bill of Rights.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true, the most of them are; and yet it will depend upon the whim of a Congress, shifting in politics from time to time, as to whether these just limitations shall be applied to the Territories that we own if this bill be passed.

It will be seen that one of the above limitations is that "Congress shall not levy and collect any duties, imposts, and excises except they be uniform throughout the United States." The contention made by those on the other side is that these taxes need not be uniform throughout the United States, and that Congress can make them unequal by virtue of clause 2, section 3, of Article IV of the Constitution. If this limitation does not restrain Congress in the enactment of law for a Territory, then, as stated, no one of the limitations will do so. It will follow that Congress can pass bills of attainder for the Territory, and that for certain crimes the penalty may be corruption of blood beyond the life of the criminal. It will also follow that Congress can pass laws in the Territories abridging the freedom of speech and of the press, and apply or refuse to apply any one of the limitations I have enumerated, or any other limitation in the Constitution.

But what I stated in respect to the proper construction of the term "United States" a little while gone, I now repeat as to the proper construction of the language quoted by the committee, and upon which they rely for the authority to pass the pending bill, and of the whole power of Congress to legislate under the clause of the Constitution they cite, to wit:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

I insist here again that the Supreme Court, if it be not unlawful to say so, has passed upon this question and has left us no doubt as to our power to deal with and govern the Territories of the United States. I shall quote some of the decisions of that court when considering the question before us.

I believe the true theory to be that the Constitution applies to the whole domain of the United States—that is, both States and Territories. The plenary power given Congress over the Territories is the control of their Territorial and municipal government and laws, but this power must be exercised under the limitations of the Constitution. The decisions of the Supreme Court, to which I will refer, and from which I will quote brief extracts, establish this principle beyond controversy.

In the case of National Bank vs. County of Yankton (101 U. S. Reports), after announcing that Territories are but political subdivisions of the domain of the United States, Chief Justice Waite said, with reference to the organic law of a Territory:

It is obligatory on and binds the Territorial authorities, but Congress is supreme, and for the purposes of this department of its governmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S. Reports) the court says:

Congress can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids such legislation.

In Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S. Reports) the court says:

In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common-law cases. The act of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule and could not be treated as attempting to do so.

In Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S. Reports) the court, through Justice Harlan, says:

That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

In Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S. Reports) the court says:

The people of the United States as sovereign owners of national Territories have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of the Government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied in its terms.

In Callan vs. Wilson (127 U. S. Reports) the court says:

There is nothing in the history of the Constitution or of the original amendments to justify the assertion that the people of this District may be lawfully deprived of the benefit of any of the constitutional guaranties of life, liberty, and property, and especially of the privilege of the trial by jury in criminal cases. * * * We can not think that the people of this District have, in that regard, less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States.

In the celebrated case of Dred Scott vs. Sanford (19 Howard's Reports) this territorial question is exhaustively discussed, and though there were dissenting opinions in the case, the discussion of that question is instructive. Upon the pending question, however, there was no difference of opinion by the learned judges, the majority of the court and the dissenting justices agreeing in the conclusion reached. The able Chief Justice, R. B. Taney, among other things, said:

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States. That power is plainly given, and if a new State is admitted it needs no further legislation by Congress, because the Constitution itself defines the relative rights and powers and duties of the State and the citizens of the State and the Federal Government. But no power is given to acquire a territory to be held and governed permanently in that character.

And, indeed, the power exercised by Congress to acquire territory and establish a government there according to its own unlimited discretion was viewed with great jealousy by the leading statesmen of the day. * * *

We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given, and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of a territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

Justice McLean says:

In organizing the government of a Territory Congress is limited to means appropriate to the attainment of the constitutional object. No powers can be exercised which are prohibited by the Constitution or which are contrary to its spirit, so that, whether the object may be the protection of the persons and property of purchasers of the public lands or of communities who have been annexed to the Union by conquest or purchase, they are initiatory to the establishment of State governments, and no more power can be claimed or exercised than is necessary to the attainment of the end. This is the limitation of all the Federal powers.

Justice Curtis gave especial attention to the language quoted, and said in respect to it:

Since, then, this power was manifestly conferred to enable the United States to dispose of its public lands to settlers, and to admit them into the Union as States, when in the judgment of Congress they should be fitted therefor; since these were the needs provided for; since it is confessed that government is indispensable to provide for those needs, and the power is to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory, I can not doubt that this is a power to govern the inhabitants of the Territory by such laws as Congress deems needful until they obtain admission as States.

The same justice said:

If, then, this clause does contain a power to legislate respecting the Territory, what are the limits to that power? To this I answer that in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress it finds limits in the express prohibitions of Congress not to do certain things; that in the exercise of the legislative power Congress can not pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder, and so in respect to each of the other prohibitions contained in the Constitution.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case I have already quoted, Loughborough vs. Blake, in discussing the government of Territories, used the following language:

The difference between requiring a continent, with an immense population, to submit to be taxed by a government having no common interest with it, separated from it by a vast ocean, restrained by no principle of apportionment, and associated with it by no common feelings, and permitting the representatives of the American people, under the restrictions of our Constitution, to tax a part of the society which is either in a state of infancy advancing to manhood, looking forward to complete equality as soon as that state of manhood shall be attained, as is the case with the Territories, or which has voluntarily relinquished the right of representation and has adopted the whole body of Congress for its legitimate government, as is the case with the District, is too obvious not to present itself to the minds of all.

The committee, in behalf of the contention they make, quote in their report on this bill the argument of Mr. Webster, in the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, decided by the Supreme Court in 1828. Mr. Webster made the argument in the case which they quote, but it is proper to state that the court did not follow his argument. The opinion in that case was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, who had eight years prior thereto delivered the opinion in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake. This great jurist did not overrule in the Canter case the judgment of the court in the Loughborough case. In the Canter case he discussed fully the provision in the Constitution which we are now discussing, which provides:

That Congress may make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

He expressly held that the laws made by the Territorial legislature of Florida (that being one of the questions before the court) and all the laws made by Congress in respect thereto were not to be "inconsistent with the laws and Constitution of the United States."

But it is hardly fair, I submit, to that eminent lawyer, Mr. Webster, that his argument as an advocate in a lawsuit should be quoted against him as his solemn opinion on a great constitutional question. Such an argument, I think, can hardly be considered as authority, though it can not be shown that Mr. Webster in his argument cited, or ever at any time in his long and illustrious career put forth the claim, that the power given by the Constitution to Congress over the territory of the United States authorized the passage of such a bill as that now presented to us.

I challenge gentlemen on the other side of the question to show where and when the great expounder of the Constitution ever claimed for Congress the power to levy taxes in the States or Territories that were unequal and not uniform. I shall quote here a more mature and more reliable opinion of Mr. Webster. This opinion was not advanced by him as an advocate in a lawsuit, but was given by him from his high place which he so much adorned, his seat in the United States Senate. Speaking on the proposition we are now discussing, on the 23d of March, 1848, from his high place in the Senate, he said:

An arbitrary government may have territorial governments in distant possessions, because an arbitrary government may rule its distant territories by different laws and different systems. Russia may govern the Ukraine, and the Caucasus, and Kamchatka by different codes or ukases. We can do no such thing. They must be of us—part of us—or else estranged. I think I see, then, in progress what is to disfigure and deform the Constitution. * * * I think I see a course adopted that is likely to turn the Constitution under which we live into a deformed monster—into a curse rather than a blessing—into a great frame of unequal government, not founded on popular representation, but founded in the grossest inequalities; and I think if it go on, for there is a great danger that it will go on, that this Government will be broken up.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, if this was the opinion of Mr. Webster, I am warranted in the strong assertion I made at the outset, that this bill, if it passes, establishes imperialism in this country and nothing else, and it will be, in my judgment, the beginning of the end. I may be mistaken in the result it will have on the dominant party in the United States. The gentleman who preceded me [Mr. PAYNE] spoke of the great hurricane that swept over the unfortunate island of Puerto Rico in August, 1899, but I say to him and to the country that in my humble judgment if you pass this bill, if you take this step and plunge the country into imperialism, that that hurricane will be but a gentle zephyr compared to the mighty whirlwind which will follow and sweep the Republican party from power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The conclusion of the matter must be from all the authorities cited that the Constitution requires that taxation shall be uniform throughout the United States—that is, all the States and Territories of the United States. The object was to make permanent and effective and as unchangeable as the organic law can be, throughout the United States, the principle that all taxes imposed by the General Government upon the property of the people, except direct taxes, which, for political reasons, were required to be apportioned among the States, should be equal and uniform everywhere within its jurisdiction. There is nothing in the language of the Constitution, or in the history of the times, to justify the conclusion that the men who framed it, or the States and people when it was ratified, intended to deprive themselves and their posterity of the protection afforded by the well-settled rule requiring uniformity and equality in taxation.

The direct taxes were required to be apportioned among the States, without expressly requiring uniformity in the rates within each State; but not so as to all other taxes. The constitutional provision for the imposition of "duties, imposts, and excises," which include all other taxes, expressly required them to be uniform throughout the United States. Uniformity and inequality are incompatible terms, and consequently uniformity throughout the United States forbids inequality anywhere in the United States.

I come now to discuss another phase of the question presented by this bill. The feature to which I shall now address myself is fraught with immense interest to the inhabitants of Puerto Rico.

If it be conceded that Congress has the power to legislate in accordance with the provisions of the pending bill, then the exercise of such power would be unwise. If we pass this bill it will be an act of bad faith toward the people of Puerto Rico. We were told that the inhabitants of that island gladly welcomed General Miles and the armies of the United States in July, 1898, when they invaded their territory and struck down the power of Spain. This they did because they were assured, and confidently believed, that as the tyrannous shackles of Spain were stricken from them they were to be admitted to the immunities and blessings of our liberal institutions, as well as our enlightened civilization.

We are told our soldiers were hailed as redeemers. Why were they hailed as redeemers? It was because of the alluring promises held out to the inhabitants of the islands by the United States. Speaking through our representative directly to those people, solemn promises were made. They are to be found in the proclamation of the Commanding General of the United States Army as that army under him invaded the island. Whatever ground of complaint we may have had against Spain to justify us in the war, no one will assert that we had any cause of war against the people of that island. We did not enter upon a war against them. They did not "welcome our soldiers with hospitable hands to bloody graves," but, on the other hand, hailed them as redeemers. We asked them to become our allies and they did so. Here is the proclamation of Major-General Miles:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Ponce, P. R., July 28, 1898.

To the Inhabitants of Puerto Rico:

In the prosecution of the war against the Kingdom of Spain by the people of the United States in the cause of liberty, justice, and humanity, its military forces have come to occupy the island of Puerto Rico.

Mr. TERRY. Have that printed in big capitals. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I call the attention of the Reporters to the remarks of my friend from Arkansas. [Laughter.]

The proclamation continues:

They come bearing the banner of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose to seek the enemies of our country and yours, and to destroy or capture all who are in armed resistance. They bring you the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold. Hence, the first effect of this occupation will be the immediate release from your former political relations, and it is hoped a cheerful acceptance of the Government of the United States. The chief object of the American military forces will be to overthrow the armed authority of Spain and to give to the people of your beautiful island the largest measure of liberty consistent with this military occupation.

We have not come to make war upon the people of a country that for centuries has been oppressed, but, on the contrary, to bring you protection, not only to yourselves but to your property, to promote your prosperity, and bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government. It is not our purpose to interfere with any existing laws and customs that are wholesome and beneficial to your people so long as they conform to the rules of military administration of order and justice. This is not a war of devastation, but one to give to all within the control of its military and naval forces the advantages and blessings of enlightened civilization.

NELSON A. MILES,
Major-General, Commanding United States Army.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to say that the other day, when I interrupted the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLAYTON], who, it will be remembered, was under General Miles in Puerto Rico, and I asked him, "Were the people there glad to have your troops come?" he replied: "Oh, yes; the conservative and intelligent part of the population were glad to become Americans."

Mr. RICHARDSON. The solemn pledge of our Government made by this great soldier to these weak people was that we came to occupy and take possession of their island in the righteous cause of liberty, justice, and humanity; that we came bearing the banner of freedom, to bring them the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold; that the object of America was to give the people of that beautiful island the largest measure of liberty; that they were not to be oppressed, but given protection in their property; that their prosperity was to be promoted, and they were to have bestowed upon them the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government, and that they were to share with us the advantages and blessings of enlightened civilization.

The foregoing proclamation of General Miles was accepted as his invitation to the people there to unite their fortunes with our own. They accepted the invitation. Their acceptance was based on the word and honor of an American soldier. I am sure the great soldier would not violate any promise, expressed or implied, in that proclamation, and as the representative body of his country we should be reluctant to do so. A very intelligent witness, called to testify before a committee of this House on January 19, testified that the proclamation of General Miles was deemed an invitation extended to the people of Puerto Rico that they might be induced to become the allies of the United States and fight a common enemy.

The witness says in his testimony that the inhabitants of Puerto Rico fulfilled their part of the contract with General Miles, but, he adds, the United States has not carried out its part of the compact. He stated to the committee that the conditions in the island were no better now than under Spanish rule. Another witness, testifying before the same committee the same day, said:

Before the occupation of the United States, the conditions, although under a very bad form of government, were prosperous to a certain extent; but since the United States has had the occupation, I am sorry to say, we have gone backward; that two years ago we were certainly a great deal more prosperous than we are to-day. There is a great deal more poverty than there was two years ago, etc.

This witness is a resident of the island. General Davis has made a public declaration confirmatory of these statements.

If it be true, as these and other witnesses affirm, that the condition of the inhabitants of that island is worse now under our ownership than it was two years ago under Spain, there can be no question but that every effort we can constitutionally exert as a Congress should be put forth to ameliorate and improve their affairs. I am not here to ask for charity for the people of Puerto Rico, but is it not a sad thing to contemplate conditions there which are shown after two years of American freedom, liberty, humanity, and civilization, to be worse than they were under an effete old monarchy?

All of these things were known to the President. He has had his officers and commissioners in the island for nearly two years. They have submitted reports to him which have been laid by him before Congress. Delegations have come by authority of the residents of the island, some from boards of trade and other commercial organizations, and all of them agree in the story of the desolation and poverty of the island, and all unite in saying that the last condition there is worse than the first. The question presented to us is, What is Congress to do in consideration of the circumstances and surrounding conditions?

Shall we put a further burden on them by enacting the pending measure into law? The President and his Cabinet of advisers have had the benefit of all the information as to the conditions in the island. He has not only had the opportunity to read and digest the reports of the various agents sent there to investigate and report to him upon its affairs, but he has heard in person the statements and declarations of the numerous agents and representatives from that island to our country. He understands the conditions in the island, knows of the poverty prevailing there, and the difficulties and trade complications of those people.

These facts were all before him and no doubt constrained him, in pity for them, to make the recommendation to Congress which we find in his annual message sent us a little over sixty days ago. The Constitution imposes upon him a solemn duty "to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." In obedience to this injunction, the President, after long and serious deliberation and the amplest consideration of the condition of the people of Puerto Rico and their necessities, advised the Congress as to its duty to the island. Unless this House and the other branch of Congress intend to deliberately disregard the solemn advice of the President, made under his constitutional obligation, the pending bill can not pass. In his recent message, read to this House on the 5th day of December last, and enthusiastically applauded by its members, the President in his own felicitous style said:

It must be borne in mind that since the cession Puerto Rico has been denied the principal markets she had long enjoyed, and our tariffs have been continued against her products as when she was under Spanish sovereignty. The markets of Spain are closed to her products except upon terms to which the commerce of all nations is subjected. The island of Cuba, which used to buy her cattle and tobacco without customs duties, now imposes the same duties upon these products as from any other country entering her ports. She has therefore lost her free intercourse with Spain and Cuba without any compensating benefits in this market. Her coffee was little known and not in use by our people, and therefore there was no demand here for this, one of her chief products. The markets of the United States should be opened up to her products. Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

I know it is in the power or discretion of the House to pass measures directly contrary to the decisions of the Supreme Court and also in open disregard of the advice of the Chief Executive; nevertheless, I feel it my duty before such action is taken to bring to the minds and attention of members the decisions of the court and the advice of the President. I shall not assume that if gentlemen are reckless enough to disregard the former, they will the latter. We have been fully informed as to the painful condition of the people in Puerto Rico by the President, by the testimony of officers of the Government who have been there, who have submitted their reports to Congress, and by the evidence of numerous witnesses who have testified as to these conditions before several committees of this body.

The sum of all the testimony is that great want exists there, that the people are in poverty by reason of the action of our Government, and that relief must come quickly to be available. Why, then, should there be delay in enacting proper legislation? I would not go so far as to intimate, in view of what the President has told us, that if we utterly disregard his advice, such action on our part would by his act be defeated. But why take such risk? We have not been informed that there has been any change in the opinion so lately expressed by the President, or that he admits the unwisdom of the solemn advice so recently given us by him. It is well known that his opinions are not hastily formed, but that he acts upon the most mature consideration after the most careful thought and investigation.

Not only did the President give us the advice I have quoted, but it is also true that his opinion and advice were based upon the knowledge and information of his Cabinet advisers. The Secretary of War in his late annual report sustains the President in all he said in reference to this matter, as is shown by the following, which is taken from his report:

> The highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectation of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Puerto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States, and that we should treat the interest of this people as our own; and I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

Now I wish to speak of another matter, and I ask the attention of gentlemen on the other side. Then again, as late as the 19th of January, the distinguished gentleman, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who has just addressed the House in favor of the pending measure, presented to this House a bill in accordance with the recommendations of the President. That bill was directly in opposition to the one to which he has just addressed himself and which he has asked the House to adopt.

Mr. MADDOX. And which he declined to let us introduce as a substitute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course that gentleman has the right to change his opinion in the brief period since the 19th ultimo, and thereby admit that he was mistaken in asking the House to pass his bill; but I may be pardoned for questioning the right of that gentleman to ask his colleagues on this floor to go with him in his sudden change of mind. So rapid a change as this is indicative of fickleness on his part; and while I will not insist it reflects in any degree upon the gentleman's purity of purpose and integrity of action, I may be pardoned for saying that it is not calculated to enthusiastically inspire greater confidence in him as a wise and safe adviser of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The policy we are asked to pursue here will without doubt urther impoverish the island. It may serve to enrich some of the corporations and syndicates, and perhaps a few individuals, but I do not believe it will benefit our people as a whole. The great masses throughout the country believe in our free institutions, and above all things believe in that great fundamental doctrine, first enunciated by Mr. Jefferson, of equal and exact justice to all men of whatever state or persuasion and special privileges to none. They can not be brought while in the enjoyment of equal rights themselves, with equal chances in the race for life, to oppress the inhabitants of any territory belonging to the United States. The policy proposed is a robber policy, and will inevitably lead to a hatred of this country by the people of Puerto Rico as bitter and unrelenting as they ever could possibly have entertained toward the monarchy from which they have been wrested by us. In my humble judgment a most grave and serious mistake will be made if we enact this bill into law. The injury we will inflict on the island will be great, but this is nothing to be compared to the immeasurable wrong we do to the Constitution of our country.

Shall we not, then, do our plain duty? Let us vote down this most dangerous bill. I take pride in being able to say that in my opinion, when the roll is called on its passage, not a solitary Democratic vote in this Chamber will be recorded in its favor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] All will stand by the Union and the Constitution. We revere that instrument, because, while it is not perfect—for human perfection has never yet been attained—it is the best ever devised by the brain and intellect of man. It has been the hope and the stay of our people for more than a hundred years. They know that under it the poor man's child, if he have talent and genius and ambition, can reach the most exalted stations of earth.

The oppressed of all nations have sought protection under its powers and limitations. Its blessings have been showered like the gentle dews of heaven on all alike throughout the United States. Under its benignant rule heretofore the rich have been shielded in their palaces and fortune, the poor in their hovels and in their rags, the middle classes in their contentment and happy homes, and all have cheerfully and lovingly rendered obedience to its injunctions. It was not made for the last century, which gave it birth, nor for the present century now drawing to a close, which has seen conclusive evidences of its marvelous strength and protecting power, nor for the coming century, which, under Providence, I pray is to witness its grander triumphs, but for all centuries, for all the people, all the States, and all the Territories of the American Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We desire to live on under our great charter and bill of rights in the future, as we have in the past, a free and a united people, one in mind to render it cheerful obedience, one in sentiment to cherish it as the almost sum of human perfection, one in patriotism to die for, if need be, one in all that makes a republic great and its people free, happy, prosperous, and contented. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, by virtue of a treaty with Spain the islands constituting the Philippine Archipelago and the island of Puerto Rico became territory belonging to the United States. That treaty was made in the usual way, was ratified by the Senate, and is an accomplished fact. Whatever we may think as to its wisdom matters not now. Even if we were disposed to recede from its obligations, the time for so doing has long since gone by. The fact that stares us in the face is that by virtue of that treaty we have assumed certain responsibilities, certain relations with the inhabitants of those islands, certain relations with the nations of the world, and certain duties to ourselves from which there is no escape. Whatever may be our ultimate purpose, we can now do nothing but provide for these acquisitions in such way as shall best contribute to their welfare and our own.

Puerto Rico is a little island about 95 miles long and 45 miles wide, situated in the Caribbean Sea. It is the most densely populated piece of territory in the world. Only about 12 per cent of its population are capable of reading and writing. The people are such as you might expect to find after a domination of three or four hundred years by Spain. The Philippine Islands are distant from us in the neighborhood of 8,000 miles. They differ from Puerto Rico in extent of territory, in number and character of inhabitants, in civilization, in the products of their soil. They differ lagely in many respects from each other.

I read from the report of the Philippine Commission:

> The total number of inhabitants has been estimated at all the way from 6,000,000 to 12,000,000.
> * * * * * * *
> The inhabitants of the Philippines belong to three sharply distinct races—the Negrito race, the Indonesian race, and the Malayan race.
> It is universally conceded that the Negritos of to-day are the disappearing remnants of a people which once populated the entire archipelago. They are, physically, weaklings of low stature, with black skin, closely curling hair, flat noses, thick lips, and large, clumsy feet. In the matter of intelligence they stand at or near the bottom of the human series, and they are believed to be incapable of any considerable degree of civilization or advancement.
> Centuries ago they were driven from the coast regions into the wilder interior portions of the islands by Malay invaders, and from that day to this they have steadily lost ground in the struggle for existence until but a few scattered and numerically insignificant groups of them remain. As a rule, they are to be met with only on the forest-clad sides of the higher mountains of Luzon, Panay, Negros, and Mindanao, although in the northeastern part of Luzon they are said to still inhabit the wooded lowlands near the coast. They lead a nomadic life, wandering almost naked through the forests and living on fruits, tubers, and such game as they can bring down with their bows and poisoned arrows. It is believed that not more than 25,000 of them exist in the entire archipelago, and the race seems doomed to early extinction.
> Within a comparatively short time it has completely disappeared from several of the islands which it formerly inhabited, and it is said that the birth rate is now considerably below the death rate.
> So far as is at present known, the Philippine tribes belonging to the Indonesian race are confined to the great island of Mindanao, the surface of which constitutes about one-third of the total land area of the archipelago. It is possible that a more careful study of the wild peoples of North Luzon will show that here also there exist Indonesian tribes, or tribes showing evidences of Indonesian origin; but this is a question which remains to be determined.
> The Philippine representatives of this race are physically superior not only to the Negritos, but to the more numerous Malayan peoples as well. They are tall and well developed, with high foreheads, aquiline noses, wavy hair, and often with abundant beards. The color of their skins is quite light. Many of them are very clever and intelligent. None of the tribes have been Christianized. Some of them have grown extremely fierce and warlike as a result of their long struggle with hostile Malayan peoples. Others, more happy in their surroundings, are pacific and industrious.
> The great majority of the inhabitants of the Philippines are of Malayan extraction, although the race is not found pure in any of the islands, but is everywhere more or less modified through intermarriage with Chinese, Indonesians, Negritos, Arabs, and, to a limited extent, Spaniards and other Europeans.
> The individuals belonging to these Malayan tribes are of medium size, with straight black hair. As a rule, the men are beardless, and when they have a beard it is usually straggling and appears late in life. The skin is brown and distinctly darker than that of the Indonesians, although very much lighter than that of the Negritos. The nose is short and frequently considerably flattened.
> The representatives of these three races are divided into numerous tribes, which often differ very greatly in language, manners, customs, and laws, as well as in degree of civilization. In numerical importance they range from the Visayans, numbering more than 2,000,000, to the Calanganes, of whom but a bare 300 remain. The greater part of the tribes are wild and pagan, but the civilized and christianized peoples, although few in number, include the majority of the inhabitants.
> That the Filipinos do not constitute "a nation" or "a people" will appear from the perusal of the following table, which gives the names of the various tribes so far as known, the regions which they respectively inhabit, and, where practicable, an estimate of the number of individuals composing each

Then follows a statement showing that there are 84 different tribes, differing in language, differing in customs, and differing in civilization.

Now, then, these people beyond all recall have fallen to our care. We are to give them peace and order, education, civilization, and possibly independence; but the immediate necessity of the hour is that we govern them. It there is anything in the world clear it is that these eighty-four tribes require different modes of government, different kinds of laws, different treatment adapted to their respective needs. And yet, attempting now for the first time to legislate for one of our new possessions, we are met with the proposition that all of our new possessions, must be governed by one fixed, unvarying system, and that the system which applies to ourselves, the freest and most intelligent people on the face of the earth.

An amazing proposition, involving free trade with the Philippines, the extension to them of our navigation laws, and the incorporation into the body politic of from six to twelve millions of semisavages. How do you like the problem? Do you believe that you can carry civilization and ultimately independence to those people if your hands are tied by the limitations of the Constitution of the United States?

But are our hands so tied? By no means. My proposition is that the government of territory belonging to the United States is not subject to the limitations of the Constitution, but that Congress has power, absolute power, to govern, keeping only in mind those fundamental principles which, though they may be written in the Constitution, are not binding on us in this regard because they are so written, but because they are a part of our system of government.

Now, under the treaty the political status of the inhabitants of those islands is to be fixed by the Congress of the United States. Under a provision in the Constitution Congress has power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting territory belonging to the United States. It would seem, therefore, that the power to pass this bill providing for customs duties in Puerto Rico and in the United States is unquestionably in Congress. But it is said that there exists a limitation upon that power; that the limitation arises out of that provision of the Constitution which says that—

> All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Does the term "United States" include Puerto Rico as the framers of that instrument intended when they used that language? The first place that we ought to go for an answer to that question is to the Constitution itself. We ought to be able to ascertain from the language used what was the intention of the framers of that great instrument at the time when it was made. The term "United States" is used to express several different things. The United States, for instance, means the forty-five States that collectively constitute the Federal Union. "The United States" is used as a term of geographical description, just as we use "the British Empire" to cover all Great Britain's possessions.

But "the United States" is used in a political sense in the Constitution to indicate that corporation which is the result of the union of the original thirteen States, and it seems to me that a study of the language of the Constitution can not but lead any impartial seeker after the truth to come to the conclusion that the words "United States" as used therein have reference only, excepting where otherwise pointed out, to the thirteen original States and to those that under provision made should subsequently become a part of the Union.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. DALZELL. Without wishing to be uncivil, I ask as a favor that I be not interrupted.

Certainly no one would say from reading the preamble to the Constitution that anything but the thirteen States were referred to therein. "We, the people of the United States" could only mean the people of States that adopted the instrument. The people of the United States in framing that Constitution were engaged in setting up a working government, consisting of three separate departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Take the articles in the Constitution that relate to these three separate departments of the Government, and you must come to the conclusion that "the United States" means only those who participated in the making of that Constitution.

The legislative department is to consist of Representatives and Senators chosen by the States. The executive is the Executive of the United States, chosen by the electors of the States. The judiciary is the judiciary of the United States, and its powers, its jurisdiction, as has been held many times, as I shall show you, have uniformly been confined to the United States. The power of amendment is in the United States. The limitations upon the power of Congress are those imposed by the States; the sovereignty granted the United States is a sovereignty granted by the States. So that all through that instrument, except, as I say, where it is expressly stated to the contrary, it seems apparent that the only territory that was in the view of the framers of the Constitution at the time they made the Constitution was the thirteen original States.

Now, then, where it was intended that the Constitution should have extra State jurisdiction, that fact is made clearly to appear. Article IV, section 3, clause 1, provides that new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union. Article IV, section 3, clause 2, provides that Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories and other property belonging to the United States. And the thirteenth amendment provides that slavery shall not exist within the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction. It seems to me that the inclusion of that term in the thirteenth amendment is significant. It is the only place in the Constitution where the jurisdiction of the United States is expressly provided for outside of the States. It was to get rid of slavery for all time to come and beyond all possibility of mishap that the clause was inserted. The same men that wrote these words into the thirteenth amendment drew the succeeding amendments, and made no reference at all to any extra State jurisdiction. That, therefore, is an argument to my mind in favor of the proposition that the States only are meant, unless something to the contrary be expressly stated.

The phrase "throughout the United States," which occurs in this paragraph relating to taxation, appears three times in the Constitution. In Article II, section 1, paragraph 2, it is provided that the day on which electors shall be voted for shall be the same throughout the United States. That, of course, could have no reference to any other territory than the United States, it being applicable only to electors. We have, therefore, in that instance, ascertained the meaning of the term "throughout the United States," and it is a fundamental rule of construction that having once ascertained the real meaning of a term in an instrument, that same meaning must accompany the term throughout, unless there be express reasons to the contrary.

In Article I, section 8, paragraph 4, it is provided that bankrupt laws shall be uniform throughout the United States. The first bankruptcy law was confined in terms to the United States. The subsequent bankruptcy laws were extended to the Territories by express provision thought to be necessary for that purpose.

Article I, section 8, provides that duties shall be uniform throughout the United States. That is the clause now under consideration. In the same sentence, paragraph 3, Congress is given power to regulate commerce—commerce of the United States and among the several States. This means, of course, the several States of the United States. It can hardly be assumed that the several States did not mean the United States. In point of fact, some of our earliest revenue laws were confined in terms to the United States.

It seems to me, therefore, that if we were confined to the Constitution itself for the meaning of this term "United States," we must necessarily come to the conclusion that what was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution was the original thirteen States and as many others as might be added under the terms of that instrument. If under the term "United States" all the territory under the jurisdiction of the United States was included, it was a useless performance to put into the Constitution an express provision that Congress should "have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States."

Now, on the other side, as against this proposition, there is cited the case of Loughborough vs. Blake, decided in 1828 by Chief Justice Marshall, in which he answers the question "What does the United States mean?" by saying that it means all the territory of the great Republic—the District of Columbia, the Territories beyond the Missouri, and so on. It seems to me perfectly patent that what Chief Justice Marshall said upon that subject was a mere dictum and had no connection at all with the question involved in the case. In 1815 Congress passed a law levying a direct tax and apportioned it among the States, and in that law it named the particular States and apportioned the amounts respectively to those States. Subsequent to the passage of that act Congress passed another act and levied a direct tax upon the District of Columbia. One of the citizens of the District having refused to pay this tax, his property was levied upon, and in an action of trespass the question of constitutional power was raised. In delivering a decision the Chief Justice said:

> This case presents to the consideration of the court a single question. It is this: Has Congress a right to impose a direct tax on the District of Columbia?
> This question he answered in the affirmative.

Well, of course Congress had a right to impose a direct tax upon the District of Columbia, because under the Constitution Congress is given exclusive control over that District. No necessity arose for the court to define the term "United States." It does not, therefore, necessarily follow that in the disposition of that case anything was involved like the proposition that the United States covered both the United States and Territories, nor did the case decide any such thing. In effect it decided the exact opposite, because it decided that a tax which was uniform throughout the United States, but was not applied to the Territories at all, was a constitutional tax.

So that the case, as it seems to me, is an authority against those gentlemen on the other side who cite it in support of their proposition. And when the framers of the Constitution provided in that instrument that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," I put to you the question, by virtue of what authority do you write into the Constitution that which they left out, and say "shall be uniform throughout the United States and Territories?" But there are cases directly in point, some of them decided by this same Chief Justice. It is said that if this is a dictum it is the dictum of the great Chief Justice. And so, I grant you, it is. But when I place against the dictum of the great Chief Justice the decision of the great Chief Justice upon the very point at issue, I think I am justified in asking you to set aside the dictum and to follow the decision.

In a case in which the District of Columbia was again involved, reported in 2 Cranch—the case of Hepburn vs. Ellzey—the question arose as to whether or not a citizen of the District of Columbia was a citizen of the United States within the meaning of the term "United States" in the Constitution and therefore entitled to sue in the Federal courts. And now I read what Chief Justice Marshall said:

The question in this case is whether the plaintiffs, as residents of the District of Columbia, can maintain an action in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Virginia. This depends on the act of Congress describing the jurisdiction of that court. That act gives jurisdiction to the circuit courts in cases between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State. To support the jurisdiction in this case, therefore, it must appear that Columbia is a State.

On the part of the plaintiffs it has been urged that Columbia is a distinct political society and is, therefore, "a State" according to the definition of writers on general law. This is true. But as the act of Congress obviously uses the word "State" in reference to that term as used in the Constitution, it becomes necessary to inquire whether Columbia is a State in the sense of that instrument. The result of that examination is a conviction that the members of the American Confederacy only are the States contemplated in the Constitution.

The House of Representatives is to be composed of members chosen by the people of the several States; and each State shall have at least one Representative. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State. Each State shall appoint, for the election of the Executive, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives. These clauses show that the word "State" is used in the Constitution as designating a member of the Union, and excludes from the terms the signification attached to it by writers on the law of nations. When the same term which has been used plainly in this limited sense in the articles respecting the legislative and executive departments is also employed in that which respects the judicial department, it must be understood as retaining the sense originally given to it.

Upon the same line of argument that I suggested a few moments ago Chief Justice Marshall comes to the conclusion that when the framers of the Constitution said "United States," they did not mean "United States and Territories."

The same question substantially arose in the case of a Territory—the case of New Orleans vs. Winter, in 1 Wheaton. In this case the court said:

It has been attempted to distinguish a Territory from the District of Columbia, but the court is of opinion that this distinction can not be maintained. They may differ in many respects, but neither of them is a State in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution. Every reason assigned for the opinion of the court that a citizen of Columbia was not capable of suing in the courts of the United States under the judiciary act is equally applicable to a citizen of a Territory.

Again, in the case of Barney vs. Baltimore, reported in 6 Wallace, and decided as late as 1867, the court said with respect to the rulings in these two cases that I have read in your hearing:

These rulings have never been disturbed, but the principle asserted has been acted upon ever since by the courts when the point has arisen.

And in the case of Texas vs. White, reported in 7 Wallace, where the question involved was as to the status of the State of Texas by reason of her having joined the rebellious States, the court undertake to define the word "States" as used in the Constitution, and they say:

A State, in the ordinary sense of the Constitution, is a political community of free citizens occupying a territory of defined boundaries and organized under a government sanctioned and limited by a written constitution and established by the consent of the governed. It is the union of such States under a common constitution which forms the distinct and greater political unit which that constitution designates as the United States. It speaks of the people and States which compose it as "one people and one country." The use of the word in this sense hardly requires further remark. In the clauses which impose prohibitions upon the States with respect to the making of treaties, emitting of bills of credit, and laying duties on tonnage, and which guarantee to the States representation in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, are found similar instances of this use in the Constitution. Others will occur to every mind.

I say, then, that not only from the four corners of the Constitution itself, but from the decisions of the highest court of the land, we are led to believe that the term "United States" in the Constitution does not extend to and cover the Territories.

I ask, now, what was the judgment of the men who made the Constitution and of the men who were cotemporaries of the men who made the Constitution with respect to the power under the Constitution to legislate for Territories? And I say that both Federalists and Republicans agreed in the proposition that the Constitution related only to the States. Let me read you some of the opinions on this subject.

This discussion arose out of the proposition to acquire and out of the subsequent acquisition of the Territory of Louisiana.

Mr. Pickering, of Massachusetts, declared in the Senate that it was not in the power of the President or of Congress to incorporate the Territory into the Union, as the treaty demanded. He did not believe even that an amendment could be made to the Constitution so as to authorize it in the ordinary way, but only by the assent of each individual State, as in a commercial house the consent of each member would be necessary to admit a new partner into the company.

John Quincy Adams agreed with him, but had a remedy to propose. He said:

This is what your ministers, in the very case before you, have confessedly done. It is well known that their powers did not authorize them to conclude this treaty; but they acted for the benefit of their country, and this House, by a large majority, has advised to the ratification of their proceedings. Suppose, then, not only that the ministers who signed, but the President and Senate who ratified this contract, have exceeded their powers. Suppose that the other House of Congress, who have given their assent by passing this and other bills for the fulfillment of the obligations it imposes on us, have exceeded their powers.

Nay, suppose even that the majority of States competent to amend the Constitution in other cases could not amend it in this without exceeding their powers—and this is the extremest point to which any gentleman on this floor has extended his scruples—suppose all this, and there still remains in the country a power competent to adopt and sanction every part of our engagements and carry them entirely into execution. For notwithstanding the objections and apprehensions of many individuals, of many wise, able, and excellent men in various parts of the Union, yet such is the public favor attending the transaction which commenced by the negotiations of this treaty, and which, I hope, will terminate in our full, undisturbed and undisputed possession of the ceded territory, that I firmly believe if an amendment to the Constitution, amply sufficient for the accomplishment of everything for which we have contracted, shall be proposed, as I think it ought, it will be adopted by the legislature of every State in the Union. We can therefore fulfill our part of the conventions, and this is all that France has a right to require of us.

And Thomas Jefferson said:

This treaty must, of course, be laid before both Houses, because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably never be in their power. But I suppose they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution, approving and confirming the act which the nation had not previously authorized. The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution.

The Legislature, in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties, and risking themselves, like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing unauthorized what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it. It is the case of a guardian investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory and saying to him when of age: "I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you; you may disavow me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can: I thought it my duty to risk myself for you." But we shall not be disavowed by the nation, and their act of indemnity will confirm and not weaken the Constitution by more strongly marking out its lines.

And when in the debate it was said that the powers conferred on the President were unconstitutional, the reply was made by the President's advisors that the Constitution was made for States, not for Territories.

Mr. Rodney, of Delaware, said:

It shows that Congress have a power in the Territories that they can not exercise in the States, and that the limitations of power in the Constitution are applicable to States and not to Territories.

And John Randolph, a Republican of Republicans, said:

Gentlemen will see the necessity of the United States taking possession of this country in the capacity of sovereigns to the same extent as that of the existing government of the provinces.

Now, no constitutional amendment was made, not because Mr. Jefferson, as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] said, came to the conclusion that none was necessary, but because it was held by statesmen, as it was subsequently held by the court, that the United States was a sovereign nation, having and entitled to exercise all the powers of any sovereign nation, the right to make war and peace, the right to acquire territory, and as a necessary consequence of that right, the right to govern it without limitation, save that in the discretion of the Congress, its agents in the government.

On the 13th of January, 1803, Mr. Gallatin wrote to Mr. Jefferson, saying with respect to the acquisition of Louisiana:

But does any constitutional objection really exist? To me it would appear, first, that the United States as a nation have an inherent right to acquire territory; second, that whenever that acquisition is by treaty, the same constituted authorities in whom the treaty-making power is vested have the constitutional right to sanction the acquisition.

But we have more than the opinions of the men who were contemporary with the making of this Constitution. We have their express acts, in the shape of legislation, declaratory of what they thought as to the limitations that existed in the ruling of territory acquired under the treaty-making or the war power of the Constitution. What limitations did Mr. Jefferson and his Congress feel binding upon them when they set up a government in Louisiana?

Will anyone contend that Louisiana was governed under a republican form of government and subject to the limitations of the Constitution? Why, Congress turned over to the President the dictatorial power to appoint officers, civil and military, and to delegate to them the government of Louisiana. And Mr. Jefferson appointed one man as governor-general and intendant, two offices that had been filled under Spanish rule by different men. And this man had the power to make laws. He had the power to dispose of the finances. He had the power to review the decisions of the courts. There was no such thing as jury trial in Louisiana. There was an ecclesiastical establishment in Louisiana, and priests and curates were paid out of the Louisiana treasury.

There were the old mediæval laws, long since gone out of use amongst civilized peoples, such as cutting out a man's tongue for the offense of blasphemy, and all that sort of thing.

[Here Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi rose.]

I suppose my friend was going to say that that was merely the temporary government of Louisiana, and so it was; but what was the permanent government of Louisiana as a Territory? It was better in this respect, that despotic power was not placed in the hands of one man in Louisiana; but it was no better in this, that despotic power still remained in the hands of one man who occupied the Executive chair as President of the United States.

Let me read you what the historian Adams says with respect to this government, set up by the gentlemen who were contemporaries with the framers of the Constitution:

> It created a Territorial form of government in which the people of Louisiana were to have no share. The governor and secretary were to be appointed by the President for four years. The legislative council, constituted of thirteen members, was to be appointed by the President without consulting the Senate, and was to be convened and prorogued by the governor as he might think proper. The judicial officers, also appointed by the President, were to hold office for four years instead of the usual term of good behavior. * * * The bill—

Said the historian—

> seemed to set the new Territory apart as a peculiar estate, to be governed by the power employed in the right to acquire it.
> With the passage of this act and its twin statute for collecting duties in the ceded territory the precedent was complete. Louisiana received a government in which its people, who had been solemnly promised all the rights of American citizens, were set apart, not as citizens, but as subjects lower in the political scale than the meanest tribes of Indians, whose right to self-government was never questioned. By these measures the Executive and the Legislature recorded their decision in regard to the powers of government over national territory.

Was there ever a plainer declaration made under the solemn responsibilities of official duty that the limitations of the Constitution do not apply to the government of Territories than was made by the President and Congress in dealing with Louisiana?

Now, Louisiana came into the Union under the terms of a treaty with France known as the Louisiana treaty, of April 30, 1803, which provided:

> The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

The inhabitants of Louisiana protested that this treaty obligation was not being observed; that they were not recognized as citizens of the United States; and they presented a memorial to Congress, and in that memorial and in the answer that Congress gave we may find another illustration of the opinion of the fathers as to whether or not the limitations of the Constitution apply to Territories. These gentlemen said:

> A governor is to be placed over us whom we have not chosen, whom we do not even know, who may be ignorant of our language, uninformed of our institutions, and who may have no connections with our country or interest in its welfare.
> This governor is vested with all executive and almost unlimited legislative power; for the law declares that, "by and with the advice and consent of the legislative body, he may change, modify, and repeal the laws," etc. But this advice and consent will no doubt in all cases be easily procured from the majority of a council selected by the president or governor and dependent on him for their appointment and continuance in office; or if they should prove refractory, the power of prorogation frees him from any troublesome interference until a more prudent selection at the end of the year shall give him a council better suited to his views. The true legislative power, then, is vested in the governor alone. The council operates as a cloak to conceal the extent of his authority, to screen him from the odium of all unpopular acts, to avoid all responsibility, and give us the faint semblance of a representative assembly, with so few of its distinguishing features that unless the name were inscribed on the picture it would be difficult to discover the object for which it was intended.

Now, how did Congress answer this protest of these people in Louisiana? Mr. John Randolph, from the committee appointed by the House to take into consideration the memorial, reported on January 25, 1805. I read only a short extract:

> They shall be incorporated into the Union and admitted—to what? To the enjoyment of all the rights, etc., of American citizens. When? As soon as it can be done in conformity with the principles of the Federal Constitution; meanwhile they are to be protected, etc.
> Could any doubt be excited of the soundness of this construction of the English context it would be instantly dissipated by a recurrence to its counterpart in the French language, if the manifest absurdity of the concluding words of the article, which would result from an opposite interpretation, should fail to remove it. For what necessity could exist for a provision securing to the inhabitants of Louisiana the temporary enjoyment of certain minor privileges, when their immediate admission to all the rights of American citizens was one of the conditions on which their country was transferred to the United States by France?
> Whether the words "as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution," be understood to refer to any change, which, in conformity with its own principles, might at some future period be made in that instrument, or to that provision of the Constitution which requires the rule of naturalization to be uniform, they are equally fatal to the claim urged by the memorialists of their right to an immediate participation of those benefits which they can not possess in their full extent, until admitted to their enjoyment by the principles of the Constitution. The imputation, therefore, of a want of good faith in the Government of the United States is not more unsupported by the language of the third article of the treaty of Paris than it is repugnant to the uniform tenor of the American character, from the commencement of the national existence.

So that to the complaint that those people occupying a Territory belonging to the United States had made, that they had no rights under the Constitution, Mr. Randolph made answer in the House of Representatives, telling them that it was true that they had no rights until the time should come when Congress should see fit to admit them into the Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I fear that I am spending too much time upon this particular branch of the case, but it seems to me that the history of the Louisiana purchase, the legislation, and the opinions of our statesmen with respect thereto, all furnish cogent arguments in favor of the proposition that the term "United States" in the Constitution does not carry the limitations of that instrument to the government of Territories.

Up to this time we have seen what construction the executive and legislative branches of the Government have put upon the Constitution in its relation to Territories.

I now advance a step further and say that the courts have adopted and indorsed that construction. In the case of Sere vs. Petot, reported in 6 Cranch, the court said:

> The power of governing and legislating for a Territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and hold territory. Could this position be contested, the Constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States."
> Accordingly, we find Congress possessing and exercising the absolute and undisputed power of governing and legislating for the Territory of New Orleans. Congress has given them a legislature, an executive, and a judiciary, with such powers as it has been their will to assign to these departments, respectively.

I shall show as my argument proceeds that this is the uniform doctrine of the courts upon this subject.

Now, we have had various acquisitions since that of Louisiana. Each and all of them have come to us by treaty, and in each and every case, except in that of Alaska, it was thought necessary to limit the unlimited power of the Congress to deal with these Territories belonging to the United States by treaty provision which should secure for them the right of ultimate admission to the United States, and in the meantime protection to their inhabitants in their life, liberty, property, and religion. All the legislation and all the cases decided by the courts with respect to these Territories are to be read in the light of those treaty provisions.

In the treaty with Spain known as the Florida purchase, in 1821, it was provided that—

> The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution and admitted to the enjoyment of the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

In the treaty with Mexico concluded in 1848 a substantially similar provision occurs.

And in the treaty with Mexico concluded in 1854, known as the Gadsden treaty, there was a substantially similar provision.

In the treaty with Russia, concluded in 1867, there was no provision for the incorporation of the Territory of Alaska into the Union, but there was a provision that the inhabitants, with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, should have the immunities of citizens of the United States and should be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

As these treaties were under the Constitution the supreme law of the land, it will be observed that the unlimited power of Congress to deal with the territory ceded was expressly limited to the extent provided for by the treaties.

Had it not been for these treaty provisions the power of Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations—needful in its judgment, mark you—with respect to the territory belonging to the United States would have vested an unlimited power in the Congress.

In the case of the acquisition of the Philippines and of Puerto Rico by the terms of the treaty the political status of the native inhabitants of the islands is to be determined by Congress; and its power therefore with respect to them, whether that power be the result of our power to acquire or of the constitutional power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations, is unlimited.

As a matter of legislative history these acquisitions have always been governed by acts of Congress, made applicable to each in its turn, and they have been governed by such laws as Congress saw fit to prescribe, based upon the requirements of each individual case.

With respect to all of them the principle recognized in the case of Louisiana has been affirmed, namely, the principle that Territorial laws are dependent entirely upon Congressional action.

If the provisions relating to any department created by the Constitution are inapplicable beyond the States, then the provisions of all its departments must be inapplicable beyond the States. It seems to me that this must be admitted. There is no distinction drawn in the Constitution between the jurisdiction of the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments.

Article III, section 1, of the Constitution reads:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

It is then further provided that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases of maritime and admiralty jurisdiction.

Mr. Webster said that the legislature and judiciary of the Territories have always been established by a law of Congress, and the decisions of the Supreme Court from the earliest down bear him out in the assertion. The first case to which I call your attention is the case of Benner against Porter reported in 9 Howard, page 242. It is there said:

> The distinction between the Federal and State jurisdictions, under the Constitution of the United States has no foundation in these Territorial governments, and consequently no such distinction exists, either in respect to the jurisdiction of their courts or the subjects submitted to their cognizance. They are legislative governments and their courts legislative courts, Congress, in the exercise of its powers in the organization and government of Territories, combining the powers of both the Federal and State authorities. There is but one system of government or of laws operating within their limits, as neither is subject to the constitutional provisions in respect to State and Federal jurisdiction.
> They are not organized under the Constitution, nor subject to the complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are creations, exclusively, of the legislative department and subject to its supervision and control.

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DALZELL. All right, although I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. TERRY. I want to ask the gentleman if, under the logic of his contention, Congress could have instituted free trade with Arizona and high-protection tariff with New Mexico.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. I only wanted to know where the gentleman's logic went.

Mr. DALZELL. I am not afraid of my logic. I say it could.

Now, in the case of Canter, Chief Justice Marshall said, upon this same subject, speaking of the courts of Florida:

> These courts, then, are not constitutional courts in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the General Government can be deposited. They are incapable of receiving it. They are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the Government, or in virtue of that clause which enables Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States.
> The jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of that judicial power which is defined in the third article of the Constitution, but is conferred by Congress in the execution of those general powers which that body possesses over the Territories of the United States. Although admiralty jurisdiction can be exercised in the States in those courts only which are established in pursuance of the third article of the Constitution, the same limitation does not extend to the Territories. In legislating for them Congress exercises the combined powers of the General and of the State governments.

The same doctrine is affirmed in Clinton vs. Engelbrecht (13 Wallace, 434). The court said:

> There is no supreme court of the United States, nor is there any district court of the United States in the sense of the Constitution, in the Territory of Utah. The judges are not appointed for the same terms, nor is the jurisdiction which they exercise part of the judicial power conferred by the Constitution of the General Government. The courts are the legislative courts of the Territories, created in virtue of that clause which authorizes Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories belonging to the United States.

In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 145) it was held that the laws relating to the number of grand jurors requisite depended upon the rule, not of the United States, but of the Territorial court.

In The City of Panama (101 U. S., 453) the courts of Washington Territory were held clothed by an act of Congress with admiralty jurisdiction.

In McAllister vs. United States (141 U. S., 174) it was held that the judge of the district court of Alaska was not a judge contemplated by the Constitution, and was subject to removal by the President.

And so I might multiply cases, but I refrain. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that so far as the judicial decisions go, there are at least two departments created by the Constitution where there are no limitations upon the power of Congress with respect to Territories—the legislative and the judicial.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have time to complete his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DALZELL. But it is contended, Mr. Chairman, that immediately upon the acquisition of territory by the United States the Constitution ex proprio vigore is extended to that territory. That, Mr. Chairman, was the ground assumed in the argument of that great case which really, by its decision, covers all these questions and which has been affirmed over and over again—the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter.

It was contended in that case by the counsel for the appellant before the court, first, that the people in the Territories of the United States are citizens entitled to all the benefits derived from the laws and the Constitution of the United States and subject to all the provisions of the Constitution and the laws passed under it; second, that in principle there can be no difference between a Territory formed out of a country within the old limits of the United States and a Territory in a newly-acquired country, and, third, that therefore the people of Florida, immediately upon its cession, or at any rate upon the passing of the act instituting the Territorial government, became citizens of the United States, to whom the laws and Constitution extended.

On the other hand, Mr. Whipple, who was with Mr. Webster for claimant, said:

> Much argument has been used to show that the Constitution and laws of the United States are, per se, in force in Florida, and that the inhabitants are citizens of the United States.
> How the Constitution became of force in Florida has not been shown. Was it by the act of cession? Is there any principle in the law of nations which upon the act of cession or conquest gives to the ceded or conquered country a right to participate in the privileges of the constitution of the parent country? The usages of nations, from the period of Grecian colonization to the present moment, are precisely the reverse. Such a right never was asserted.
> The Constitution was established by the people of the United States for the United States. It provides for the future admission of countries into the Union, and expressly confers upon Congress the power of governing them as Territories until they are admitted as States.
> If the Constitution was in force in Florida, why was it not represented in Congress? Why was it necessary to pass an act of Congress entending several of the laws of the United States to Florida? Why did Congress designate particular laws, such as the crimes act, the slave trade and revenue acts, and introduce them as laws into Florida? Why enumerate particular rights secured to the people of the Unites Stated if the inhabitants of Florida were entitled to them on the act of cession?

Arguing upon the same side, Mr. Webster, in his argument, said:

> What is Florida? It is no part of the United States. How can it be? How is it represented? Do the laws of the United States reach Florida? Not unless by particular provisions. The Territory and all within it are to be governed by the acquiring power, except where there are reservations by treaty. By the law of England, when possession is taken of territories, the King, jure coronæ, has the power of legislation until Parliament shall interfere.
> Congress has the jus coronæ in this case, and Florida was to be governed by Congress as she thought proper. What has Congress done? She might have done anything; she might have refused the right of trial by jury and refused a legislature. She has given a legislature to be exercised at her will; and a government of a mixed nature, in which she has endeavored to distinguish between State and United States jurisdiction, anticipating the future erection of the Territory into a State. Does the law establishing the court at Key West come within the restrictions of the Constitution of the United States? If the Constitution does not extend over this Territory, the law can not be inconsistent with the national Constitution.

Now, what did Chief Justice Marshall say in deciding the case? He said, first and foremost:

> The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty.

And then, addressing himself to the doctrine that the Constitution is extended to ceded territory ex proprio vigore, and speaking of the inhabitants of Florida, he said:

> They do not participate in political power; they do not share in government until Florida shall become a State. In the meantime Florida continues to be a Territory of the United States, governed by virtue of that clause in the Constitution which empowers Congress "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."
> Perhaps the power of governing territory belonging to the United States which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the means of self-government may result necessarily from the fact that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States. The right to govern may be the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned.

Now, let me say in this connection that when my friend from Tennessee, referring to Mr. Webster's argument in the Canter case, said that Mr. Webster had never as a public man affirmed the unlimited power of Congress, and that no particular regard was to be placed upon his argument as a lawyer, he was mistaken. I will show the gentleman later on that in the closing years of Mr. Webster's life, as a United States Senator, he affirmed, in one of the greatest speeches of his life, the same doctrine that as counsel he so ably argued before Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter.

But I come now, Mr. Chairman, to a speech made by Mr. Webster upon this question as to the extension of the Constitution by its own power over ceded territory, an argument made by him in the great discussion that preceded the admission of California and

New Mexico into the Union. This speech will be found in the Congressional Globe, volume 20, page 273. Mr. Webster said:

It is of importance that we should get some conception of what is meant by the proposition in a law "to extend the Constitution of the United States to the Territories." Why, sir, the thing is entirely impossible. All the legislation in the world in this general form could not accomplish it. There is no cause for the operation of the legislative power in such a manner as that. The Constitution, what is it? We extend the Constitution of the United States to territory! What is the Constitution of the United States? Is not its very first principle that all within its influence and comprehension shall be represented in the Legislature which it establishes, with not only a right of debate and a right to vote in both Houses of Congress, but a right to partake in the choice of a President and Vice-President? And can we by law extend these rights or any of them to a Territory of the United States? Everybody will see that it is altogether impracticable. * * * Let me say that in this general sense there is no such thing as extending the Constitution. The Constitution is extended over the United States, and over nothing else. It can not be extended over anything except over the old States and the new States that shall come in hereafter, when they do come in. There is a want of accuracy of ideas in this respect that is quite remarkable among eminent gentlemen, and especially professional and judicial gentlemen. It seems to be taken for granted that the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, and every principle designed to protect personal liberty are extended by force of the Constitution itself over every new Territory. The proposition can not be maintained at all. * * * Undoubtedly these rights must be conferred by law before they can be enjoyed in a Territory.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], my colleague on the committee, quotes from Mr. Webster, and the gentleman from Tennessee quoted from him again the same passage, about the powers of monarchies ruling distant colonies, and all that sort of thing. Why, Mr. Webster said that in a speech when he was questioning the right to continue the war against Mexico and when he denied that we could admit new territories into our Union without imperiling it. But when he came to discuss this subject—when he came to talk about the power of Congress in the Territories, in a speech made two years after that quoted, he made use of this language, and I call the attention of my from Tennessee to it:

As to the power of Congress, I have nothing to add to what I said the other day. Congress has full power over the subject. It may establish any such government and any such laws in the Territories as, in its discretion, it may see fit. It is subject, of course, to the rules of justice and propriety, but it is under no constitutional restraint.

[Applause.]

The same principle that as counsel he advocated in his early manhood he advocated in a still more emphatic and unqualified form in his maturer years, peerless statesman of the Republic as he was at that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will not the gentleman allow me a single suggestion?

Mr. DALZELL. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I shall have difficulty, at any rate, in getting through with my remarks within the time to which I must confine myself.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will not the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that the extract read by him from the language of Daniel Webster was a part of an argument made by Mr. Webster as an attorney?

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is mistaken. I read from a speech that Mr. Webster made in the Senate.

A MEMBER. In what year?

Mr. DALZELL. In 1848, I think. A gentleman near me says in 1849.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that this doctrine of the extension of the Constitution by its own strength was advanced by Mr. Calhoun in the interest of slavery.

Mr. Calhoun first announced the doctrine that Congress had no power to prohibit slavery in the territory; but when free-soil New Mexico and California were acquired, it became necessary for him to take a step in advance, and he therefore announced the new dogma that the Constitution ex proprio vigore extended to the newly acquired territory and that, slaves being property under the Constitution, slavery could exist in that new territory. Let me quote from Mr. Benton (Thirty Years in the United States Senate, volume 2, page 713):

A new dogma was invented to fit the case—that of the transmigration of the Constitution (the slavery part of it) into the Territories—overriding and overruling all the anti-slavery laws which it found there, and planting the institution there under its own wing, and [maintaining it beyond the power of eradication either by Congress or the people of the Territory. Before this dogma was proclaimed efforts were made to get the Constitution extended to these Territories by act of Congress; failing in those attempts, the difficulty was leaped over by boldly assuming that the Constitution went of itself—that is to say, the slavery part of it. * * *

History can not class higher than as a vagary of a diseased imagination this imputed self-acting and self-extension of the Constitution. The Constitution does nothing of itself—not even in the States for which it was made. Every part of it requires a law to put it into operation. No part of it can reach a Territory unless imparted to it by act of Congress.

This vagary of a diseased imagination, this transmigratory power of the Constitution, has received the reprobation of some of the most distinguished statesmen in our history. I will not detain the committee by quoting from any but a few.

Henry Clay said in a speech in the Senate, on February 5, 1850, that—

The public law of the world, of reason, and of justice is that Congress has the right to legislate for the Territories from the very moment they are acquired by conquest or treaty; and this point has been settled by all the elementary authorities and by the uniform interpretation and action of every department of our Government.

Horace Mann, of Massachusetts, said in Congress in 1850:

The argument that by the cession of new Territories the Constitution, by some magical elasticity, extends itself over them does not rise to the dignity of a sophism. The Constitution is a compact between States, not Territories. Otherwise the people of the Territories would have all the rights under the Constitution that the people of the States have; for example, the right to choose electors for President and Vice-President and to be represented in Congress by a member who can vote as well as speak.

So late as 1850, in a speech in this House, in the Thirty-ninth Congress, Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, discussed the question of the right of sovereignty of the United States over territory and people acquired by cession. In that discussion he said:

For sixty years and upward, after the passage of the ordinance of 1787 and the adoption of the Constitution, no one seriously doubted the right of Congress to control the whole legislation of the Territories, to establish Territorial governments, create courts, fix the tenure of the judges and other officers; in short, to exercise all acts of municipal as well as political legislation. For sixty years all that authority has been exercised over the Northwestern territory, the Southwestern territory, over Louisiana, Florida, and Oregon. In the meantime the question had been definitely and conclusively settled by all the branches of the Government—by Presidents, by Congresses, by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Elementary writers—Story, Rawle, and others—had so laid down the law.

By the law of nations, when a nation acquires territory, either by conquest or treaty, it becomes subject to the will of the acquiring power. The laws of such power, however, do not spread over it until some express legislation. In the meantime their own laws remain in full force. Not unfrequently such subject provinces are for a long time governed by very different laws from the country to which they become attached. Canada and other British provinces are to this day. But the very fact of acquisition gives to the sovereign power of the acquiring state all power to legislate for such acquisitions. It requires no constitutional or treaty provision. Wherever the legislative power of the new sovereign is placed, whether in king, parliament, or Congress, there is the whole and only power to govern them.

Our Constitution places the legislative power in Congress. Consequently, Congress has exclusive power over the territories newly acquired. The Constitution itself does not extend to them, and can have no influence upon them, except so far as it creates and defines the legislative organ of the sovereign will of the nation. None of the officers in the Territories hold by a constitutional tenure. No law of the United States was ever supposed to be extended to any of the Territories by the mere force of the Constitution. The provision for the return of fugitive slaves does not extend to the Territories. Any slave escaping or being taken into New Mexico or California would be instantly free. Hence, by the act of 1793 express provision for the subject was made with regard to the Territories which we then had.

But with respect to the particular subject that we are discussing, the subject of imposing duties, there are express decisions holding this same doctrine. The case of Fleming vs. Page (9 Howard, 603), to which I beg leave to refer for a moment, was this: The port of Tampico had been taken by the United States in the war with Mexico; duties were collected at the port of Philadelphia upon a cargo shipped from Tampico, and the question was whether or not those duties could be lawfully collected, Tampico being, as Philadelphia was, in the possession of the United States. The court held that Tampico was a foreign port within the meaning of the tariff law then existing, and that duties were properly levied upon goods imported into the United States from Tampico. The court said:

This construction of the revenue laws has been uniformly given by the administrative department of the Government in every case that has come before it. And it has, indeed, been given in cases where there appears to have been stronger ground for regarding the place of shipment as a domestic port. For after Florida had been ceded to the United States, and the forces of the United States had taken possession of Pensacola, it was decided by the Treasury Department that goods imported from Pensacola before an act of Congress was passed erecting it into a collection district and authorizing the appointment of a collector were liable to duty; that is, that although Florida had, by cession, actually become a part of the United States and was in our possession, yet, under our revenue laws, its ports must be regarded as foreign until they were established as domestic by act of Congress; and it appears that this decision was sanctioned at the time by the Attorney-General of the United States, the law officer of the Government.

And although not so directly applicable to the case before us, yet the decisions of the Treasury Department in relation to Amelia Island and certain ports in Louisiana, after that province had been ceded to the United States, were both made on the same grounds. And in the latter case, after a custom-house had been established by law at New Orleans, the collector at that place was instructed to regard as foreign ports Baton Rouge and other settlements still in the possession of Spain, whether on the Mississippi, Iberville, or the seacoast. The Department in no instance that we are aware of since the establishment of the Government has ever recognized a place in a newly acquired country as a domestic port, from which the coasting trade might be carried on, unless it had been previously made so by act of Congress.

The principle thus adopted and acted upon by the executive department of the Government has been sanctioned by the decisions in this court and the circuit courts whenever the question came before them. We do not propose to comment upon the different cases cited in the argument. It is sufficient to say that there is no discrepancy between them. And all of them, so far as they apply, maintain that under our revenue laws every port is regarded as a foreign one unless the custom-house from which the vessel clears is within a collection district established by act of Congress and the officers granting the clearance exercise their functions under the authority and control of the laws of the United States.

And precisely the same doctrine was held in Cross vs. Harrison (16 Howard, 166), although that case is cited as an authority upon both sides of this question. The case was this: The port of San Francisco came into possession of the United States during the war with Mexico. A military governor, exercising belligerent rights, imposed a schedule of tariff duties. Subsequently California became a part of the United States by treaty; but without regard to that treaty the military governor still continued to impose and collect duties until the time of the arrival of a collector appointed under an act of Congress.

The question was as to the power of this governor to collect those taxes before the cession to the United States, and his power to collect them afterwards, and that was the only question in the case. The court said:

Our conclusion, from what has been said, is that the civil government of California, organized as it was from a right of conquest, did not cease or become defunct in consequence of the signature of the treaty, or from its ratification. We think it was continued over a ceded conquest without any violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, and that, until Congress legislated for it, the duties upon foreign goods imported into San Francisco were legally demanded and lawfully received by Mr. Harrison, the collector of the port, who received his appointment, according to instructions from Washington, from Governor Mason.

In other words, this case decided that the laws in operation in an acquired territory continue in operation until new laws shall be made by Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I must leave many of these points that I had intended to discuss, as time passes rapidly. I hasten on to say that there is not a single case in all of the cases decided by the Supreme Court that is at variance with the doctrine that I have sought to establish. Many cases have been cited in opposition, and you will find many dicta, but they are only dicta, against my position. The cases cited relate generally to territory where a treaty right existed—a compact with the United States securing to the inhabitants of the territory the rights of American citizens. These cases are substantially all reviewed by Mr. Justice Brewer in the case of the American Publishing Company vs. Fischer (166 U. S., 467). In that case Justice Brewer said:

Whether the seventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved," operates ex proprio vigore, to invalidate this statute may be a matter of dispute. In Webster vs. Reid (2 Howard, 437) an act of the legislature of Iowa dispensing with a jury in a certain class of common-law actions, was held void. While in the opinion, on page 460, the seventh amendment was quoted, it was also said: "The organic law of the Territory of Iowa, by express provision and by reference, extends the laws of the United States, including the ordinances of 1787, over the Territory as far as they are applicable;" and the ordinance of 1787, article 2, in terms provided that "the inhabitants of said Territory shall be entitled to the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus and of trial by jury." So the validity may have been adjudged by reason of conflict with Congressional legislation.

In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 145, 154) it was said, in reference to a criminal case coming from the Territory of Utah, that "by the Constitution of the United States (Amendment VI) the accused was entitled to a trial by an impartial jury." Both of these cases were quoted in Callan vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 540) as authorities to sustain the ruling that the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to trial by jury are in force in the District of Columbia. On the other hand, in Mormon Church vs. United States (136 U. S., I, 44) it was said by Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court:

"Doubtless Congress, in legislating for the Territories, would be subject to those fundamental limitations in favor of personal rights which are formulated in the Constitution and its amendments; but these limitations would exist rather by inference and the general spirit of the Constitution, from which Congress derives all its powers, than by any express and direct application of its provisions." And in McAllister vs. United States (141 U. S., 174) it is held that the constitutional provision in respect to the tenor of judicial offices did not apply to Territorial judges.

And then, most significant of all, in this, the most recent of the cases, Judge Bradley, avoiding an express decision on the constitutional question, adds:

But if the seventh amendment does not operate in and of itself to invalidate this Territorial statute, then Congress has full control over the Territories, irrespective of any express constitutional limitations, and it has legislated in respect to this matter.

In Callan vs. Wilson the point at issue was whether a citizen of the District of Columbia was entitled to the provisions of the Constitution relating to trial by jury. Held that he was. It could hardly have been held otherwise, since the District of Columbia was carved out of Maryland and Virginia, two of the original parties to the Constitution, and since especially by act of Congress of February 21, 1871, the Constitution had been expressly extended to the District.

In Thompson vs. Utah (170 United States, 343) defendants committed grand larceny in 1895, when Utah was a Territory.

By the statutes of the Territory then in force they were entitled to be tried by a jury of twelve men.

When Utah became a State, its constitution provided for a trial by a jury of eight.

Held that this was an ex post facto law and infringed the Constitution of the United States. The provisions of the Constitution had been extended over Utah by act of Congress in 1850.

All of these cases were decided as to the law in places where the constitutional power of Congress had been limited.

That it is plenary and unlimited under the Constitution will appear from the decision in In re Ross (140 U. S., 453).

Ross, the petitioner, was one of the crew of an American ship, and when lying in the harbor of Yokohama made an assault upon and killed one of the officers of the vessel. He was arrested and tried before the American consul-general and four associates for murder. He was convicted, and, his death sentence having been commuted, was sent to the penitentiary at Albany. He sought release therefrom upon a writ of habeas corpus, and it was argued that his conviction was unlawful because he had not had the benefit of the constitutional provision which secures a common-law trial. The court that tried him was constituted by virtue of a treaty between the United States and Japan. The Supreme Court affirmed the finding of the consular court and held that Congress had power, irrespective of any limitations in the Constitution, to provide for the creation of the court contemplated by the treaty.

The court said:

By the Constitution a government is ordained and established for the United States of America and not for countries outside of their limits. The guaranties it affords against the accusation of capital or infamous crimes except by indictment and presentment by grand jury, and for the impartial trial by a jury when thus accused, apply only to citizens and others within the United States, or who are brought there for trial for alleged offenses committed elsewhere, and not to residents or temporary sojourners abroad. The Constitution can have no operation in any other country.

In the case of United States vs. Dawson (15 Howard, 467) it was held that the sixth amendment to the Constitution, which declares that—

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law—

did not apply to the case of the defendant, who was indicted in a Federal court in Arkansas for a murder committed in the Indian Territory. The district in which the trial was had had been created subsequent to the commission of the crime. Speaking of the constitutional provision, the court said:

It will be seen from the words of this amendment that it applies only to the case of offenses committed within the limits of a State; and whatever might be our conclusion, if this offense had been committed within the State of Arkansas, it is sufficient here to say, so far as it affects the proposition, that the offense was committed out of its limits and within the Indian Territory.

It seems to me that the conclusion is irresistible that the power of Congress with respect to trials outside of the United States, except when limited in terms, is plenary and unlimited.

With respect to the cases cited, involving the question of jury trials, it may be said further that even if they furnished decisions instead of opinions—mere obiter dicta—they would not be decisive of the question now under discussion. They related to an entirely different condition of things from that now presented.

(1) They all had to do with territory belonging to the United States acquired for the purposes of statehood and with respect to which the general and plenary power of Congress had been modified by treaty stipulations.

(2) They all had to do with territory over which Congress had legislated, provided a code of laws, and, so far as might be, extended the provisions of the Constitution.

With respect to Puerto Rico, on the other hand, we have not legislated, but are just about to do so. Unhampered by treaty or other stipulations or causes, Congress has both the constitutional "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations," and also all the combined powers of both the State and Federal governments.

That in governing territory belonging to the United States the power of Congress is absolute has uniformly been asserted by writers on the Constitution and by the Supreme Court.

Judge Story is an authority who I am sure will command the highest respect. He says:

The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal, and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and universal, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cession or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any of it has been settled.

And again, at section 1324:

As the General Government possesses the right to acquire territory, either by conquest or by treaty, it would seem to follow as an inevitable consequence that it possesses the power to govern what it has acquired. The territory does not, when so acquired, become entitled to self-government, and it is not subject to the jurisdiction of any State. It must, consequently, be under the dominion and jurisdiction of the Union, or it would be without any government at all. In cases of conquest the usage of the world is, if a nation is not wholly subdued, to consider the conquered territory as merely held by military occupation until its fate shall be determined by a treaty of peace. But during this intermediate period it is exclusively subject to the government of the conqueror. In case of confirmation or cession by treaty the acquisition becomes firm and stable, and the ceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed, either on terms stipulated in the treaty or on such as its new master shall impose.

The relations of the inhabitants with each other do not change, but their relations with their former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and their new sovereign. The act transferring the country transfers the allegiance of its inhabitants. But the general laws not strictly political remain as they were until altered by the new sovereign. If the treaty stipulates that they shall enjoy the privileges, rights, and immunities of citizens of the United States, the treaty, as a part of the law of the land, becomes obligatory in these respects. Whether the same effect would result from the mere fact of their becoming inhabitants and citizens by the cession without any express stipulation may deserve inquiry if the question should ever occur. But they do not participate in political power until they become a State and are admitted into the Union as such. Until that period the territory remains subject to the Government in such manner as Congress shall direct, under the clause of the Constitution now under consideration.

In the last section he follows and uses almost the exact language of Chief Justice Marshall in American Insurance Company vs. Canter.

And in the case of United States vs. Kagama (118 U. S., 375, 380) Justice Miller says:

> But this power of Congress to organize Territorial governments and make laws for their inhabitants arises not so much from the clause in the Constitution in regard to disposing of and making rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States as from the ownership of the country in which the Territories are and the right of exclusive sovereignty which must exist in the National Government and can be found nowhere else.

And Mr. Justice Bradley, in the case of Mormon Church vs. The United States, a very recent case, says:

> The power of Congress over the Territories of the United States is general and plenary, arising from and incidental to the right to acquire the territory itself, and from the power given in the Constitution to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.
> It would be absurd to hold that the United States had power to acquire territory and no power to govern it when acquired. The power to acquire territory, other than the territory northwest of the Ohio River, which belonged to the United States at the adoption of the Constitution, is derived from the treaty-making power and the power to declare and carry on war. The incidents of these powers are those of national sovereignty and belong to all independent governments.

But, Mr. Chairman, I shall not weary the committee with further citations. To my mind it is clear upon reason and authority that Congress has the unquestionable power to pass this bill.

Mr. Chairman, if we are compelled to legislate subject to the limitations of the Constitution, we can not, in my judgment, govern the Philippines and Puerto Rico so as to secure both their welfare and our own. We must let them go, or we must secure a constitutional amendment, or we must govern by that method which I have seen so many times suggested, and which seems to find favor in this House, by allowing the Executive to govern as he is governing in the Philippines and in Puerto Rico to-day. But when you suggest that method to me I ask you what limitations are there in the Constitution upon the power of Congress that do not exist upon the power of the President of the United States? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The President of the United States is in possession of the Philippines to-day because, as President, he is under a sworn obligation to see that the laws shall be faithfully executed, and he is in possession of Puerto Rico to-day, an island in a condition of peace, simply as the trustee for the American people, to hold that island until the Congress of the American people shall prescribe the method of its government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I pass over the question as to the policy of this bill. I do not care to discuss at length what the gentleman who preceded me [Mr. PAYNE] has already discussed—the reasons why we should impose this duty upon Puerto Rico.

To my mind the great question presented by this bill rises above any material considerations. It is not with me a question of dollars and cents. It is a question of the constitutional power of Congress to deal with these possessions in such a way that that dealing shall inure to their advantage and to ours.

So far as Puerto Rico is concerned, it is not a question of sentiment. It is a plain, practical business question. I admire the loyalty of the Puerto Ricans; I sympathize with them in their misfortune; but their government can no more than any other government be administered without a revenue. There must be money for schools, for internal improvements, for general administration. We can get revenue only in one of three ways. By borrowing, by direct appropriations from the Federal Treasury, or by taxation. I do not believe that Congress would be justified in starting Puerto Rico on its new career mortgaged for the expenses of its current needs.

I do not believe, however strong may be the sympathy of the American people for the Puerto Ricans, that they will look with satisfaction upon direct appropriations of money out of the Federal Treasury for support of a people who do not themselves contribute thereto. Only one alternative, therefore, remains, namely, taxation. Indirect taxes are the least oppressive and easiest to be borne. They will fall on those who are best able to pay. It would be oppressive and burdensome beyond measure to extend our internal-revenue system to Puerto Rico, and yet if we are to treat Puerto Rico as we treat ourselves we must do that.

It must not be forgotten, Mr. Chairman, that we are conferring advantages upon these people far beyond what they have ever dreamed of. We have relieved them of the multiplied and oppressive Spanish taxes—export taxes, consumption taxes, transportation taxes, and others without number.

I find, for instance, from the report of Mr. Carroll, special commissioner from the Treasury Department to Puerto Rico, that in the year 1896 the producers of Puerto Rico paid export and cargo duties on sugar, molasses, coffee, and lumber to the amount of $351,624.40. We relieve them from all burdens of that kind. Their coffee comes into our markets free, and that is two-thirds of their exports. On sugar we reduce the duty from $30 per ton to $7.50 per ton. This will save them over $1,000,000 annually. We reduce the duty on tobacco from 35 cents per pound to between 8 and 9 cents, and this will save another million annually.

In 1898 a committee of prominent citizens, appointed to report upon desired changes in the Puerto Rican tariff system, made a report to the Club de Industriales of Ponce recommending certain changes, but particularly two. One was greater protection to their own industries and the other was an attempt to secure from the North American Republic a reduction of 20 per cent in duties on tobacco, sugar, molasses, and salt exported from Puerto Rico.

This bill more than satisfies the desires then expressed. We give them protection and, instead of a 20 per cent reduction, we give them a 75 per cent reduction.

But above all, Mr. Chairman, we give them the benefit of all the money collected. What they pay out with one hand they receive again with the other.

The question of free trade or protection with respect to this little island is one of absolutely no importance; but when you come to say that under the limitations of the Constitution you must give free trade to the Philippines, you must incorporate into the body politic 12,000,000 Malays as citizens of the United States, and must extend to that archipelago our navigation laws, I call a halt. In behalf of my own people I am not willing to see the wage-earner of the United States, the farmer of the United States, put upon a level and brought into competition with the cheap half-slave labor, savage labor, of the Philippine Archipelago. [Loud applause.]

I want to say before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, that I am not impressed with the argument that all government is by the consent of the governed. That is a proposition that, however nicely it looks theoretically, we have never adopted in practice in this country. We did not adopt it in Louisiana; we did not adopt it in Florida. For more than thirty years we have ignored it and are ignoring it to-day in Alaska, and for five years the Territory of New Mexico existed under a code prescribed by a military governor, a code as to which the inhabitants of the Territory had nothing at all to say.

The rule does not apply to republican representative government. This Government itself does not exist by the consent of the governed. Twelve million five hundred thousand voters in the last Presidential election determined the policy of the Administration for 75,000,000 people; and during four years of bloody warfare the people of the South were governed and for years after against their consent. The question we have to meet is a practical question, Mr. Chairman; it is not a question of theory.

Liberty does not find its definition in glittering generalities. It is practical in its scope and purpose. It is not the same at all times and in all places. It means the largest individual freedom consistent with the welfare of all. It is therefore limited by conditions. What would be liberty in one place, among one people, would be license in another place among a different people. There is a necessary relation of suitableness between the government and the governed.

The methods of government prescribed by the principles of Anglican liberty as practiced in the United States would be grotesque in the Philippine Islands and would bring to their people no advantage. They would be in point of fact impossible of exercise.

I am sorry that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] seems to think with our friends on the other side that the American people can not be trusted to do justice unless they are tied down by the terms of a written instrument. My friend from Massachusetts says:

> But I regard it as a most inauspicious omen that our first legislative act should be framed on the theory that freedom does not follow the flag, but that the latter goes to those islands unattended by the great principles of liberty which have made it glorious. Who can measure the evils that will result from a denial of the fundamental muniments against oppression with which our Constitution surrounds the individual?

When and where will my friend tell me has the flag ever gone unattended by the great principles of liberty? Never anywhere. But it goes attended by those great principles not because they are written on any parchment, but because they are inscribed in the hearts of the American people. [Applause.]

The guaranties of liberty do not exist alone in the Constitution of the United States. They do not depend upon that great instrument for their strength and perpetuity. They would continue to live and flourish if that Constitution were annihilated. They are the indestructible heritage of humanity. They are our rich heritage, gained step by step through years of blood and struggle in a land of—

> Just and old renown
> Where freedom broadens slowly down
> From precedent to precedent.

They existed before the Constitution was framed. They landed at Jamestown in 1607 and at Plymouth Rock in 1620. The principles of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and the Bill of Rights—the three statutes which Edmund Burke called the Bible of the English Constitution—and their accretions in the battles for liberty throughout all the centuries furnish the rule of political action wherever the Saxon race assumes to govern. No American Congress would dare to violate them in the face of the American people.

That people would brook no interference with the fundamental principles of liberty in the government of others any more than they would in the government of themselves. They will not unwrite their history. They will not dishonor their ancestry. Their flag shall be, as it has ever been, the flag of the free. And wherever it shall float, on land or sea, in sunshine or in storm, in the sky of the Occident or the sky of the Orient, every star shining from its field of blue and every stripe blazing from its field of white shall symbolize justice and the guaranty to every man of his full measure of liberty under law. [Loud and long-continued applause on the Republican side.]

Under the rule the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 392. An act to pay the General Marine Insurance Company of Dresden the sum of $1,434.12 for certain coupons detached from United States bonds, which said coupons were lost on the Cunard steamship Oregon, sunk at sea March 14, 1886—to the Committee on Claims.

S. 854. An act for the relief of Lieut. Horace P. McIntosh—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SPERRY obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of National New Haven Bank, Fifty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARTLETT, for to-night, on account of physical condition.

To Mr. YOUNG of Pennsylvania, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ATWATER, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BROWN, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SHELDEN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MUDD, for this evening, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the order of the House making this evening the same as Friday evening, for the consideration of pension and other bills, the House will stand in recess until 8 o'clock; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will act as Speaker at the evening session.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled and was called to order at 8 p. m. by Mr. HEPBURN, Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule under which the House is in session.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bills on the Private Calendar.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were 63 ayes and 1 no.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is evident that no quorum is present.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] if there is not some way whereby we can arrive at some agreement. Anything he may propose we will agree to.

Mr. TALBERT. I have nothing to propose, Mr. Speaker, except to bring a quorum here to transact business legally, lawfully, and constitutionally.

Mr. GIBSON. Well, I will agree to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. A call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is evidently no quorum present. The Clerk will read section 4 of Rule XV.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and a quorum is not present and objection is made for that cause, unless the House shall adjourn, there shall be a call of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent members, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be considered as ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member as he answers to his name may vote on the pending question, and, after the roll call is completed, each member arrested shall be brought by the Sergeant-at-Arms before the House, whereupon he shall be noted as present, discharged from arrest, and given an opportunity to vote, and his vote shall be recorded.

If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted, and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear. And thereupon further proceedings under the call shall be considered as dispensed with. At any time after the roll call has been completed the Speaker may entertain a motion to adjourn, if seconded by a majority of those present, to be ascertained by actual count by the Speaker; and if the House adjourns all proceedings under this section shall be vacated. But this section of the rule shall not apply to the sessions of Friday night, until further order of the House.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Under that rule, Mr. Speaker, I demand a call of the House.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move that we adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BISHOP. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The Clerk began the call of the roll.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I did not demand the yeas and nays; the demand was made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BISHOP], and the Chair has not submitted the question to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not submitted the question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the motion to adjourn was defeated under viva voce vote, and under the rule it is the duty of the Speaker to call the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn has not been determined, and upon this question the yeas and nays have been demanded. Does the Chair understand that the demand for the yeas is withdrawn?

Mr. BISHOP. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays, and 6 members voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Six members voting in the affirmative—not a sufficient number. The noes have it, and the motion to adjourn is not agreed to. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The yeas and nays are ordered, and gentlemen in favor of the motion when their names are called will say "aye," and those opposed say "no." The doors will be closed and the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in absentees.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask if this call is being had under section 4, Rule XXV?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Is it the ruling of the Chair that that rule is applicable to this session?

Mr. LACEY. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this is expressly eliminated from the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is not Friday night; this is Monday night.

Mr. LACEY. Monday night was substituted for Friday.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Will it be necessary now for any further motion to the Chair to issue his warrant to bring in the absentees, or will it be done as the matter now stands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be done as the matter now stands, under the rule. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nay 1, answering present 13, not voting 183; as follows:

Before the result of the vote was announced the following proceedings took place:

Mr. HILL. My colleague, Mr. RUSSELL, has been sick for a week, and I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from Connecticut will be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from New York, Mr. KETCHAM, is not well, and I ask unanimous consent that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHATTUC. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. PUGH, is unavoidably detained from the House this evening, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection; and Mr. PUGH was excused.

Mr. SHATTUC. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BENTON, had an appointment to-night with a delegation from Missouri, which he could not very well waive, and he asked me to call him up by telephone in case of a roll call. The roll call was going on when I came in, and therefore I could not notify him in time. I ask that he be excused for to-night.

There was no objection; and Mr. BENTON was excused.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BROSIUS, is absent to-night on account of attendance upon a conference committee. I ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. BROSIUS was excused.

Mr. SHOWALTER. I ask that my colleague, Mr. OLMSTED, who has been called away on important business, may be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague, Judge MADDOX, be excused on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from Georgia will be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is moved that the House do now adjourn. This motion must be seconded by a majority of those present.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced 15 members rising to second the motion, and, 15 not being a majority of those present, 169, that the motion was not seconded.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HILL. I understand that the Chair, at the beginning of the session this evening, ruled that this is not a Friday night session. Am I correct?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a meeting on Monday night to transact the business which would be done on Friday night.

Mr. HILL. And therefore we do not adjourn at half past 10 under the rule of Friday night sessions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the special order requires an adjournment at that hour.

Mr. HILL. If the special order applies in that case, why does it not apply in the other case?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The special order authorizing the business of Friday night to be transacted to-night——

Mr. HILL. Then a point of order against adjourning at half past 10 would be sustained by the Chair?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will determine that when we reach it.

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order now to move to take a recess until to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion would not be in order.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is moved by the gentleman from New Jersey that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. A motion to adjourn has just been voted down, and there has been no intervening business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is overruled. There has been intervening business. The Chair responded to a parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Connecticut. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House do now adjourn. This motion must be seconded by a majority of the members present.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced 28 members rising, not a majority.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no other side on this motion.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, if it be in order, I ask that the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. SULLOWAY, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, be excused to-night. I know of my own personal knowledge that he has been in very bad health for a week and is utterly unable to be present to-night. So I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from New Hampshire will be excused.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Before I waive an objection to that request, I desire to ask what would have been the penalty if the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee had not been made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair scarcely regards that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn. This motion must be seconded by a majority of those present.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced 64 members rising to second it, not a majority of those present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair declines to appoint tellers, because under this rule the Speaker has to ascertain whether the motion has been seconded.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BALL, be excused on account of illness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] will be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleagues, Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. GAINES, Mr. COX, and Mr. SIMS, be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentlemen will be excused.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn. This motion must be seconded by a majority of those present.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced 90 members, a majority of those present, seconding the motion.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. GIBSON, it was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting his annual report for the calendar year 1899—to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-House Board submitting a draft of proposed legislation relating to traveling expenses of civilian members of the Board—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Supervising Architect increasing the estimate of deficiency appropriation for vaults, safes, and locks for public buildings—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Long Bridge across the Potomac—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Turtle Bayou, Texas—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5065) to extend the laws relating to commerce, navigation, and merchant seamen over the Hawaiian Islands ceded to the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 375); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LOUD, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6071) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 376); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Loveland, late of Company E, Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 360); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DRIGGS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 857) for the relief of James Chapman, late surgeon Eighth New York Cavalry, assistant surgeon Nineteenth New York Infantry, and sugeon One hundred and twenty-third New York Infantry, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 361); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. COCHRANE of New York, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 856) for the relief of Mary McCarthy, mother of John E. McCarthy, Sixth Company, First Battalion New York Sharpshooters, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 362); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6250) extending the time for proof and payment on lands claimed under the desert-land law of the United States by the members of the Colorado Cooperative Colony in southwestern Colorado, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 364); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GRAFF, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4335) granting a pension to Sarah Robinson, guardian of William H. Edmonds, helpless and idiotic minor of Joseph C. Edmonds, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 365); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7323) granting an increase of pension to Harrison Canfield, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 366); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8397) for the relief of John White, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 367); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3202) granting a pension to Catherine E. O'Brien, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 368); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7445) granting a pension to Emma B. Reed, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 369); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7594) granting a pension to Amelia Taylor, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 370); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GASTON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3085) granting a pension to William Sheppard, late of Company A, Sixteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 371); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1768) granting an increase of pension to George J. Stealy, of Clarksburg, W. Va., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 372); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 156) granting a pension to Lena E. Patterson, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 373); which said bill and report was referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6356) to grant an increase of pension to Lewis R. Armstrong, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 374); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8670) to increase the pension of Stephen J. Watts; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved, without objection.

EXCHANGE OF DENUDED LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, relative to the legislation necessary to protect the Government in the exchange of denuded lands in Government reservations for other lands on the public domain, etc.; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented the credentials of Thomas R. Bard, chosen by the legislature of California a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1899; which were read and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 160) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North at Drayton, N. Dak.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8620) amendatory of sections 3339 and 3341 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to internal-revenue tax on fermented liquors; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that after the routine morning business forty minutes be devoted to the consideration of unobjected pension bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire, from the Committee on Pensions, asks that after the routine morning business forty minutes may be given to consideration of pension cases on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. I ask that after that, until 2 o'clock, the Calendar may be taken up under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that after the completion of this order the Calendar may be taken up under Rule VIII until 2 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: A moment ago unanimous consent was given that at the conclusion of the routine morning business a certain time should be devoted to the consideration of pension bills. My attention has been called to the fact that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY] had given notice that after the routine morning business to-day he would submit some remarks on Senate joint resolution No. 45. I now ask that the unanimous-consent agreement be modified so that the consideration of pension bills will follow the remarks of the Senator from Delaware. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire now asks unanimous consent that the unanimous consent previously given be reconsidered, and asks unanimous consent that after the completion of the speech by the Senator from Delaware forty minutes may be given to the consideration of pension cases. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

A bill (H. R. 2391) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. Holt.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 289) granting a pension to John B. Turchin;

A bill (S. 3004) granting an increase of pension to James H. Stevens;

A bill (S. 474) granting an increase of pension to Isaac Patterson;

A bill (S. 2280) granting a pension to Horatio N. Cornell;

A bill (S. 1608) granting a pension to Eleanor R. Sullivan; and

A bill (S. 2463) granting an increase of pension to Ellen Leddy.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. BAKER), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 817) granting an increase of pension to Julia A. Taylor, of Pratt, Kans., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. QUARLES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2597) granting an increase of pension to Charles Kauffung, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. KENNEY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3186) granting a pension to Margaretha Lippert, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FORAKER, from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by him on the 19th instant, intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 2264) to provide a government for the island of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes, reported favorably thereon; and the amendment was ordered to be printed.

NAVAL INTELLIGENCE PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom the subject was referred, to report a joint resolution authorizing the printing of extra copies of the publications of the Office of Naval Intelligence, Navy Department, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 91) authorizing the printing of extra copies of the publications of the Office of Naval Intelligence, Navy Department, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, authorized to print, in excess of the 1,000 copies authorized by the act of January 12, 1895, such extra copies of the publications of the Office of Naval Intelligence as may be necessary for distribution to the naval service and to meet other official demands: Provided, That in no case shall the edition of any one publication exceed 2,000 copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 13th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the United States Commission to the Philippine Islands 1,500 copies of volume 1 of their report recently submitted to the Senate by the President.

REPORT ON THE ISLAND OF LUZON.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] on the 14th instant, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of the report of Paymaster Willis B. Wilcox, United States Navy, on the island of Luzon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest the substitution of the word "directed" for "requested."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE YEARBOOK.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 77) authorizing the printing of a special edition of the Yearbook of the United States Department of Agriculture for 1899, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed of part 2 of the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture for 1899, issued in accordance with section 73, paragraph 2, chapter 23, Statutes at Large, 1895, issued under the title of "Yearbook of the United States Department of Agriculture," a special edition of 5,000 copies, on sized and supercalendered paper, to be bound in best quality of book cloth, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, for distribution abroad, and especially during the Universal Exposition at Paris, 1900, to agricultural, educational, and other public and scientific foreign institutions and libraries, and to public men especially engaged in work beneficial to agriculture: Provided, That in the distribution of this edition abroad, paragraph 79 of said section 73, of chapter 23, volume 28, Statutes at Large, 1895, is hereby suspended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHRISTIAN CHRITZMAN.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLISON on the 9th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, the sum of $549.32; and the said Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to apply said amount to the payment of the funeral expenses and the expenses of the last sickness of Christian Chritzman, deceased, late messenger to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, including the sum of $100 loaned to him by C. L. Reynolds to meet expenses of his last sickness, and also to provide a suitable headstone to mark his grave in the cemetery at Harrisburg, Pa., at a cost not to exceed $50; the sum herein provided to be in lieu of the usual allowance on the death of an employee of the Senate, and the voucher for payment of the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLISON on the 14th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations have authority to employ an assistant clerk, to be appointed by the chairman, and to be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 20, 1900.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8620) amendatory of sections 3339 and 3341 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to internal-revenue tax on fermented liquors was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, I ask that Senate joint resolution No. 45, known as the Bacon resolution, may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution. Does the Senator from Delaware desire to have it read at length?

Mr. KENNEY. I do not desire to have it read at length.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, I am one of those Senators who voted for the ratification of the treaty of Paris, believing that ratification meant the end of the war we had commenced for humanity's sake, and that the $20,000,000 awarded Spain was the act not only of a magnanimous victor, but as well a tribute placed on Liberty's altar by a people who knew the value of freedom. Are there any who know the history of the last two years who will contend that if at the time the vote on the treaty was taken it had been stated on the floor of this Senate that war in the Philippines was to go on and that the millions awarded to Spain was the purchase price for a people to be held in perpetual vassalage that instrument would have been ratified? I do not think there are any such.

I do know, Mr. President, that of the influences which moved members of this Senate to vote for the treaty the most powerful were the desire to end the war and commence the work of liberty and freedom in those far islands. It was believed the intentions of our Government as to the Philippines were not different from those which had been declared as to Cuba, and that the establishment of peace meant an earlier and easier solution of the Philippine problem. To continue the war conditions, fearing unjust treatment by the United States of those who had aided us in the overthrow of the Spanish arms in those islands, seemed unreasonable and without foundation; certainly so in the face of assurances made by those who should have been able to speak on the subject.

I believe, Mr. President, that there are Senators to-day who are supporting the policy outlined by the junior Senator from Indiana, and which we are told is the policy of the Administration, who at the time of the vote on the peace treaty never dreamed that now they would be advocating territorial and foreign policies for this Government which are as strange to its institutions and traditions as they are unjust and iniquitous. But under the lash and spur of party policy and expediency they have wheeled into line and now stand ready, not merely as passive agents, but as active workers, to consummate that which must then have been the hidden purposes of persons who dared not that the light of public discussion should shine on their nefarious schemes.

That which has occurred in the Philippines since the Senate ratified the treaty of peace is as little chargeable to that act of the Senate as it is to those who voted against ratification. The peace with Spain entailed no war with the Filipinos nor change in one country's foreign policy. The war in Luzon may or may not havr been avoided under a different policy by the Administration. Certain it is there is no article in the treaty declaring war on Aguinaldo and his people, and there can be found therein no authority for the retention of the Philippines as a dependent colony, nor does the Administration's purpose in this regard find warrant in that instrument. The reason for the war with the Filipinos and the imperalistic policy of the Republican Administration must be sought for outside of the treaty of Paris, for in it there will be found authority for neither. Those who are wont to charge all the evils of the present war, and those which may follow, to the ratification of the treaty are indeed "running a hant." The war and its evils are chargeable to other causes which should be too clear not to be seen by those who so much deplore them.

Among these causes, Mr. President, is the greed of those of our countrymen who set self above honor and country; and who for wealth and power will use the miseries and misfortunes of others; who for their own selfish ends are willing to reestablish slavery within the domain of this country and withhold the Constitution from a part of the people. The horrors of war are to them but a means to accomplish their sordid ends. National honor and justice to the Filipino is to them of no concern so long as they are the beneficiaries of dishonor and injustice. It is here, Mr. President, that the evils which have followed the treaty and which are so often charged to it can in part at least be found.

THE ISLANDS ARE TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES.

That the islands are territory of the United States and the inhabitants thereof citizens of this Government there can be no doubt. Whether they came to us by conquest of arms or by treaty with Spain, there can be no difference. That title and possession has passed to us is beyond dispute, and with title and possession to us the Constitution has gone to them.

In 1859 Stephen A. Douglas, in an article published in Harpers' New Monthly Magazine, Volume XIX, pages 519–537, entitled "Popular sovereignty in the Territories," says:

Thus it appears that our fathers of the Revolution were contending not for independence, in the first instance, but for the inestimable right of local self-government under the British constitution; the right of every distinct political community—independent colonies, territories, and provinces, as well as sovereign States—to make their own local laws, form their own domestic institutions, and manage their own internal affairs in their own way, subject only to the constitution of Great Britain as a paramount law of the Empire.

Speaking of the "charter compact," he said:

It is important that this Jeffersonian plan of government for the Territories should be carefully considered for many obvious reasons. It was the first plan of government for the Territories ever adopted in the United States. It was drawn by the author of the Declaration of Independence, and revised and adopted by those who shaped the issues which produced the Revolution and formed the foundations upon which our whole American system of Government rests. It was not intended to be either local or temporary in its character, but was designed to apply to all territory ceded or to be ceded, and to be universal in its application and eternal in its duration wherever and whenever we might have territory requiring a government. It ignored the right of Congress to legislate for the people of the Territories without their consent, and recognized the inalienable right of the people of the Territories when organized into political communities to govern themselves in respect to their local concerns and internal polity.

Let us pause at this point for a moment and inquire whether it be just to those illustrious patriots and sages who formed the Constitution of the United States to assume that they intended to confer upon Congress the unlimited and arbitrary power over the people of the American territories which they had resisted with their blood when claimed by the British Parliament over British colonies in America? Did they confer upon Congress the right to bind the people of the American territories in all cases whatsoever, after having fought the battles of the Revolution against a preamble declaring the right of Parliament to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever? If, as they contended before the Revolution, it was the birthright of all Englishmen, inalienable when formed into political communities, to exercise exclusive power of legislation in their local legislatures in respect to all things affecting their internal policy, did not the same right after the Revolution, and by virtue of it, become the birthright of all Americans, in like manner inalienable when organized into political communities, no matter by what name, whether colonies, Territories, provinces, or new States?

The principle under our political system is that every distinct political community loyal to the Constitution and the Union is entitled to all the privileges and immunities of self-government in respect to their local concerns and internal polity, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

In his contention Mr. Douglas is in line with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which have never been overruled directly or indirectly. In the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters, page 511) Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL.

The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the power of making war and of making treaties; and that consequently Government possesses the power to acquire territory, either by conquest or by treaty. The usage of the world is, if a nation be not entirely subdued, to consider the land of the conquered territory as mere military occupation until its end shall be determined at the treaty of peace. If it be conceded by treaty, the acquisition is confirmed and the conceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed, either by the terms of stipulation in the treaty of cession or under such as its new master shall impose.

And he also said:

The right to govern is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned.

Later, in the case of Scott vs. Sanford (20 Howard, 107), the Supreme Court held to the same opinion and in the following language:

CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY.

This brings us to examine by what provisions of the Constitution the present Federal Government, under its delegated and restricted powers, is authorized to acquire territory outside of the original limits of the United States, and what powers it may exercise therein over the person or property of a citizen of the United States while it remains a territory and until it shall be admitted as one of the States of the Union.

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States.

The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given, and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority, and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States must rest upon the same discretion.

All we mean to say on this point is that as there is no express regulation in the Constitution defining the power which the General Government may exercise over the person or property of a citizen in a Territory thus acquired, the court must necessarily look to the provisions and principles by which its decision must be guided. Taking this rule to guide us, it may be safely assumed that citizens of the United States who emigrate to a Territory belonging to the people of the United States can not be ruled as mere colonists dependent upon the will of the General Government, and to be governed by any laws it may think proper to impose. The Territory being a part of the United States, the government and the citizen both enter under the authority of the Constitution with their respective rights defined and marked out, and the Federal Government can exercise no power over his person or property beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved.

The right to acquire territory is certainly an inherent right of a nation, and to govern it necessarily follows, but its government must be by and under its constitution and laws. In case of the United States, the Constitution applies at the same moment title and possession passes to them, and there is nor can be no part of the domain of the United States an exception wherein a different or limited citizenship exists from that of other portions of the country. There is no such warrant in that instrument.

Both Chief Justice Marshall and Chief Justice Taney agree that territory acquired by the United States becomes a part of the nation and must be governed under the Constitution, and that no power is thereby given to govern or rule as mere dependencies at the pleasure of the Federal Government.

At no time in our history has there been acquired territory by the United States except with an ultimate view of statehood, through, of course, the regular and necessary step first of Territorial probation. Of all the millions of square miles heretofore acquired, to-day there are left out of the federation of States only Alaska, Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico, all of which are looking to ultimate statehood. There can be no excuse for the permanent retention of the Philippines based on the former action of the United States in acquiring Louisiana and the other territory on this continent. No one can successfully contend that the reason for the acquisition of the latter can be urged in support of the former.

FORMER ACQUISITIONS.

In the case of Louisiana much trouble had been experienced for years by the inhabitants of the western regions of the country by reason of the impositions and tribute levied by Spain upon their commerce on the Mississippi River. The vital point was the restriction necessarily consequent upon the navigation of the Mississippi River while the mouth of the river was in possession of any foreign power.

There had been a treaty made between Spain and the United States prior to 1802 which nominally opened the Mississippi to the commerce of the United States; but this was indirectly violated in various stealthy ways and was thereby virtually annulled. No redress seemed possible, and Spain refused to sell her possessions. However, in that year negotiations arose between Spain and France involving the transfer of Louisiana. Pending these negotiations, Mr. Livingston, our minister to France, addressed a letter to the French Government in which he protested against the proposed transfer for reasons which afterwards furnished the chief motive for our purchase.

Nearly seventeen years afterwards Florida was ceded by Spain, thus freeing us from a barrier along the northern coast and the eastern part of the Gulf of Mexico. This was also urged as a paramount necessity.

In 1827 Henry Clay, Secretary of State, offered to purchase Texas from Mexico and give $1,000,000 for the cession. In 1829 Martin Van Buren, Secretary of State, offered to purchase at $5,000,000. Both offers were rejected. Annexation was effected after the Texas war of independence, not by treaty, but by the action of the Congress of each country, and may be said to have been the mutual act of the people. Daniel Webster said in regard to the proposed treaty for Texas:

I have, on the deepest reflection, long ago come to the conclusion that it is of very dangerous and doubtful consequences to enlarge the boundaries of this country or the Territories over which our laws are now established. There must be some limit to the extent of our territory if we would make our institutions permanent.

After the war with Mexico resulting from the annexation of Texas, a portion of the territory of Mexico was demanded by our Government on the ground of indemnity for the past and security of the future. By the treaty signed February 2, 1848, a tract of Mexican territory was annexed. The treaty was bitterly denounced by Daniel Webster and other Senators on the ground that it was equivalent to a robbery enforced by the insolent power of a rapacious conqueror. The price paid for the territory thus taken was $15,000,000, and besides the United States assumed claims of American citizens against Mexico; and, in addition, afterwards paid Texas $10,000,000 for the portion of New Mexico lying east of the Rio Grande. The Gadsden treaty settled disputes with Mexico as to the southern part of Arizona. Thereby the United States secured the disputed territory at the price of $10,000,000, and with it a right of transit for troops, mails, and merchandise over the isthmus of Tehuantepec. The treaty of purchase from Russia was of date March 30, 1867; price paid, $7,200,000. There had been unofficial correspondence concerning it from the year 1859. The treaty was ratified in May, and proclamation made June 30. Mr. Sumner said, in his speech in the Senate April 9, 1867, that it was a visible step in the occupation of the whole North American Continent. "We dismiss one other monarch from the continent. One by one they have retired—first France, then Spain, then France again, and now Russia."

In all former cases the lands acquired were a part of the North American Continent, and by nature intended as a part of one great country. In every case the territory was practically uninhabited, and by climatic and other conditions suited for the uses of the people of the United States. There was no congested population, such as is the case in the Philippines. There was indeed room and reason for expansion in all these former cases. The taking of none of these territories entailed shocking changes in our foreign and territorial policies, nor the burdens of great standing armies. Then we carried civilization into the uninhabited wildernesses, and prepared places for our growing population suited to their needs. Then no free and independent people were driven into mountains and their homes made waste places. No lands nor peoples were taken for other government than under the Constitution—citizenship and equal rights for all.

I hold that the title and possession of the Philippine Archipelago having been perfected in the United States, and no matter whether by treaty or by force of arms, there is left but one of two courses open to this Government as to their disposition. The one is that they be retained as a Territory, with the ultimate and certain purpose of admission as a State or States into the Union. The other, that they be given to the people of the islands themselves, to be erected into a republic as free as ours, and so under the guidance and protection of the United States.

STATEHOOD IMPOSSIBLE.

That the first course is impossible there can be little doubt when we take into consideration the character of the people and understand the great differences which exist between them and the people of the United States. Imagination can not be invoked so wild as to contemplate an addition to our present statehood of the State of the Philippines.

All the traditions, manners, and customs of the Filipinos, their racial extraction, affiliations, and tendencies, to say nothing of their location, being separated from us by thousands of miles of ocean, have erected a barrier too high and strong to be passed in making them a State of the American Union. Notwithstanding their love for free institutions and their enlightenment, these reasons alone must forever preclude them from membership in the Union of American States. The distinguished senior Senator from Kentucky, in an address before the American Bar Association on August 28 last, said:

We have extended our domain into and across the Pacific, but we have not changed the nature of our Government or the character of our institutions. Ours is still a Union of American States and will so remain to the end. The bond of union by which the States are held together was ordained and established as the "Constitution for the United States of America." Our policy, our traditions, our interests, and our glory alike forbid the admission into the Union of any other than a North American State.

In that statement he fully expressed what I believe are the real sentiments of all true Americans, certainly of all who hold sacred the traditions of our country and love its institutions.

So, Mr. President, we have in honor left us but the latter course, to give the islands back into the hands of their own people, and in doing this we must be satisfied that there is in them and their leader, Aguinaldo, fitness and ability for self-government.

THE FILIPINOS ARE FITTED FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The proofs of this are overwhelming. In August, 1898, Major Bell reported to the Government that the foreign residents at Manila all felt that a native government would be better than Spanish rule.

In that same report he says that he has arrived at the following conclusions as to the principal leaders among General Aguinaldo's following:

Baldomero Aguinaldo, a first cousin of Don Emilio, is secretary of state, and is a swelled dunce and was once a schoolmaster.

Mariano Trias, an educated, honest man, is secretary of treasury. He was vice-president of a former revolution, and of all the insurgent leaders he stands next to Aguinaldo in popularity with the people.

Leandro Y. Barra, a lawyer and good, honest man, is secretary of the interior.

One Estefan de la Rama, a rich and educated man, who speaks English, is commandante de marina, or commander in chief of the navy. He is reported honest and capable.

Aguinaldo's interpreter and secretary is one Escamilla, a good linguist, speaking Latin, French, Spanish, and English—Spanish fluently and English well, to my personal knowledge. He was a teacher of the piano in Hongkong, and is one of the best interpreters I have ever seen.

One Malabini, a student of law and notary public, honest, but not especially talented, is one of his councilors. There is a prominent and wealthy citizen of this city who is also a councilor, but I prefer not to mention his name. He is an avowed annexationist, and sincerely hopes the Americans may remain here.

Don Felipe Agoncillo is a highly respected lawyer, and has for some time been the Filipino agent in Hongkong. I understand it is he who has been designated by Aguinaldo to go to Paris and America to represent the insurgent cause.

C. Sandico, a skilled and well-educated machinist, who speaks English quite well, is a prominent man, and coadjutor of Aguinaldo. His present commission is to appear on behalf of political prisoners before the officer charged with investigating such cases. He has been generally useful to Aguinaldo as a delegate and negotiator with Americans.

Lieut. Gen. Emiliano Riego de Dios, the military governor of Cavite, is said to be an honest man, but with little education.

Major-General Ricati, in command of operations along the southern zone of trenches, appears and is said to be a well-meaning, honest man, with a fair education.

Maj. Gen. Panteleon Garcia, in command of operations along the northern zone, is not educated very well, but is an able, honest, polite, and agreeable man, who has been a schoolmaster of the primary grade.

Brig. Gen. Pio Del Pilar, a vicious, uneducated ignoramus and highway robber.

General Estrella, commanding the military forces in Cavite, has the credit of being an honest man with little education.

Brigadier-General Mascardo, fairly educated and honest, but possesses little ability.

Gen. Gregorio Del Pilar is young, well educated, and honest, but with little experience. He belongs to a wealthy family of Nueva Ecija.

General Noriel, an honest, fairly educated, well-meaning, reasonable, and agreeable fellow, who has done good service and gained the reputation of a good soldier.

Colonel Montenegro, a very conciliatory fellow to meet. Young, small, and well educated. Speaks French, English, and Spanish, the latter fluently; the others very well. He is a considerable of a "talk a heap." Is "kinder" honest and was a clerk in Lalla's hotel, where he received his lessons in honesty.

There are other leaders of lesser grade who it is hardly necessary to mention here. Aguinaldo has many adjutants, most of whom are young, smart, and well educated.

Mr. President, this is what was said of the principal men of the Philippines by an officer of the American Army, and on the whole is testimony most favorable to them. No better would have been said of General Washington and his principal following and associates during the days of our Revolution by General Howe or the others of the British army.

Admiral Dewey, in June, 1898, cabled the Navy Department:

These people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races.

And then in August of that year, in response to a telegram asking for his views on the general subject of the Philippines, he referred to his cable message of June and added:

Further intercourse with them has confirmed me in this opinion.

In June, 1898, Consul Williams's opinion of Aguinaldo and the Filipinos was as follows:

U. S. S. BALTIMORE,
CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Manila, Philippine Islands, June 16, 1898.

I have the honor to report that since our squadron destroyed the Spanish fleet on May 1 the insurgent forces have been most active and almost uniformly successful in their many encounters with the Crown forces of Spain. Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, the insurgent chief, who was deported late in 1897, returned recently to Cavite and resumed direction of insurgent forces. He is not permitted by his people to personally lead in battle, but from headquarters governs all military movements. He told me to-day that since his return his forces had captured nearly 5,000 prisoners, nearly 4,000 of whom were Spaniards, and all of whom had rifles when taken.

General Aguinaldo has now about 10,500 rifles and 1 fieldpiece, with 8,000 more rifles, 2 Maxim guns, and a dynamite gun bought in China and now in transit. The insurgents have defeated the Spaniards at all points except at fort near Malate, and hold not only North Luzon to the suburbs of Manila, but Batanges Province also and the bay coast entire, save the city of Manila.

While the Spaniards cruelly and barbarously slaughter Filipinos taken in arms, and often noncombatants, women, and children, the insurgent victors, following American example, spare life, protect the helpless, and nurse, feed, and care for Spaniards taken prisoners and for Spanish wounded as kindly as they care for the wounded fallen from their own ranks.

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul.

General Whittier testified that—

Their conduct to their Spanish prisoners has been deserving of the praise of all the world. With hatred of priests and Spaniards, fairly held on account of the conditions before narrated, and with every justification to a savage mind of the most brutal revenge, I have heard of no instance of torture, murder, or brutality since we have been in the country.

In an interview in a New York paper he is quoted as saying:

There is a wide ignorance of the wealth of the Philippines and the character of the Filipinos. The natives are not ignorant; they are not savages. They are adept at manufactures and as accountants, mariners, and railroad operatives. They are quiet, most temperate, and have shown great ability in their military affairs.

An Englishman, Mr. Wray, who has lived for seventeen years among the Filipinos, says:

"The people are the most enlightened and vigorous branch of the Malay race, and have been Christians for centuries; in fact, longer than the principles of the Reformation have been established in Great Britain, and are the nearest akin to Europeans of any alien race." Professor Worcester says that they are as industrious as the Japanese, and less criminally disposed. General Whittier stated to the peace commissioners at Paris that he had never seen a drunken Filipino, notwithstanding the example of our soldiers, whom they imitate in everything else, and that in their treatment of their Spanish prisoners they have been "deserving of the praise of all the world;" that with every justification to a savage mind for the most brutal revenge, he had heard of no instance of torture, murder, or brutality since he had been in the country.

A late writer in the Independent, speaking of their intellectual attainments, says that 83 per cent of them can read and write. This seems hardly possible, for, if true, the proportion of literates is almost that of the United States. General Greene told the Paris commissioners that he had been unable to obtain statistics, but that the majority could read and write. When we bear in mind that only 58 per cent of the Italians and only 31 per cent of the Russians can do this, and, according to the census of 1887, only 2½ per cent of the Spaniards, it is apparent that the Filipinos occupy no mean position in this respect. Many of them have attended the high schools and colleges in the islands and the university at Manila, and a considerable number have been educated in Europe. They have attained the first rank among lawyers and physicians at Manila.

Gen. Charles King after serving in the Philippines, in a letter to the Milwaukee Journal, speaks of them in the following terms:

SAN FRANCISCO, June 22, 1899.

To the editor of the Journal, Milwaukee, Wis.:

DEAR SIR: Thinking over your telegram and request of June 7, I find myself seriously embarrassed. As an officer of the Army, there are many reasons why I should not give my "views of situation in the Philippines, how long fighting is likely to continue, and thoughts as to America's part in future of islands."

The capability of the Filipinos for self-government can not be doubted. Such men as Arellano, Aguinaldo, and many others whom I might name are highly educated; nine-tenths of the people read and write; all are skilled artisans in one way or another; they are industrious, frugal, temperate, and, given a fair start, could look out for themselves infinitely better than our people imagine. In my opinion, they rank far higher than the Cubans or the uneducated negroes to whom we have given the right of suffrage.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES KING, Brigadier-General.

No better or more conclusive evidence of the patriotism and ability of General Aguinaldo could be had than is furnished by his letter to Mr. Williams. It is dated August 1, 1898. It will be found in Senate Document No. 62, Part I, page 397, and is as follows:

AUGUST 1, 1898.

Mr. WILLIAMS.

DEAR SIR AND DISTINGUISHED FRIEND: Impressed by the note of July 8 past, I can only confess that the people of North America have excited, and now excite, the universal admiration not only for the grade of progress and culture to which they have arrived in a very short time, but also for their political constitution, so admirable and inimitable, and for the generosity, honesty, and industry of the men of the Government who have so far ruled the destinies of that great people without an equal in history.

Above all, I thank you sincerely for the kind words which you express in your note quoted above, and I congratulate you with all sincerity on the acuteness and ingenuity which you have displayed in it in painting in an admirable manner the benefits which, especially for me and my leaders, and, in general, for all my compatriots, would be secured by the union of these islands with the United States of America. Ah! that picture, so happy and so finished, is capable of fascinating not only the dreamy imagination of the impressionable Oriental, but also the cold and calculating thoughts of the sons of the North.

This is not saying that I am not of your opinion. I am fully persuaded that the Filipinos will arrive at the height of happiness and glory if in future they can show with raised heads the rights which to-day are shown by the free citizens of North America. These islands will be in effect one of the richest and pleasantest countries of the globe if the capital and industry of North Americans come to develop the soil.

You say all this and yet more will result from annexing ourselves to your people, and I also believe the same since you are my friend and the friend of the Filipinos and have said it. But why should we say it? Will my people believe it?

I, with true knowledge of the character and habits of these people, do not dare assure you of it, since I have only wished to establish a government in order that none of those powers which you call ambitious should be able to take advantage of our good faith, as has been done in the past by the Spaniards. I have done what they desire, establishing a government in order that nothing important may be done without consulting fully their sovereign will, not only because it was my duty, but also because acting in any other manner they would fail to recognize me as the interpreter of their aspirations and would punish me as a traitor, replacing me by another more careful of his own honor and dignity.

I have said always, and I now repeat, that we recognize the right of the North Americans to our gratitude, for we do not forget for a moment the favors which we have received and are now receiving; but, however great those favors may be, it is not possible for me to remove the distrust of my compatriots.

These say that if the object of the United States is to annex these islands, why not recognize the government established in them in order in that manner to join with it the same as by annexation?

Why do not the American generals operate in conjunction with the Filipino generals and, uniting the forces, render the end more decisive?

Is it intended, indeed, to carry out annexation against the wish of these people, distorting the legal sense of that word? If the revolutionary government is the genuine representative by right and deed of the Filipino people, as we have proved when necessary, why is it wished to oppress instead of gaining their confidence and friendship?

It is useless for me to represent to my compatriots the favors received through Admiral Dewey, for they assert that up to the present the American forces have shown not an active, only a passive cooperation, from which they suppose that the intention of these forces are not for the best. They assert, besides, that it is possible to suppose that I was brought from Hongkong to assure those forces by my presence that the Filipinos would not make common cause with the Spaniards, and that they have delivered to the Filipinos the arms abandoned by the former in the Cavite Arsenal in order to save themselves much labor, fatigue, blood, and treasure that a war with Spain would cost.

But I do not believe these unworthy suspicions. I have full confidence in the generosity and philanthropy which shine in characters of gold in the history of the privileged people of the United States, and for that reason, invoking the friendship which you profess for me and the love which you have for my people, I pray you earnestly, as also the distinguished generals who represent your country in these islands, that you entreat the Government at Washington to recognize the revolutionary government of the Filipinos, and I, for my part, will labor with all my power with my people that the United States shall not repent their sentiments of humanity in coming to the aid of an oppressed people.

Say to the Government at Washington that the Filipino people abominate savagery; that in the midst of their past misfortunes they have learned to love liberty, order, justice, and civil life, and that they are not able to lay aside their own wishes when their future lot and history are under discussion. Say also that I and my leaders know what we owe to our unfortunate country; that we know how to admire and are ready to imitate the disinterestedness, the abnegation, and the patriotism of the grand men of America, among whom stands preeminent the immortal General Washington.

You and I both love the Filipinos; both see their progress, their prosperity, and their greatness. For this we should avoid any conflict which would be fatal to the interests of both peoples, who should always be brothers. In this you will acquire a name in the history of humanity and an ineradicable affection in the hearts of the Filipino people. (From General Aguinaldo to Mr. Williams, United States consul.)

RETENTION NOT WARRANTED.

If from any point of view it should be contended that the Philippines should be held for the present as a colony no matter what may be the ultimate disposition of them, is it not a self-evident fact that such retention would entail on this nation a task far greater than any possible benefits could justify? Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that this Government will hold the islands as dependent colonies and govern them by such means as the Congress and the President shall elect, would not the sacrifices which must be made by the United States be too great to warrant the attempt? Certainly so, if we are to judge the future by the past. The retention of the Philippines up to this time has cost the United States many millions of dollars and the lives of thousands of our soldiers, to say nothing of the thousands of them who, by reason of their services in the Tropics, have been made invalids for life. And worse than death itself, hundreds have lost their reason and are to-day inmates of the abodes of the mad. Only the other day the Post of this city published the following:

ABOUT 450 OF OTIS'S MEN HAVE LOST THEIR REASON.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., February 13, 1900.

Eleven insane soldiers were to-day sent from this city to the Government hospital at Washington, D. C., and it is probable that about thirty more will go East during the week. During the last three months nearly 250 demented soldiers have been sent across the continent, and it is said that over 200 more will soon arrive here from Manila. In nearly all cases the men are violently insane.

Now, Mr. President, in the face of these facts, who is there that will insist that these islands shall be retained on any grounds or for any reasons? Are not the burdens of our people heavy enough, and has not our experience in this matter already drawn enough of blood and tears from the American people? I think so, and for one I am ready that the end shall come and at once. To retain them as American territory on any conditions means a continuation of these sacrifices and increase of our burdens. There can never be had from them compensation equal to their cost. Already the people of Germany are learning what their colonial policy is costing in life and treasure. Germany went to East Africa as it is proposed we shall remain in the Philippines, the ruler of a dependent people, and all for the sake of extending commerce. In one of her districts alone during 1899 the population has diminished from over 100,000 to less than 70,000. Following in the wake of her commerce has gone to her colonies famine, sickness, and death. The cost of governing her dependencies is many times greater than all the trade benefits she derives from them. What has been the experience of Germany will be ours if we go into the business of extending our commerce through the method of dependencies. No people worth being Americans will submit to vassalage.

ROME FOUND HER END IN IMPERIALISM.

Mr. President, does not this cry for conquest take us back through the centuries until we find ourselves in that time of the Roman Republic, when by the ambition and greed of some of her sons was begun her conquest of the world—the beginning of her end? In that history can we not see ourselves and read our future? New territories were conquered and their people enslaved. Military governors were sent to rule over them. Strange laws were enacted for their government and alien judges sent to administer them. The religion and manners of the conquerors were enforced; in a word, all the miseries which follow in the train of the conqueror and oppressor came to the peoples to whom Rome brought the blessings of her civilization. Rome then thought herself trusted of the gods for the civilizing of mankind throughout the world, but soon was taught her mistake. In her struggle to destroy the liberties of others she lost her own. Man's unalienable rights—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—then, as many times since, asserted itself and the conquered became the conquerors, the slave the master. And Rome, the mistress of the world, repudiated and despised, passed—a page in history. In imperialism she found her end.

There are those who would treat this question by no ordinary rules. They find new definitions and meanings for our laws. They produce strange rules for the interpretation of our Constitution. They find virtue in absolutism and see freedom where once slavery was. For commerce's sake they would obliterate the Declaration of Independence. For the imagined riches of the East, honor and justice are to be set aside. The cost and sacrifices to secure the prize are not to be counted—only the glitter of the gem is the moment's concern.

Let our dealings with these people be in justice, not only to them, but to ourselves. If there be doubt as to our agreement with them touching their independence, let them have the benefit of that doubt. The distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts has described us as—

> The American people, the brave and just people, who made the immortal Declaration and who maintained it with life and fortune and sacred honor, who established our wonderful Constitution, to whose Monroe doctrine is due the freedom of the American continent from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn, have not changed their character or their principles in the twinkling of an eye under the temptation of any base motive or personal advantage or under the excitement of war. They are subject, doubtless, as all masses of men are subject, however intelligent or however upright, to great waves of passion.
> But their sober second thought is to be trusted. Their deliberate action will be wise and just. The great passions by which they are stirred and by which their judgment is now clouded are generous, noble, and humane. Reason will resume its rightful sway and the great Republic will remain a Republic still.

Therefore let us so demean ourselves that that which he has said of us shall be true.

Mr. President, the American people are too great and free to be unjust. They are too rich and strong to be mean. Justice alone should govern us in our action with the Philippines, so that in the years to come no blush of shame shall be ours. We should now and at once say to those brave men of the Pacific, "Our war with you is not for conquest, but that peace in the islands may be restored; and so soon as peace does come, American duty and honor will be the American policy and the freedom and independence of the Philippine Islands guaranteed, if need be, for all time by American arms." Let it not be said of the American people that they who first wrested freedom from a crown and proved to the world that a people could govern themselves, in the zenith of their greatness, flushed with victory, forgot what liberty meant and the cost at which it was obtained and acted the part of a king.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that upon this resolution and similar ones in regard to the Philippines I wish to submit a few remarks on Tuesday, the 27th instant.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] gave notice a few days ago that on Wednesday (tomorrow) he desired to speak on the various measures relating to the Philippine Islands, but he has been suddenly called away and will not be able to be present to-morrow. I therefore ask leave to state that he will defer making the speech until some other time, of which he will give notice.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the first pension bill on the Calendar.

Mr. NELSON. I do not see the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in his seat, but he agreed to yield to me to ask consent to call up at this time Order of Business No. 408, being the bill (S. 3003) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Rapids Water Power and Boom Company, of Grand Rapids, Minn., to construct a dam and bridge across the Mississippi River," approved February 27, 1899.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go to the Calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the Secretary will state the first pension bill on the Calendar.

ROBERT BLACK.

The bill (S. 62) granting a pension to Robert Black was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "Eighth," to insert "Regiment of;" and in line 7, before the word "Heavy," to insert "Volunteer;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert Black, late a private in Company C of the Eighth Regiment of New York Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Robert Black."

HENRY FRANK.

The bill (S. 1769) granting an increase of pension to Henry Frank was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 7, after the word "Thirty-ninth," to insert "Regiment of;" in the same line, after the word "Illinois," to strike out "Volunteers" and insert "Volunteer Infantry;" and in line 8, after the word "month," to insert "in lieu of the pension he is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject otherwise to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry Frank, late of Company G, Thirty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $15 per month in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to further amend in line 8, after the word "pension," by inserting "at the rate of;" so as to read, "and pay him a pension at the rate of $15 per month," etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

B. H. RANDALL.

The bill (S. 667) granting a pension to B. H. Randall was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of B. H. Randall, late sutler at Fort Ridgely, Minn., during the Sioux Indian outbreak, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. ALLEN January 30, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 667) granting a pension to B. H. Randall, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Senate during the Fifty-fifth Congress, favorably reported by this committee, and passed the Senate.

The report was as follows:

"During the Sioux outbreak in 1862 claimant was a sutler at Fort Ridgely, a military post in Minnesota. This post was attacked by the Indians, and being but inadequately garrisoned, claimant, in company with some twenty other private citizens, was mustered into service, and was put in command of the company thus formed. During the siege claimant rendered good service, and was ordered by the lieutenant commanding to see that the entire roof of the commissary building was covered with earth and sand, in order to prevent its being fired. During the completion of this work claimant suffered a hernia. In addition to the hernia, in consequence of the arduous and unceasing work to which he was subjected, claimant contracted a serious illness, a fever, which has enfeebled him, and from the effects of which he has never recovered.

"The facts in the case are shown by medical and other affidavits.

"There is no general law under which the claimant can apply for pension.

"The bill is reported back with the recommendation that it pass."

Your committee adopt the foregoing report and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of B. H. Randall, late sutler at Fort Ridgely, Minn., during the Sioux Indian outbreak, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID HUNTER.

The bill (S. 645) granting a pension to David Hunter was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "lieutenant," to strike out "and adjutant of the" and insert "and adjutant;" in line 7, before the word "Wisconsin," to strike out "of;" and in line 9, before the word "he," to strike out "the rate" and insert "that;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David Hunter, late first lieutenant and adjutant Thirty-fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to David Hunter."

JERUSHA W. STURGIS.

The bill (S. 677) granting a pension to Jerusha Sturgis, widow of Brig. Gen. Samuel D. Sturgis, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, before the name "Sturgis," to insert the initial "W.;" and in the same line, after the word "of" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "Brig. Gen. Samuel Davis Sturgis, and pay her a pension of $100 per month from and after the passage of this act" and insert "Samuel D. Sturgis, late brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jerusha W. Sturgis, widow of Samuel D. Sturgis, late brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Jerusha W. Sturgis."

ANNIE A. GIBSON.

The bill (S. 2742) restoring to the pension roll the name of Annie A. Gibson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to restore to the pension roll the name of Annie A. Gibson, widow of James Walters, of Company E, Thirty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. EUDORA S. KELLY.

The bill (S. 2220) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. E. S. Kelly was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eudora S. Kelly, widow of James R. Kelly, late captain, Third Artillery, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Eudora S. Kelly."

ANNIE B. GOODRICH.

The bill (S. 1419) to increase the pension of Annie B. Goodrich was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie B. Goodrich, widow of Amos B. Goodrich, late second lieutenant of Company A, Twentieth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $15 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Annie B. Goodrich."

THOMAS JORDAN.

The bill (S. 1228) granting a pension to Thomas Jordan was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "Sixty-third," to insert "Regiment," and in line 7, after the word "him," to strike out "dollars a month" and insert "a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Jordan, late of Company G, Sixty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the sate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Thomas Jordan."

RHODA A. FOSTER.

The bill (S. 239) granting a pension to Rhoda A. Foster was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, after the word "Massachusetts," to strike out "Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension of — dollars a month," and insert "Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Rhoda A. Foster, widow of Albert H. The bill (S. 1266) granting a pension to Jacob Saladin was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "First," to insert "Battalion;" in line 7, after the word "Missouri," to strike out "Battalion," and in the same line, after the word "and," to strike out "rate him at $12 per month" and insert "pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Saladin, late of Company E, First Battalion Gasconade Missouri Home Guards, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH R. BURRELL.

The bill (S. 1268) granting a pension to Sarah R. Burrell, of Wichita, Kans., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah R. Burrell, widow of Andrew J. Burrell, late captain Company A, Fiftieth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Sarah R. Burrell."

FELIX G. SITTON.

The bill (S. 2441) granting a pension to Felix G. Sitton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Felix G. Sitton, late of Company H, First Regiment Doniphan's Missouri Mounted Volunteer Infantry, in war with Mexico, and to pay him a pension of $12 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let "the" be inserted in line 7 before the word "war," so as to read "in the war."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES A. THOMAS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining few minutes be given to Senators to call up bills in which they are interested. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is especially interested in one bill. I ask unanimous consent to that effect, and I hope no Senator will object.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2432) granting an increase of pension to James A. Thomas may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 6, after the word "Company," to fill the blank by inserting the letter "B;" so as to read "Company B."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "thirty-six."

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the amendment will be nonconcurred in and that the amount as originally proposed will be allowed to stand.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA M. EDIE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3017) granting an increase of pension to Julia M. Edie.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia M. Edie, widow of John R. Edie, late captain, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY M'MILLEN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to call up at this time the bill (S. 3129) granting an increase of pension to Henry McMillen.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Henry McMillen, late of Company I, Third Regiment Vermont Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $72 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the time allotted to the committee has expired.

RAILROAD BRIDGES IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 4473 and also House bill 5487, bills providing for bridges across rivers in my State.

Mr. McBRIDE. I desire to state that there was a unanimous-consent agreement that after the expiration of the forty minutes allotted for the consideration of pension bills the unobjected Senate bills on the Calendar should be taken up; and after the bills of the Senator from Louisiana have been disposed of, I shall ask that that agreement be carried out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was such an agreement. The Secretary will read the first bill called up by the Senator from Louisiana.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4473) to authorize the Natchitoches Railway and Construction Company to build and maintain a railway and traffic bridge across Red River at Grand Ecore, in the parish of Natchitoches, State of Louisiana.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 7, page 1, after the word "through," to strike out "their" and insert "its;" so as to read:

That the Natchitoches Railway and Construction Company, a corporation duly incorporated and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain, by itself or through its assignees, a railway and traffic bridge across Red River at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, at Grand Ecore, parish of Natchitoches, State of Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1, page 3, after the word "displayed," to strike out the words "on said bridge;" so as to read:

And if said bridge be constructed as a drawbridge, the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats; and upon whatever kind of bridge is built there shall be displayed, from sunset to sunrise, at the expense of said company, such lights and signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5487) authorizing the construction by the Texarkana, Shreveport and Natchez Railway Company of a bridge across Twelve-mile Bayou, near Shreveport, La.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. 419) amending the act providing for the appointment of a Mississippi River Commission, and so forth, approved June 28, 1879.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to be discourteous, but I hope there can be a time when we can take up the Calendar. I have not yet asked for the consideration of a single bill because we have been upon the Calendar, and I have some matters at the head that have been passed over, I think, eight times.

Mr. VEST. We could do very little with the Calendar now in five minutes. We have been on the Calendar all morning.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to object and I shall not object to the Senator's bill, but I want to observe that I shall have to interpose an objection hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 419) amending the act providing for the appointment of a Mississippi River Commission, and so forth, approved June 28, 1879.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act by adding thereto the following section:

SEC. 8. That the headquarters and general offices of said commission shall be located at some city or town on the Mississippi River, to be designated by the Secretary of War, and the meetings of the commission shall be held at said headquarters and general offices, the times of said meetings to be fixed by the president of the commission, who shall cause due notice of such meetings to be given members of the commission and the public.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WYOMING STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous agreement the Calendar will be taken up now.

The bill (S. 200) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home was announced as first in order on the Calendar; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to grant 50,000 acres of the unappropriated nonmineral public lands within the State of Wyoming unto the State, to be selected by the proper authorities thereof, to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home. But such portion of the granted lands as may not be found necessary for the purpose specified shall be applied to the support of such public, benevolent, reformatory, or other educational institution as the legislature of the State may designate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I ask that the report which accompanied the bill (S. 200) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in the continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home may be printed in the RECORD in connection with the passage of the bill this morning. I intended to make that request at the time, but my attention was diverted for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The report, submitted by Mr. NELSON January 22, 1900, is as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 200) granting to the State of Wyoming 50,000 acres of land to aid in continuation, enlargement, and maintenance of the Wyoming State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, having considered the same, beg to report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

That such an institution deserves support must be admitted. No National Soldiers' Home is situated anywhere near the Wyoming State Home. A thousand miles or more of expensive, fatiguing travel must be taken by a Wyoming veteran to reach the nearest regular Government Home. The altitude of Wyoming at the points most thickly settled is from 6,000 to 8,500 feet, and to change the old and feeble from the high, dry climate to a lower and more humid one is usually injurious.

The men who are becoming inmates of the Wyoming Home are those who spent their best years in other parts of the United States. They not only offered their lives in defense of the country's flag, but for many years after the war they were busy with the upbuilding of other Commonwealths. Wyoming being a new State, and that locality containing no white man's settlement for many years after the war, she necessarily received these veterans in the declining years of their lives. Nevertheless, that State, with commendable benevolence, has established a home and appropriates every year for its maintenance. It is true the Government pays the regulation sum ($100 per capita per annum), but in that sparsely settled country, higher cost of living, and a not large number of regular inmates, the expense bears too heavily on that young State, where the United States Government owns in public lands, Indian and military reservations, over fifty-seven and one-half million acres out of a total sixty-two and one-half million acres of the State's surface, and therefore on the over 87½ per cent of all its land no tax can be collected because of Government ownership.

Wyoming has received no donations of swamp lands, as have many of the older States, and her total acreage under the act of admission was much less than one-half of what Congress granted to the State next admitted in the Union at a later date, though the State later admitted had but about four-fifths of Wyoming's area.

The whole of Wyoming is within the arid belt, and the lands can not be productive without irrigation. The nonmineral and nonforest lands are worthless without irrigation excepting for grazing, and the sparse, thin grass requires a great many acres to support each single head of live stock. Therefore the land is worth virtually nothing, or but a few cents an acre, until its reclamation. The value to the United States of this grant of land is almost nil, and would be so to the State except as it is improved and utilized. The State, in selecting these lands for grazing near to the ranches of homesteaders and in selecting pieces worthless in themselves, but which in connecting up with the other lands settled upon and to be settled upon, will render irrigation and reclamation possible, and therefore be ultimately of value to the State and bring a considerable income to the Soldiers' Home.

On the other hand, the Government secures through the selection of these lands, not exceeding a section in a place, and their occupancy by lessors, the improvement of the Government's remaining lands, not only through the general development and settlement of the country but by bringing them near to irrigating ditches which have been or may be constructed and from which water can be procured for a portion of the lands.

In this way the proposed grant, while slightly lessening the 87½ per cent of the United States ownership in Wyoming and increasing slightly the 12½ per cent owned by the State and the settlers, will really add to the value of the Government's holdings. The State, while receiving but little income from rental at first, may increase that income later, and thus in some degree will provision be made for the increasing expenses for care and maintenance of aged soldiers and sailors.

Wyoming, in its constitution, which Congress incorporated in the law admitting the State, provides fully for the protection of these lands, and so do the laws later enacted. A full land board was provided for and every necessary restriction seems to have been made.

The article on public lands and donations reads as follows:

"The State of Wyoming hereby agrees to accept the grants of lands heretofore made or that may be hereafter made by the United States to the State for educational purposes, for public buildings and institutions, and for other objects, and donations of money, with the conditions and limitations that may be imposed by the act or acts of Congress making such grants or donations. Such lands shall be disposed of only at public auction to the highest responsible bidder, after having been duly appraised by the land commissioners, at not less than three-fourths of the appraised value thereof, and for not less than $10 per acre: Provided, That in case of actual and bona fide settlement and improvement thereon at the time of the adoption of this constitution such actual settler shall have the preference right to purchase the land whereon he may have settled, not exceeding 160 acres, at a sum not less than the appraised value thereof, and in making such appraisement the value of improvements shall not be taken into consideration. If at any time hereafter the United States shall grant any arid lands in the State to the State on the condition that the State reclaim and dispose of them to actual settlers, the legislature shall be authorized to accept such arid lands on such conditions, or other conditions, if the same are practicable and reasonable.

"The proceeds from the sale and rental of all lands and other property donated, granted, or received, or that may hereafter be donated, granted, or received from the United States, or any other source, shall be inviolably appropriated and applied to the specific purposes specified in the original grant or gifts."

Other sections follow equally protective on the one hand and preventive on the other. The laws of Wyoming seem to cover every contingency, the intent being made plain that State lands shall be selected only for the beneficiary named in the act making the donation.

As donated lands, with rare exceptions, never reach the value of $10 per acre, they are not sold, but remain the property of the State and are leased under carefully guarded rules and regulations.

Of the many provisions of Wyoming's land law we quote as follows:

"The board may lease any legal subdivision of the lands of the State at an annual rental not less than 5 per cent on the valuation thereof, fixed by the board, except as hereinafter provided.

"State lands may be leased for periods of not more than five years.

"All water rights which shall have become appurtenant to the lands leased aforesaid shall, upon the expiration of the leases thereto given to the lessee who made the irrigation and improvements thereto, become the property of the State."

Wyoming's total acreage was reported on June 30, 1897, by the Secretary of the Interior as 62,433,000 acres, of which only 4,925,415 acres had been appropriated; of the remainder, 8,166,002 acres were in reservations—Indian, military, etc.—while 49,341,583 acres were reported as vacant public lands. Granted to Wyoming for all purposes, 668,000 acres.

Referring to swamp lands, the same report records as donated swamp lands to that date—

	Acres.
Florida	22,247,502
Louisiana	11,769,450
Arkansas	8,656,372
Michigan	7,290,150
Minnesota	4,949,278
Missouri	4,843,676
Iowa	4,570,172
Wisconsin	4,560,712
Illinois	3,981,784
Mississippi	3,604,471
California	1,889,377
Indiana	1,377,727

and various other States smaller amounts. Not one of the above, excepting California, is as large in area as Wyoming, while most of the States to which these grants were made have but one-half to one-third as much area as Wyoming.

The arid lands in Wyoming must be reclaimed to be of value, much the same as swamp lands require reclamation. In one case there was too much water, and too little in the other.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF INDIAN WARS.

The bill (S. 340) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892, was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. That bill has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read through. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are amendments of the committee to be acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Pensions will be stated in their order.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the word "military," insert the word "State;" so as to read:

That the act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, amended and extended so as to include the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men who served for thirty days or more and were honorably discharged under the United States military, State, Territorial, or provisional authorities in the Florida and Georgia Seminole Indian war of 1817 and 1818.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, after the words "eighteen hundred and fifty-eight," insert the word "inclusive;" so as to read:

The Florida wars with the Seminole Indians from 1842 to 1858, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 20, page 2, after the words "eighteen hundred and fifty-three," to insert the word "inclusive;" so as to read:

The Utah Indian disturbances of 1850 to 1853, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the bill, to insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That all contracts heretofore made between the beneficiaries under this act and pension attorneys and claim agents are hereby declared null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT PEMBINA MILITARY RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are we going on with the Calendar regularly?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I trust the Senator will not interpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, I am not going to interfere at all.

The bill (S. 157) providing for the selection of the lands within Fort Pembina Military Reservation, N. Dak., by the State of North Dakota was announced as next in order.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask the Senator in charge of this bill if there is any objection to making the provision general, making lands within abandoned military reservations subject to be selected to satisfy grants made to States where they are located within the State?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I must call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the hour of 2 o'clock has about arrived.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Of course I knew if there was to be any discussion of the bill it would have to go over. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, I will postpone my answer to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

JOHN M. GUYTON.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has asked me to yield to him for the purpose of enabling him to have a bill passed, and I have agreed to do so if it takes no debate.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will take no debate, I am sure, because it has already passed the Senate twice before, and I am only anxious to get it on its way to passage through the other House. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1017) for the relief of John M. Guyton.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay $484.79 to John M. Guyton, former postmaster at Blacksburg, S. C., being the amount deposited by him to cover a deficiency arising in his office in the year 1890, which deposit was made to meet a loss by the embezzlement of a clerk on or about the 30th day of January, 1890, without blame or fault on the part of John M. Guyton.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I have also consented to yield to the junior Senator from Minnesota on the same terms. I hope that I shall not be asked to yield to any others.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to have a local bill relating to a matter in Minnesota placed on its passage. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3003) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Rapids Water Power and Boom Company, of Grand Rapids, Minn., to construct a dam and bridge across the Mississippi River," approved February 27, 1899.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 3 of the act so as to read:

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void unless said dam herein authorized be commenced within two years and completed within four years from the date hereof.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shou d like to make an inquiry. Has this bill passed the approval of the War Department?

Mr. NELSON. It has been approved by the War Department. It is recommended by the Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. For what purpose has the Senator risen?

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1175) to grant lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Alabama, for negroes, and the State Normal College, at Florence, Ala.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield if the bill which the Senator desires to have passed requires no discussion.

Mr. PETTUS. It will require none, sir.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama—I do not know whether he understood me—that if the bill the Senator desires to call up for consideration or passage requires no discussion, I have no objection to yielding.

Mr. PETTUS. I understand you, sir, perfectly. The bill is one that passed the last Senate and has received the unanimous report of the committee of this Senate. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1175) to grant lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Alabama, for negroes, and the State Normal College, at Florence, Ala., which has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, after line 12, page 2, to strike out the proviso in the following words:

And provided further, That this grant to the State Normal College shall be in full settlement and payment for all property belonging to said State Normal College, or its predecessors, destroyed by Federal troops during the war, and shall be received by said State Normal College in full satisfaction of all such claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to make two or three little formal amendments to the bill. On page 11, line 22, I move to strike out the words "ayes and noes" and insert "yeas and nays;" and in line 23, same page, I move to strike out "ayes and noes" and insert "yeas and nays." That is the form that is used in this country more particularly.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 18, line 22, I move to strike out "ayes and noes" and to insert "yeas and nays," and wherever those words occur I desire that they should be stricken out and the words "yeas and nays" inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I move the same amendment on page 19, lines 22 and 23.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). This bill is in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There was an amendment passed over.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to offer an amendment in section 10, line 22, page 7, after the word "contracts," by inserting "except contracts for labor entered into since Hawaii was annexed to the United States." I desire to except all labor contracts which have been entered into since the Territory was annexed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 10, on page 7, line 22, after the word "contracts," it is proposed to insert "except contracts for labor entered into since Hawaii was annexed to the United States."

Mr. NELSON. I will briefly state the object of the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that, instead of the expression, "since Hawaii was annexed to the United States," he adopt the date which has been adopted in this bill, August 12, 1898.

Mr. NELSON. Very well; that is satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, section 10, line 22, after the word "contracts," it is proposed to insert "except contracts for labor entered into since August 12, 1898."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. On page 23, in section 55, line 8, I move to insert:

Nor shall any such bonds or indebtedness be incurred until approved by the President of the United States.

This bill provides that 3 per cent upon municipal assets may be issued in the way of bonds—not exceeding 3 per cent. Three per cent is a very large indebtedness, and our experience in Missouri has been so fearful about municipal indebtedness that I am always anxious to curtail the power as much as possible. The people of Missouri to-day pay $20,000,000 on fraudulent bonds issued by county courts under old charters, which nobody had paid any attention to, for railroads that never were constructed and never will be constructed, and there is no more possibility of their being constructed than there is of me carrying off this Capitol. Under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Iowa cases, any bonds issued by lawful authority and negotiated before maturity to an innocent holder for value assume the status of commercial paper and must be paid.

Mr. CULLOM. Do I understand that the bonds are not to be issued beyond a certain per cent?

Mr. VEST. The percentage is already fixed in the bill at 3 per cent.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator mean by that that no indebtedness shall be incurred without the approval of the President or beyond such an amount?

Mr. VEST. I say "any such indebtedness." That retains the limitation of 3 per cent. I think that is too much. I think it ought to be 2 per cent. Any such indebtedness or loan, I assume, would retain the limitation of 3 per cent.

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to accept that amendment, so far as I am individually concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, on page 23, line 8, at the end of section 10, after the word "thereof," the words "nor shall any such bonds or indebtedness be incurred until approved by the President of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I offer an amendment to section 10, page 8, line 7, after the word "offenses," to insert "except for violation of labor contracts." The clause if so amended will read:

All offenses which by statute then in force were punishable as offenses, except for violation of labor contracts, against the republic of Hawaii shall be punishable as offenses against the government of the Territory of Hawaii.

It is to prevent the enforcement by criminal punishment or to prevent criminal punishment for the mere violation of labor contracts.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator that all the laws of Hawaii relating to punishment predicated upon labor contracts are repealed by this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. In so many words.

Mr. MORGAN. They are all repealed.

Mr. CULLOM. I have the penal laws of Hawaii in my hand, and that particular provision in the repealing section repeals all of the statutes pertaining to labor, servants, masters, etc.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would state that to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield, of course.

Mr. HALE. I thought we were considering the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. We are.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would state for our benefit the theory upon which this bill proceeds as to the entire question of contracts for labor. The situation is and has been peculiar in Hawaii and in marked contrast to our conditions here. I have not been able to find—because I have not examined the volumes of the statutes referred to—just what is the theory of the committee with reference to this subject, and what the bill contains and carries.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, to begin with, as I stated yesterday, there are about 40,000 laborers in those islands, about half of whom are supposed to be under contract, and who were brought there under contract.

Mr. HALE. Under existing contracts?

Mr. CULLOM. Under contracts now existing in the republic, so called. This bill goes upon the theory that when the labor laws of the United States are extended over these islands by the passage of this bill nothing more can occur in the way of the importation of contract labor. Then, in addition to that, we go forward and repeal all the penal laws which justify the punishment in any way of a violation of labor contracts. So that, as the committee think, and as I think, the whole question is put beyond the control of the islands in undertaking to make any further labor contracts.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, what troubled me was the repeal of all legislation which punishes the violation of the labor-contract provisions. As I understand the Senator, the bill proceeds upon this proposition, that there shall be no future contracts for the importation of foreign labor.

Mr. CULLOM. There can not be after our laws are extended over the islands.

Mr. HALE. The operation of this bill is to extend our laws, which provide, just as they do for Illinois or for Maine, that there shall be no importation of foreign labor by contract.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And those laws which make that provision also provide punishments for their violation. The Senator does not mean that there is anything in this bill which prevents the operation of the penal force of our laws or permits any violation of the labor-contract laws that we have.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly not. We have just adopted a provision which I offered here—as I stated yesterday, and I desired to do so specifically—requiring by this bill that all prosecutions for violation of labor contracts should be prohibited. In addition to that, we repeal all the local laws which in any way authorize such things.

Mr. HALE. All prosecutions not for the violation of labor laws, but labor contracts, so that they can not be enforced.

Mr. CULLOM. They can not be enforced.

Mr. HALE. Now, what does the Senator believe is the condition of the contracts which are now subsisting?

Mr. CULLOM. That raises a constitutional question, I might say, as to whether Congress or any other body can legislate rightfully, thereby invalidating a civil contract.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No doubt they can.

Mr. HALE. I think they can; but does this bill attempt to do that?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No, it does not.

Mr. HALE. Then this bill excludes that in so many words.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I so understand. This bill in terms permits those contracts to exist and to run until they expire. Now, from the Senator's examination, what does he think is the actual operation of existing contracts for labor upon persons who have been brought in under those contracts, as to what numbers and what time, and how long they will continue? I do not know anything about that myself.

Mr. CULLOM. Those contracts run usually, I think, three years. That is my impression; but after the passage of this bill, the repeal of the laws authorizing labor contracts to be made, and the prohibition of an attempt to punish anyone for violating such contracts, what the result will be I do not know; but my judgment is it will result in the entire abolition of the contract system there.

Mr. HALE. The Senator believes that. Then, certainly in not more than three years it will all pass away.

Mr. CULLOM. My judgment is that it will pass away in less than one year, because they can not enforce such contracts by punishment as they have been doing heretofore. So I think in a very short time the result will be that the contract laborers in those islands will be a thing of the past.

Mr. HALE. The Senator thinks that it is practically abolished by this bill?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator read the laws which are repealed?

Mr. CULLOM. If I should read all the laws which are repealed by this bill, I would be reading nearly all day.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I mean the penal laws with regard to the punishment of contract labor.

Mr. CULLOM. I have the chapter here before me. Here is the chapter with the title "Masters and servants." I shall not undertake to read all of that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is repealed.

Mr. CULLOM. A part of that is repealed, I see. Here is one of the provisions:

TO REGULATE CONTRACTS BETWEEN MASTERS AND SERVANTS.

SEC. 1368. All contracts for service between masters and servants, where only one of the parties is a native Hawaiian, shall be written or printed in both the Hawaiian and English languages. No such contracts shall have any effect in law when executed in one language only: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to prevent any such contracts being written or printed in the Hawaiian language only where both parties thereto are native Hawaiians.

SEC. 1369. The minister of the interior is hereby authorized to prepare, in both languages, printed forms of contract, as provided for in the foregoing section, in blank as to place, time, and service, wages, name, place where engaged, and place of residence.

SEC. 1370. Every contract for service authorized by section 1382 shall, in order to its validity, be acknowledged by the master or his duly empowered agent, and the servant before the agent to take acknowledgments of contracts, as hereinafter provided, and the certificate of acknowledgment shall be substantially as follows:

And so it goes on here for pages.

By this proposed law we will wipe that entirely out, so that there will be no statute in the Territory of Hawaii that pertains to the importation of labor or labor contracts such as we understand to be now in existence.

Mr. TILLMAN. But if the Senator will permit me, do not the penalties attaching to the breaking of a labor contract still obtain? Are they not left?

Mr. SPOONER. They are eliminated by the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TILLMAN. If you will read it, you will see that they are not eliminated.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not hear it read distinctly.

Mr. TILLMAN. They apply to contracts made since the islands have been in our possession, and not all the time.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] will allow me a moment, I want to say to him that the amendment I offered can do no harm. It covers the exact case which he intends to reach. Here is the phraseology of the bill, commencing in line 5, on page 8:

All offenses which by statute then in force—

That means in August, 1898—

were punishable as offenses against the republic of Hawaii shall be punishable as offenses against the government of the Territory of Hawaii, unless such statute is inconsistent with this act or shall be repealed or changed by law.

It may be that your repeal covers the case; but should there be any question about it, it will do no harm to insert this clause, as I suggested, after the word "offenses," in line 5; so that it will read:

All offenses except for the violation of labor contracts.

There can be no harm in that, and it "makes assurance double sure" on this point.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to say a word to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. If the statute which defines the crime and provides the penalty is repealed, then how can it be in force?

Mr. NELSON. That may be true, technically.

Mr. MONEY. It is absolutely so.

Mr. NELSON. I have not had time to examine it.

Mr. MONEY. All of those statutes are repealed by this bill. If a part of a statute falls, everything else goes with it.

Mr. NELSON. Is the Senator sure that the repeal will affect all of those laws?

Mr. MONEY. They are named by sections in the bill itself; and if the Senator will compare that—I suppose he has the penal statutes of Hawaii before him, has he not?

Mr. NELSON. No; I have not.

Mr. MONEY. I thought perhaps the Senator had a copy of the penal statutes. He will find that those statutes are repealed by this bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think they are.

Mr. MONEY. If they are repealed, there can be no offense and no punishment; and therefore the amendment would be entirely unnecessary.

Mr. CULLOM. The committee thought and believed that the bill had been so framed that it would get rid entirely of the contract-labor system which has prevailed in Hawaii.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Chapter 78, if the Senator will permit me, which relates to masters and servants, reads:

If any person lawfully bound to service shall willfully absent himself from such service, without the leave of his master, any district magistrate of the republic, upon complaint made, under oath by the master or by anyone on his behalf, may issue a warrant to apprehend such person and bring him before the said magistrate; and if the complaint shall be maintained, the magistrate shall order such offender to be restored to his master, and he shall be compelled to serve the remainder of the time for which he originally contracted.

That has all been repealed, and those were the objectionable features, as I understand.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 6 of the bill the Senator will find that chapter 78, in relation to masters and servants, will be repealed by the passage of this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. But, if the Senator from Illinois will permit me, while they repeal those statutes which are for the punishment of contract laborers who break their contracts, section 10 provides that "all obligations, contracts, rights of action, suits at law," etc., shall be continued as effectually as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Those are contracts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not a contract for labor a contract?

Mr. FORAKER. That has been amended.

Mr. CULLOM. I proposed yesterday the following amendment:

Provided, That no contract for labor or personal service shall be enforced either by injunction or by legal process.

Mr. TILLMAN. That applies to all contracts. Make it a little more sweeping, so as to apply either before or after annexation.

Mr. CULLOM. It applies back to the beginning of time, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HALE. It applies to all contracts that are subsisting at the time of the passage of this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. To all contracts.

Mr. HALE. Yes. Is that in the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. It is in an amendment which I propose, and which I referred to yesterday.

Mr. TILLMAN. You have not put it in the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. No; it is not in the bill, but I will offer it.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if we do not by this bill confirm some labor contracts?

Mr. CULLOM. I think not.

Mr. SPOONER. Are there none entered into prior to 1898 still in force?

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose there are. I do not know about that; but if any Senator can draw an amendment which will close out those contract-labor importations and the enforcement of such contracts afterwards, and show that his proposition is constitutional, I shall be glad to vote for it.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not any doubt about the constitutionality of it. The inhibition against the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts is upon the States. It is not quite enough to eliminate punishment by the court after the fashion of the violation of some criminal act. The provisions themselves may be of a character which are offensive to our sense of what is just and what is right. That is what led me to ask the Senator if we are expressly affirming here and continuing any alien-labor contracts in Hawaii; and if so, to what extent? I wanted to follow that question by another, which perhaps I have not any need to ask, as to the general character of these contracts.

Mr. HALE. The statute covers that.

Mr. SPOONER. No; it does not.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a document which shows that. I have it not on my table at present, but I can get it in a little while. It shows copies of numbers of contracts, the exact contracts in letter and terms. I have not that here, but I will furnish it to the Senator, so that he can see exactly what the terms of the contracts are.

Mr. SPOONER. My recollection of these contracts, growing out of the debates on the annexation of Hawaii, is that they were brutal contracts that would not be tolerated at all in this country.

Mr. TILLMAN. Here are some provisions which are on a par with the black codes of some of the Southern States, and you gentlemen of the Republican party are in honor bound not to leave the people of Hawaii in the same condition in which the former slaveholders wanted to put their ex-slaves. If it is intended to repeal the provisions regarding these contracts and to annul them, why not say expressly that the contracts for labor heretofore existing, punitive in their character, are annulled, so as to make assurance double sure that you do not intend to leave those people over there in slavery?

Mr. CULLOM. That is just what we are trying to do, if the Senator will take notice. In the amendment which I propose to offer it is provided that no contract for labor or personal service shall be enforced. That comes pretty near annulling such contracts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Where does that come in?

Mr. CULLOM. I propose to offer it at the end of section 10, which is the section which proposes to keep alive all obligations, contracts, rights of actions, etc., as Hawaii passes from one form of government to another. I inquire of the Senator from South Carolina whether he does not think that amendment would accomplish just what he wants?

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator indicate where he proposes to put his amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. At the end of section 10.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will offer the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I will move to add to section 10 the following:

Provided, That no contract for labor or personal service shall be enforced either by injunction or other legal process.

Mr. NELSON. You ought to insert "criminal process."

Mr. CULLOM. This refers to any legal process. If the Senator thinks he can help the amendment or strengthen it in any way, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would that forbid a citizen to bring a civil suit against a person violating an ordinary contract for labor?

Mr. CULLOM. It is a question with me whether that does not go so far as to interfere with civil contracts which are legitimate. There ought to be some way of enforcing contracts other than by imprisonment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator mean contracts for labor made before the person contracted for arrived in that Territory?

Mr. CULLOM. I mean contracts growing out of the importation of those men to that country.

Mr. HAWLEY. That can be easily defined, so as to leave all innocent contracts under the law.

Mr. HALE. In other words, the Senator proposes to leave the contracts as civil contracts existing and to strike out all penal regulations and laws for enforcing them.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. Is not that so?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The effect of the Senator's amendment is, I think, to prevent the enforcement by law of all contracts in the islands relating to labor.

Mr. HALE. Any kind of enforcement, not only the penal provisions and punishments, but a civil suit or a civil process can not be maintained.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Well, that in effect abolishes it in toto, does it not?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think it goes too far.

Mr. CULLOM. As I said a while ago, my judgment is that if we repeal the penal provisions affecting such contracts the result will be that the whole business will break down, because it can not be enforced.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator leave standing?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator leaves, then, all in the bill, in the hope that the insertion of a provision preventing criminal prosecutions for violating contracts is all that is necessary to be done by Congress.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, if I can have the attention of the Senator from Maine, it is proposed, at the end of page 8, to insert:

Provided, That no contract for labor or personal service shall be enforced either by injunction or other legal process.

If that means simply that no action shall be brought to compel a laborer to perform his contract either by injunction or application for specific performance, I do not know that I have any objection to it; but if it goes so far as to prevent an employer bringing a suit against a person who may have entered into a contract for labor to recover damages, I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator read that again?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut.

Provided, That no contract for labor or personal service shall be enforced either by injunction or other legal process.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that, in connection with the repeal of the penal provision, is extirpation of the whole thing, is it not? Does it not go to the root?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It does.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me it does.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know but that it goes too far.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me it is extirpation of the whole thing, and there is under that proviso no process that anybody on the other side can invoke in criminal form, or any injunction or by suit for breach of contract, for damages.

Mr. CULLOM. I appreciate that, but it seems difficult to adopt an amendment that goes far enough and does not go too far. I think myself, and I believe everybody will agree, that if a business man, for instance, in this country or in Honolulu, makes a contract with another citizen there to perform work, building a house or what not, if the man does not do it the other man ought to have the right to bring a suit against him, and I do not know but that this would interfere with that. If it does, it would go too far. If not, it does just what I want to have done.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the committee intended that it should apply only to contract-labor matters, affecting the importation of foreign outside labor, and nothing more than that.

Mr. CULLOM. I am satisfied to have that adopted, and if on further investigation it seems to go too far, we can modify it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Read it again.

Mr. HOAR. Have it read at the desk.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he change it to "criminal prosecution," so as to limit it to injunction and criminal prosecution. That would leave the matter of the validity of the contracts to stand.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment which is being discussed more or less referring to contract labor is as follows——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; it does not refer to that.

Mr. CULLOM. It does not refer to it in so many words, but the purpose of this amendment, while its phraseology may not exactly state it, is to prevent a criminal prosecution against a violator of a contract after he is brought into Honolulu from Japan, if you please, under a contract, and then violates it. We do not want him sent to jail.

Mr. HALE. It goes much further than that.

Mr. CULLOM. We do not want him prosecuted.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator was going to have the amendment read at the desk or read it himself, as he prefers.

Mr. CULLOM. I will read it myself. It is proposed to add to section 10:

Provided, That no contract for labor or personal service shall be enforced either by injunction or other legal process.

Mr. HALE. Why do you not say contract for foreign labor?

Mr. CULLOM. It means about the same thing, because they are all pretty much foreign who are laborers there.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. While in the islands investigating the question of labor, did the commission hear any testimony as to the abuse of contract laborers, the manner in which labor was performed, and the penalties imposed for violations of their contracts? I should also like to inquire if they ascertained whether there were any large contracts for the construction of canals or railroads or aqueducts on the islands. We made every effort in the last session to extend to the islands our laws relating to contract labor and immigration, and it failed by reason of an objection upon this floor near the closing hours of the session. It is a notorious fact that since Congress adjourned many thousands of laborers have been brought into the islands of the Hawaiian group under contract for labor. I certainly think this amendment should be so framed that there can be no ambiguity whatever in its language and so that it will not require a judicial body to construe its meaning.

Both of the Senators on this floor who are members of the commission are thoroughly conversant with these great abuses, and I trust they will so formulate the amendment that there can be no question or doubt about it.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois this phrase, which I think will accomplish all Senators desire and which goes as far as we ought to go:

Provided, That there shall be no remedy for the specific performance of any contract for labor, and that the failure to comply with the same shall not be punished criminally.

Those are the things you want to do, leaving an ordinary action for damages for breach of contract.

Mr. HALE. Would the Senator make that apply to general contracts for labor?

Mr. HOAR. I think so.

Mr. HALE. Not only foreign labor, but ordinary contracts?

Mr. HOAR. We lived in Massachusetts without any remedy to compel the specific performance of ordinary labor contracts down to within a very few years, and I suppose they did in most of the other States.

Mr. HALE. A contract for labor sometimes involves a large transaction, like the building of structures.

Mr. HOAR. That is not a contract for labor.

Mr. HALE. It may be.

Mr. HOAR. Say "personal service."

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that the committee intends to go into that large domain of regulating contracts and controversies about labor outside of foreign contract labor.

Mr. CULLOM. That is all.

Mr. HALE. Why not, then, limit this by terms so that it shall only apply to the subject the committee intend to take up, and not take up that larger domain the Senator from Massachusetts suggests, which we have not had up? Let it apply only to contracts for labor.

Mr. HOAR. I have an impression that we have passed, certainly through the Senate, and I think through both Houses, a general domestic statute containing that provision so far as the United States courts go. I do not believe, in other words, that it is expedient that labor contracts shall be enforced by specific performance. Any other contract where specific performance is enforced is discharged by the payment of a sum of money, by the making of a deed of conveyance, or something of that kind, but holding a man to labor or service by law is repugnant to the genius of our institutions, whether it be holding him to the labor or service of a slave or any other form. In the description of slavery in our Constitution by a euphemism they avoided the term "slave" or "slaveholding" or "slaveholder," and the Constitution speaks of it as a person held to labor or service.

Now, when the immigrant comes over from a foreign country and gets to Hawaii, he is to a certain extent rather helpless if he has made an improvident contract. It is taking the body for the supreme court to say to a man, "You go and work for A B on his farm and stay there six months." It seems to me that wherever we have the legislative power we should say that the right of a man to himself shall not be interfered with by law in consequence of any alleged or any actual contract. You may come upon him for damages, if you can, but you shall not take him by the ear and lead him out to a day's work under the order of any court.

I will take the responsibility of moving the amendment I propose, and let the Senate do with it as it pleases. I move to insert:

Provided, That no proceeding shall be maintained for the specific performance of any contract for labor or service, and there shall be no criminal proceeding for the breach thereof.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Illinois will accept that amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I will accept it, so far as I am concerned.

Several SENATORS. Say "personal labor."

Mr. HOAR. Insert the word "personal," so as to read "personal labor." I intended to put that in.

Mr. CULLOM. Question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. My amendment is to insert the following words——

Mr. SPOONER. On what page?

Mr. NELSON. On page 8. I think, however, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will cover it, and if that is adopted mine will be unnecessary.

Mr. CULLOM. Withdraw it.

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw the amendment if the other amendment is to be adopted. I withdraw it for the time being at least.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Illinois has accepted my amendment to his amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I accept the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. HALE. Let that as finally modified and offered by the Senator from Massachusetts be read, stating where it comes in.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed at the end of section 10 to insert:

Provided, That no proceeding shall be maintained for the specific performance of any contract for personal labor or service, and there shall be no criminal proceeding for the breach thereof.

Mr. HALE. Certainly that goes very far. It goes a great way beyond what the committee contemplated. It does not in any way confine itself to the evil which the committee sought to remedy, the continuance of contract labor and the enforcement of those contracts. That, I take it, was the only subject with which the committee intended to deal.

Mr. CULLOM. It was the only subject it seemed to be necessary to deal with in connection with labor, so far as we heard over there. Hence it was that we desired to break up the importation of laborers and contracts with laborers.

Mr. HALE. That, of course, is foreign imported labor.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Now, the Senator from Illinois accepts this amendment to the amendment, and I think the Senate ought to understand that it is incorporating a very far-reaching, a very wide provision, touching not only labor imported by contract, which we have forbidden here and mean to forbid in Hawaii hereafter, but contracts touching any kind of business that involves personal labor. It declares that no proceeding shall be instituted to enforce it. I think that is the language. What is the language?

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon. I suggested to the Senator's ear, "No." I said it not with reference to his statement, but his language was "any kind of business that involves personal labor."

Mr. HALE. That has been accepted. "Personal" has been incorporated.

Mr. HOAR. "Anything that involves personal labor" is not the language.

Mr. HALE. Let us have it exact.

Mr. HOAR. "Any contract for personal labor."

Mr. HALE. Any contract that involves personal labor, and no proceeding——

Mr. HOAR. The words "involving personal labor" are not there.

Mr. HALE. Well, for the enforcement of any contract for personal labor. It would apply to any large contract.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

Mr. HALE. As a Senator suggests to me, it would apply not simply to a contract of a day laborer to perform work upon any building or any farm or any estate, but a contract for larger services, for the superintendency of an estate, of a plantation, of a mill.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Maine allow me?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me one word here?

Mr. SPOONER. I thought the Senator from Maine yielded to me.

Mr. HALE. I yield to all.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Maine misapprehends the effect of the amendment. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is simply to prevent the enforcement of certain contracts by specific performance and to prevent criminal prosecution. That is exactly the law all over the country, in every State in this Union. It has always been so. You can never enforce by specific performance a contract for personal labor in any case, from the President of the United States down to the commonest laborer. Neither can you prosecute it criminally. This leaves the law, I want to say to the Senator from Maine, just as it is in respect to remedies for breach of civil contracts. That is all.

Mr. HALE. I understand. I do not know so well as the Senator from Minnesota that there are not anywhere in any State provisions or laws or decisions which authorize the enforcement of a specific contract for labor of any kind. Certainly this strikes all that out, and I think Senators should understand that it is a very wide-reaching, far-stretching provision. It may be right. It may be that other States have such laws. I do not think we have in Maine. But it ought to be understood how far this provision does go.

There are plenty of things in this bill I can see as plain as day that will come up to perplex us hereafter. The relations are new. It is bringing into our system something about which none of us have any knowledge or experience—the application of laws to these people, the sustaining and upholding of certain other laws of theirs in part and making them remain in the future. All the complications in this bill, as I look at it and as I hear discussion upon it, grow in my mind, and I am afraid we will find, with all the care the committee has bestowed upon it and the scrutiny which Senators have given it, that when we get through in operation we will find a bill that will come back to trouble us in a great many ways, and that we are going very far in certain directions and not far enough in certain other directions. Therefore I call attention to this provision, which may be all right. It may be all right that every kind of contract involving personal labor shall only be enforced by a suit for damages; but everybody knows that a suit of that kind in most cases is of no avail and has nothing on which it can base a judgment. But it may be better to apply it here. We ought to understand it, of course, and I think we do understand the extent of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, as is very well known, I have not been in favor of undertaking the government of subject populations, and all the reflection I have given to the matter increases my opinion that it is not desirable, either for such populations or for us, that we should do it. But I am in favor of giving a code of laws to a people whom I hope and expect some time may become a prosperous and strong American State; and it seems to me that when we are legislating for Hawaii, in regard to which I have such a hope and expectation, we ought, when we deal with any subject, to make our legislation perfect as far as possible in that particular.

Now, if it be sound public policy, in the judgment of the Senate, to prohibit a court from ordering anybody, humble or not humble, to be taken by the power of a sheriff or a marshal and led out to his work in the morning and sent back, not exactly like a galley slave scourged to his dungeon, but sent back, confined and bound and held in duress, I can not for the life of me see why that doctrine ought not to be applied now to the island of Hawaii by proper enactment while we are dealing with the specific subject. They are not going to make a law on the subject this year or next year. We are making a code which involves other large relations, and we are going to say something in that code about the legal remedy on contracts to labor. We have the subject up. The question is, having the subject up, whether we shall do the work or only half do the work. I am in favor of doing the work and not stopping when we have half done it. As the Senator from Minnesota has so well said, we are only enacting in this code what other States, some of which have codes and some have not, have for their law now.

Mr. CULLOM. Question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois as modified by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed at the end of section 10 to insert the following:

Provided, That no proceeding shall be maintained for the specific performance of any contract for personal labor or service, and there shall be no criminal proceeding for the breach thereof.

Mr. HALE. Would that description, no "contract for personal labor," cover the contracts that the committee originally intended to provide for—foreign labor? I do not know enough about it to know whether they are made with the persons who labor or whether they are made with parties who agree to furnish contract labor. In providing on the general ground that the Senator stated so strongly, I should not want to have this enacted and find that there slipped out the very provision that we started to put in affecting contracts for imported foreign labor. I do not know whether the contracts are made with those persons or with agents.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I have before me a document containing a contract.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Illinois knows about that.

Mr. CULLOM. I will read a contract.

Mr. HALE. Read a portion of it.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN JACOB COERPER AND CERTAIN JAPANESE WORKMEN.

This agreement made and entered into this 16th day of February, A. D. 1898, by and between Jacob Coerper, party of the first part, of Kahului, North Kona, Hawaii, and Koroyama (k), Yakoyama (k), Iwata (k), and Takista (k), of the second part, of Kahului 2, North Kona aforesaid, witnesseth:

That the said parties have agreed and do agree by these presents as follows: The said parties of the second part will plant and properly cultivate under and by the advice of said party of the first part, commencing within ten days from date, all that portion of land situate in Kahului 2, aforesaid——

Mr. HALE. The Senator need not go on. It appears that it is a contract made with each of the persons who are to perform the labor.

Mr. CULLOM. Who are to perform the labor.

Mr. HALE. And is signed by each of them personally?

Mr. CULLOM. It does not say how it is signed.

Mr. HALE. I suppose it must be.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose it is.

Mr. HALE. In some of the California contracts the persons who performed the labor never signed any contract.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will see that this contract is not only to labor, but it involves a sort of partnership by which these men are to raise sugar at certain figures, and so on. You can scarcely say, in fact, that it is a personal labor contract, because it is an agreement between these parties to raise sugar on certain terms.

Mr. HALE. The last observation of the Senator from Illinois, that this does not come up to the legal description of a personal contract, raises a doubt. Has the Senator any doubt that the amendment which he has accepted does entirely cover the system of foreign-labor contracts?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt it will destroy the business, and my own judgment is that without this amendment, the Constitution and the laws of the United States being extended over those islands, it will break up the whole thing, and there will be no more of it than there is in the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if, in his opinion, the amendment will cover a contract made by a certain Japanese company represented by its officers for a certain number of Japanese. As a matter of fact, thousands and thousands of Japanese workmen have been imported into the Hawaiian Islands. They come there under contract made with the managers of those companies. As evidence of that fact, permit me to read an extract from the report of Commissioner Powderly, made one year ago to our committee:

Detailed information of a confidential nature has been received, showing that since the passage of the joint resolution annexing the said islands immigration thereto has been greatly stimulated; as many as 7,000 Japanese have been contracted for by residents and 250 Italians engaged to work on sugar plantations. These figures, by a comparison with arrivals prior to the passage of the said act, indicate that interested parties are exerting themselves to land in said islands as many immigrants as possible of such classes as would be excluded if the operation of our immigration laws were extended so as to embrace arrivals in Hawaii.

It is a notorious fact that since this, one year ago——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to ask the Senator what is the date of that report? I believe he said it was a year ago.

Mr. PERKINS. February, 1899.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. How many of these Japanese laborers have been imported into Hawaii since that time?

Mr. PERKINS. The report is dated February 13, one year ago. I was about to say—I have it unofficially—that there have been fully 15,000 immigrants into the island since that time.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I stated yesterday what seemed to be as far as

I could learn the fact, that there are about 40,000 laborers in the Hawaiian Islands now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Including Japanese?

Mr. CULLOM. Including Japanese and others.

Mr. PERKINS. And my friend was there a year ago or more.

Mr. CULLOM. A year ago last September.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend was there a year and a half ago.

Mr. CULLOM. But what I wanted to say is that the statement made by those who seem to know about it is that about one-half of the 40,000 have been brought there under contract, and about 25,000 of them perhaps, or a few more, have been brought there since the annexation.

Mr. PERKINS. It seems to me the point made by the Senator from Maine is worth our consideration. If this can only apply to personal contract and will not apply to companies, the very object we have in view will be frustrated. It is a question of great importance to the honor of this country and to Congress in legislating. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts gives no more nor no less to the islands than applies to labor in other States and Territories of this Union. As I said before, the language should be so clear that he who runs may read. If the phrase "personal labor contracts" does not apply to companies, then the amendment should be reformed so that it will do so.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, right in line with what the Senator is saying, to confirm the doubt that arose in my mind as to the application of the amendment, the danger in our scheme of larger benevolence of missing what is wanted in Hawaii, I have just been called out by a representative of that people, who is here with some official recognition, I do not know just what. He is an active, practicing, experienced lawyer, and he has just told me at the door that he is satisfied, as a lawyer familiar with their statutes and provisions, that this language, "personal labor," will not in any way affect the emigrant companies who have made these contracts and assigned them from time to time in bulk. So I think before we pass it we had better include both the larger scheme for labor and also the plan that the committee had originally of striking at this distinctive evil, so that it shall apply to personal labor and to all contracts involving imported foreign labor—something of that kind.

Mr. HOAR. I have all the respect for the gentleman named. I do not know whether my honorable friend gave his name or not in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I have his name.

Mr. HOAR. I have all the respect for him which is due to the indorsement of the Senator from Maine, and that is very great respect indeed; but I must beg leave to suggest that the criticism comes from a very hasty and superficial notion of the matter. We are talking about contracts for specific performance and punishments by criminal process. You ought not, I believe every Senator will agree, to have a remedy by specific performance or a remedy by criminal process for the failure by a man to keep his engagement for personal labor and service. That, as has already been said, is the policy of most or all of the States of the American Union. Now, then, that, it is said, does not interfere with one man's contract to deliver the labor of another.

Mr. HALE. Or of many others.

Mr. HOAR. Or of many others. But it certainly does if the man who has agreed to deliver the labor of a thousand coolies or a thousand Japanese could not have any remedy against the man whose contract is to be delivered. The latter man is left free forever, and the other man, of course, can not have a remedy. There can not be a remedy for a specific performance against him that would be of any value, and there could not be before. There is no reason why he should not be liable in damages if he has made an imprudent contract of that kind which the man whom he undertakes to act for can not execute. In other words, what more do you want in regard to these contracts for the delivery of a thousand workmen and furnishing their service for a certain fixed time after they arrive in the island than a provision that the men whose service is sought are absolutely free in the matter, so far as these two proceedings go?

Mr. HALE. Now, let me put what might be an actual occurrence. An emigrant society—they call them that—signs a contract with A B to furnish the labor of 500 coolies for three years or five years. The contract is signed by the society upon the one side, by A B, who employs the society, on the other, and not one of the 500 persons either signs with the emigrant society personally, or with A B, who is to get the benefit of the labor; but it is a general sweeping contract to furnish labor, not the personal labor of the emigrant society, for it has none, but the labor of 500 different persons. Now, if we include in the operation of the bill nothing but contracts for personal labor, notwithstanding the great authority and experience of the Senator from Massachusetts, I should doubt whether, upon a question coming up between A B, who takes this labor, and the emigrant society, who contracts for it, the courts would decide that that was, under the language here, a contract for personal labor.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose they will not. What harm would then happen?

Mr. HALE. Then we are doing nothing.

Mr. HOAR. You have made it absolutely impossible for this man to perform that contract except by the voluntary consent of the men who want to be employed. Nobody objects to that.

Mr. HALE. It does not come up between the men who are employed and the society.

Hr. HOAR. Suppose it does not.

Mr. HALE. It comes up between the man who is to use the labor and get the benefit of it and the original society.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose it does; what happens?

Mr. HALE. He may enforce it.

Mr. HOAR. How can you enforce it?

Mr. HALE. Because we do not prohibit it.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; we have taken it out. The Senator fails to get my point, undoubtedly owing to my failure in stating it.

Mr. HALE. No; it is my failure to comprehend it.

Mr. HOAR. I can not for the life of me see what, if you have said that these laborers are free from all legal constraint whatever except a suit against them for damages, which nobody thinks is worth the paper on which the writ was printed, how the whole of this mischief is then cut up by the roots. In other words, the contract of the man to furnish 500 laborers is a contract which he is left utterly powerless to perform, and there is no remedy against him, of course, except the suit for damages.

Mr. HALE. But, like any process, there are other things and there are other results. It may be an entirely responsible company. Do you want these processes? If the Senator says, "Why, I have got as far along, in that I have exempted these persons and that nobody can trouble them, and these other parties may fight it out with the contract for a specific performance just as they choose," that is an answer; the Senator does not care anything about that.

Mr. HOAR. You have taken all. What is the mischief? Suppose the Senator from Maine and I make a contract that one shall furnish to the other 500 laborers in the State of Maine. Now, what is the mischief of that contract? The mischief is that 500 men, who are not free agents by reason of their poverty, have put themselves in a position where they have got to be compelled to labor by a civil or criminal process for the specific performance, by an indictment, against their will. Of course, if the contract between the Senator and myself is not enforced at all, it does not do any public harm or mischief. If it is enforced merely by a suit, it is not against me in the sum of damages due to the Senator, but men who are not laborers. That does not do any public mischief at all. Neither of us would undertake to enter into such a contract. He is only a public sufferer, but the public mischief of having involuntary labor kept to its task in that way is utterly gone by the result of this amendment, and there is nothing left which can do any public harm. That is the answer to it.

Mr. HALE. In a contract such as I have stated I do not think that these 500 individuals would have anything to do with it anyway. They have not made any contract. The bill does not apply to them at all.

Mr. HOAR. They could if they had made the contract.

Mr. HALE. But they have not made it.

Mr. HOAR. The trouble is this: The Senator from Maine agrees with somebody to furnish him 500 laborers for twelve months the 1st of next January; and thereupon when the 1st of next January comes, he goes and gets the 500 laborers in a condition of poverty and distress, and brings them across the sea; and he has got them where he can scourge them to that labor. I do not mean that he can literally scourge them, but he can compel them by criminal and civil process both; and that is the mischief, that he should have 500 men compelled to labor at his terms in competition with 500 free laborers.

Now, that is the whole mischief. The fact that he has agreed to furnish me a certain amount of labor does not do any harm. This law comes in and says, in other words, the man who has made that contract with you shall have no legal power whatever to help him to keep it. You can only enforce it by the voluntary action, voluntary all through the time up until the twelve months are over, of the men whom he expects to do the work. Therefore, that being right, we say that can not be enforced, and nothing has happened except that one rich man has made a contract with another, which he can not keep by any legal power and which he ought to be permitted to keep if the workmen are free all through the time, because there is no constraint on them, if they are willing to help him to keep it. The only mischief, then, that has happened is that one rich man, a well-to-do man, has got a claim for damages against another rich man, and we do not care anything about that at all. That is the whole of it.

Mr. HALE. I have been looking at this in a different way from what the Senator has. He has been looking at it at the end of the contract that is made by the party furnishing the laborers. The contractor brings them over here. I have been looking at it, and

I supposed the committee was looking at it, from the other end, whether the party in the island who hires the men to do his work can enforce it.

Mr. HOAR. We have cut off the other end altogether by this law.

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether you have. I have not been looking at rights on the part of the individual who brings the poor creatures over here and sells their labor. I do not care whether he is protected or not. I do not think he would come in. I think the committee has been looking, as I was, at the other side, at the man on the island who is conducting the works, who is running a manufactory or a plantation, who hires the men from the contractor. That is the side I have been considering, not the side the Senator from Massachusetts has considered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask the Senator from Maine, how would the contractor who had agreed to furnish 500 men have any hold on them unless he had a contract?

Mr. HALE. That is a contract which is made outside of this country; I do not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. But under the penal laws of Hawaii, which we are discussing, that contract made in Japan or China has been enforceable in Hawaii, and punishable by imprisonment and scourging, so to speak.

Mr. HALE. That entire provision has been abolished in another way.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have repealed the Hawaiian statutes, and now we are trying to let loose the people under contract.

Mr. HALE. Now we are dealing with the other end. We are dealing with the relation of this labor and the man who contracts to furnish the employment, as I understand it.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask the Senator from Maine whether, in the absence of a statute, the contract made by either the contractor or the laborer could be specifically enforced under any principle of equity?

Mr. HALE. I do not know that it can.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not think there can be any enforcement of either one of these contracts unless there be a statute, and I understand the Hawaiian statute is to be repealed.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Then this statute, to make it clear and plain, is an American law for Hawaii and can not be enforced here; whether necessary or not is another question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that this bill as framed and brought in here expressly excepted the existing contracts and only repealed the statute to take effect hereafter, and we are now trying to get the people loose from the contracts that have been made in the past.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the amendment, if I may do so. Has the amendment been accepted?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts by inserting after the word "contract" the words "heretofore or hereafter entered into."

Mr. HOAR. I accept that amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. So do I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts accepts the proposed amendment. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. As modified the amendment will read as follows:

Provided, That no proceeding shall be maintained for the specific performance of any contract heretofore or hereafter entered into for personal labor or service, and there shall be no criminal proceeding for the breach thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask if that would cover cases involving a relation of confidence—for instance, contracts with agencies where there might be embezzlement? Would that exclude a transaction of that kind?

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that would be like larceny, and that class of services is not usually spoken of in law. "Personal labor or service" is a well-understood legal term in the statutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, after the word "language," in line 2, insert:

Provided, however, That the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may at any time after January 1, 1903, submit to the lawfully qualified voters of such Territory such changes and modifications in the qualifications for electors as they shall see fit; and the same being adopted by a majority vote, taken in the mode prescribed by the legislature, shall be valid and binding as law.

Mr. CULLOM. I think that provision is entirely unnecessary. I think the bill already provides for it; but I have no objection to it myself. They can have that privilege anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 29, line 3——

Mr. CULLOM. What section?

Mr. HALE. It is chapter 3, under the head "The executive." It is the appointment of a governor, the executive power; that the executive power of the government of Hawaii shall be vested in a governor, etc. He shall not be less than 35 years of age; shall reside within the Territory. If it is intended that a resident of the Territory shall be appointed, I should prefer the words "be a resident" to the word "reside," because the governor may be appointed anywhere and reside in the Territory after he is made governor. I suppose the design is to appoint an actual resident at the time of his appointment. How is that?

Mr. CULLOM. I think that is a fair construction of the language as it is in the bill.

Mr. HALE. Then there certainly will be no harm, and it would make it more clear, to strike out the word "reside" and insert the words "be a resident of."

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE. I move that amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I have an amendment prepared upon that same line, which proposes to strike out all of the words "shall reside within the Territory and be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii." I believe that all of these offices should be filled from citizens of Hawaii, but this is a limitation upon the power of the President to appoint Territorial officers. Both political platforms in late years have declared that it is the policy of both parties to appoint residents of the Territories to office, but ofttimes conditions have arisen when the President could not, with justice to the people or with justice to himself or the people of the whole country, appoint a resident of that particular locality.

I have no fear that the President of the United States would abuse his power of appointment, and I think there ought not to be a limitation upon him, but that he should be allowed to make these appointments from whatever part of the United States he should see fit under the special circumstances which might arise at that time. For one, having lived in a Territory, I have always insisted that appointments should be made from the citizenship of that Territory. But conditions, as I say, have often arisen in special cases where this limitation imposed on the President would work harm, not only upon the country at large, but upon the particular Territory to which the appointment was made. I think the Senator from Maine can see circumstances and conditions which might arise where there might be a quarrel of factions and where the President could not appoint an officer from the locality in which he is to serve.

Therefore I have prepared an amendment to strike out even the part which the Senator from Maine seems to think is too weak.

Mr. HALE. Then I suggest to the Senator to let my amendment be adopted, which goes to a certain extent—it does not interfere with his—and then he can move to strike out the whole clause as amended and insert his substitute. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I certainly have some objection to that, because I think the committee provision goes far enough, and certainly the amendment of the Senator from Maine goes a great deal further. So I should prefer that the committee provision should stand, if either is to be made a part of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Well, let my amendment be voted down, if that is the view of the Senate. I have assumed that the intention was to appoint some one who at the time of the appointment is a resident. There might be some doubt under the language whether anybody might not be appointed and sent there and move there and reside afterwards. "The governor shall reside." I make it more certain, if it is the intention that he shall when appointed be a resident, by substituting the words "be a resident" for the word "reside." I move that amendment. If that feature is incorporated, then the Senator comes in with a much larger proposition, which leaves it open to anybody.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It leaves it open to the discretion of the President.

Mr. HALE. Yes; it leaves it to the discretion of the President. Of course that is for the Senate to determine. It opens up a much wider question. But my amendment does not open as wide a question. So I move that amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope the Senator will remember that this is going much further in the appointment of governors of this new Territory than the Senate or either House of Congress has ever ventured to go in regard to the appointment of governors of our own Territories. We have enacted in the platforms of both the political parties the same thing that is proposed here; but none of our political platforms in words have been enacted in the organic acts of any of the Territories.

Mr. HALE. No; but I offered the amendment under the impression I had gained from distinguished men, like the Senator, who for years represented a Territory in the other House, that it was much better in all these cases that the officials should be taken from men residing in the Territories. That has so operated upon me; there were so many evils in the old arrangement, and so many men were foisted upon the Territories who were incompetent and who added nothing to the life or the prosperity of the Territories, that I think it has worked better where residents have been appointed; and while we have not crystallized that principle into law, it has been done with few exceptions by both parties appointing residents. My impression is, if all is true that has been said about the intelligence of the people of Hawaii, their brightness, their capability of enacting and observing laws, we should do much better if we provided for the appointment of distinguished residents, actual residents, at the time of the appointment.

I am rather more hopeful than some of our friends. I think there are Senators who have looked at this matter personally who are rather hopeless, and who say that we shall have to send our own people out to govern the people of Hawaii. I did not vote for the bill which annexed the islands with that view, and I should not have voted for it if I had had that opinion, but I should have said, "Wait a while." But, going on the proposition that those people are very intelligent, that we are going to restrict the suffrage, that not much harm can come during the time of their remaining as a Territory, I still think that the appointment of their chief executive should be restricted to those who are actual residents of the Territory at the time of the appointment. It was with that view that I offered the amendment; but, of course, the Senate may vote it down.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have the amendment which has been offered read at the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 3, after the word "shall," where it last occurs, it is proposed to strike out the word "reside" and insert the words "be a resident," so as to read "shall be a resident within the Territory," etc.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from Maine or any other Senator to misunderstand my position in this matter. I believe and I know that the people of the proposed Territory of Hawaii are as capable of self-government as the people of any State or Territory in this Union. But we are not giving them self-government under this bill; we are not giving them the right to select their governors; we are simply giving them right to have a governor appointed by the President of the United States, and the appointment should be made in the same manner as that of the governor of any other Territory.

Mr. HALE. We are giving them a very considerable measure of self-government.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We are giving them more than we have given any other Territory ever admitted to the Union; and I am glad of it. They should have the highest measure of self-government. But where we limit them, we ought not to limit the exercise of the discretionary power of the President. If they should go into elections and elect their governor, that would be one question; but here we have a condition of affairs arising where the President of the United States is called upon to make the selection.

As the Senator from Maine says, I have lived in a Territory; I have advocated home rule for the Territories, and have insisted that the officers of the Territories should be appointed from their citizenship, because I have always contended that the men who go into a country to make new Territories have as much brains and know the conditions of those countries as well as any who live outside.

But the Democratic party and the Republican party, while favoring home rule in the Territories, never insisted that the President of the United States should be deprived of his authority to go outside of the people of a Territory to make appointments if he should deem it expedient or necessary. If the Senator had lived in a Territory as long as I have, he would know that there are conditions sometimes arising, where, for instance, there are contending parties for a given office, where partisanship runs much higher than it does in a general election in one of the States, and where if the head of one of the contending parties should be appointed by the President it would result in "confusion worse confounded." In such cases in our Territory since 1888, when the principle of home rule was first adopted by both political parties, the President has found it necessary to go outside of the limits of the Territory and appoint the governor and judges of the courts.

While I say I do not apprehend for a moment that the people of Hawaii would not select a just and proper person among their own citizenship for the governorship, yet a condition of affairs might arise where the best interests of the whole community would be subserved by the President going outside of the limits of those islands. Therefore, I say I think that Territory ought to be left in exactly the same situation as any other; not that I think the President without cause would go outside and foist unpleasant appointments upon the people, but because I say a condition might arise when, for the best interests and the good order of a community, he would be compelled to make appointments from outside a Territory. I think the discretion ought to be unlimited in Hawaii the same as it is in the Territories on the mainland.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Maine will not prevail, for it appears to me from the information I have been able to gather that we already have an oligarchy in Hawaii, and to perpetuate it by prohibiting the President from sending some new men there who might inject some Americanism into that country would be a calamity. I therefore think that the proposition that the President shall be limited in his appointment to a resident of those islands is pernicious in policy and will tend to accentuate the existing evils there.

Mr. CULLOM. I think this bill as it stands on that question is good enough, and an important feature is that the man who is appointed governor shall reside in the Territory during his term of office. My own opinion is that the President of the United States, whoever he may be, will find men in the Territory who are just as well qualified for the office of governor, or any other office, as anybody outside of the Territory. I hope the bill will stand just as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want a vote on my proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand that the Senator from Wyoming had offered an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I had not offered it, but I intended to offer it. It was right on this same proposition, Mr. President. I move to strike out, in lines 3 and 4, on page 29, the words "shall reside within the Territory," for the reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. MORGAN. If that motion prevails, we shall endanger those islands, I think, by having a nonresident governor, who may reside in California and govern the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that my object is simply to provide for residence at the time of the appointment. Of course it is supposed the governor of a Territory or a State will reside in the Territory or State during his incumbency of the office.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand the object of the bill, it was to require the governor to reside there and not to restrict the President as to the appointment of a person who at the time of the appointment resided in the islands. There are some very strong reasons for requiring the governor to reside in the Territory.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If I could understand the bill in that way, I should not object; but I think it is capable of a different construction.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it is; but the committee intended to leave the President at liberty to make his appointment from where he chose.

Mr. HALE. I understood it the other way. I thought when I appealed to the Senator from Illinois that he would sustain me in that view, and that is why I offered the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is exactly the way I understood it.

Mr. HALE. I understood the committee intended that the governor should be a resident of the Territory, and that there was no need of my amendment, and therefore I did not make much point about enforcing it. Now, however, the Senator from Alabama comes in and says the committee meant the other thing, just the opposite—meant that the governor might not be a resident. I do not know who is right about it, whether the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Alabama. It now seems that it means either.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the bill is all right as it is on that point. There is nothing before the Senate, I believe, in the way of an amendment, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] was recognized.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there may be something in the peculiar situation in Hawaii——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pardon the Chair for a moment while he inquires if the Senator from Wyoming has offered an amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. He has not.

Mr. SPOONER. Did the Senator from Wyoming offer an amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. He withdrew it, if he offered it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I withdrew it under the statement that was made.

Mr. TILLMAN. What was the statement of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Under the statements of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Illinois, who are both members of the committee and who cooperated in the preparation of the bill, that it meant exactly what I said and argued for, I withdrew the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there may be something peculiar in Hawaii and the situation of the people there which not only justifies, but requires a departure in some instances from the governmental methods which are fundamental in this country. If there be, I do not wish to make any motion to strike out section 15; if there be not—and I ask the Senator who has charge of the bill [Mr. CULLOM], or the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is very familiar with the situation in Hawaii to explain it—I shall make that motion. The section is as follows:

SEC. 15. That in case any election to a seat in either house is disputed and legally contested, the supreme court of the Territory of Hawaii shall be the sole judge of whether or not a legal election for such seat has been held; and, if it shall find that a legal election has been held, it shall be the sole judge of who has been elected.

Of course, under our system of government, without any exception, so far as I remember, each house has been made, and is made, the sole judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members. There may be some situation in Hawaii which demands this change, this peculiar provision.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know of any situation in Hawaii that makes it exceptional on this subject. I can only say that if Kentucky had such a provision in her constitution now, we would not have the row that is going on there, but we should have the means of settling the question in dispute as to the title to the office of representative or senator, to be determined by the supreme court of the State. I think it would be a great relief to this country now if we had such a provision. I do not remember—perhaps the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] can remind me—whether this provision was in the constitution of the republic. I rather think it was.

Mr. CULLOM. It was in that constitution.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say, Mr. President, that it has been observed here by a Senator who knows all about Hawaii, who has studied the system very fully, that that is a government which is equal in all respects in its political economy, in the wisdom of all its constitutional and other provisions—and he might have added in the fruits of government—to any State government in the American Union.

When the commission went out there the circumstances under which they were required to act were altogether the reverse of those which attended the action of any committee of either House of Congress in the formation of a Territorial government for our young and growing Territories. In the formation of the Territorial governments in the United States, which have been very numerous and very diverse, we have commenced with a community that was unorganized, speaking in a legal sense, and have undertaken to build it up really into statehood, especially in regard to those areas of territory which are on this continent. The purpose has always been distinct and perfect that the ultimate result of our work in giving them government republican in form, as is required by the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, has been that they should be admitted as States into the Union. No such definite purpose as that was expressed in the act of annexation; and perhaps it is in the contemplation of Senators now that it will be a long time before Hawaii can be admitted into the Union, if ever. The honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] remarked this morning that he hoped it would not be a long time before a great and prosperous State would be found there in the heart, I may call it, of the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator is mistaken. It was the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who said that.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon. It was the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I entertain a different idea about it.

Mr. MORGAN. When I went out there under commission from the President, in company with my colleagues, one from the Senate, one from the House of Representatives, and two from Hawaii, after I had studied the system there during that visit and also the year previously, I became satisfied of the perfect truthfulness of the observation that those people had built up a government that was at least equal in all respects to any government in the American Union. My first proposition was that we should recommend that the people of the Hawaiian Islands should hold a convention, adopt a constitution, and apply for admission into the American Union. None of my colleagues on the commission agreed with me about that. I still adhere to that as the opinion which I think is best entitled to be followed.

But what work had we to do there? We were not preparing to build up a Territorial government step by step, through such processes as we are now carrying on, for instance, in Alaska; starting in one session of Congress to do one thing, and at another session of Congress, when matters are a little advanced, to do another, and we have not yet in the case of Alaska got so far as to authorize the people there to have a legislature. They are governed by a code of laws which we borrowed from the State of Oregon, and by a United States court, or a Territorial court, that is now established there for the purpose of executing those laws and also the laws of the United States. Alaska is in a very nebulous condition as yet as to government; but it is among that class of efforts we have been making to ripen up a condition of affairs in the Territories, so that they can finally be prepared to attain to statehood.

When we got to Hawaii we found a state in full operation; we found a republic there. It had been an independent republic. We found that that republic had been ingrafted upon a monarchy; that it had excluded all of the monarchic features of government, but still retained many of the constitutional features which had been inaugurated there by the monarchs themselves, beginning with Kamehameha I or Kamehameha II and running down through that dynasty. Our duty was dangerous and disagreeable, the difficult duty of tearing down a state government, a perfect system of government, with its constitution and laws, with its supreme court, with 11 volumes of supreme court decisions of very high grade and character, tearing all that fabric of government down, attended, as it was, with a great many institutions of renown really, such as colleges and hospitals, and the like of that, and substituting for it a Territorial government. Naturally our affections turned to the best forms of Territorial government in the United States, which I may say now are possessed by Arizona and New Mexico.

Now, to describe those advantages for a moment, and to borrow from the Senator from Nevada a statement which I think is entirely correct, we find in New Mexico and in Arizona complete systems of Territorial government, in which they have their courts, their supreme court, their governors, appointed by the President, and some of the other officers appointed by the President; their legislature elected by the people; their codes of laws which they have enacted from time to time, very few, if any, of which Congress has ever exercised the right of repealing or amending. The whole civil code of New Mexico and Arizona stands upon the will of the people out there, just as the civil code that was built up in Hawaii stood there upon the will of the people, expressed not only during the time of the republic, but antecedent to that, during the time of the monarchy, with principles perfectly well settled; institutions thoroughly established; laws that were approved by the people, and the fruits of which have not been surpassed, I believe, by any civil government in any country in the world.

We had all that to tear down, and our natural disposition and our natural inclination was to preserve to those people as many of their own institutions and as many of their laws as we could that were consistent with the laws and institutions of the United States and those principles of government which obtain in the United States.

So that in going upon this very difficult work we had to take the entire code of laws—the civil code and the penal code, which are embodied in two volumes which I have upon my desk here, very ably compiled and codified by Mr. Ballou, and the subsequent session statutes of 1888—and incorporate them into a new system. We naturally, as I observed before, left as much of those laws standing as we thought we could leave standing, to have the system there comport with the laws and policy of the Government of the United States. In doing that we arrived at the conclusion that what they had adopted in what is here presented in section 15, and which they had adopted in their constitution, was a wise provision of law and tended to prevent those outside controversies of a political kind which arise in Congress here, or in the States, and which have frequently given rise to very serious difficulties involving the Government of the United States in interference between the belligerents or at least the highly irritated parties in the States.

I believe that is a good provision of law. It has worked in the government of Hawaii and has really suppressed those controversies which have arisen so frequently in the States, where a political majority could unseat a man for the mere purpose of gaining a majority in either house in order to carry out some other distinct purposes, such as the election of a Senator of the United States. Pretty nearly all these controversies we have had in the United States have related to the election of Senators to this body. I think that is a sound and wise provision of law, and that it would be a good thing and a wise thing in the constitution of every State in this Union. It would promote the peace of the country and its security against those political controversies which arise in the legislatures of the States, and have reference, as I have observed, chiefly to the election of Senators of the United States. It is as follows:

SEC. 15. That in case any election to a seat in either house is disputed and legally contested, the supreme court of the Territory of Hawaii shall be the sole judge of whether or not a legal election for such seat has been held; and, if it shall find that a legal election has been held, it shall be the sole judge of who has been elected.

The contrary provision was put into the Constitution of the United States, and has been followed, I think, without any particular reason or necessity for it, by the different States of the American Union. It was originally adopted in England for the purpose of preventing the Crown from having the power to unseat members of Parliament, so as to give to the House of Commons the power to determine its own membership. When we arrived at the proposition here to set up an independent government, those provisions were in almost all of the old continental constitutions, or, as we called them, charters; and they were incorporated in the Constitution of the United States. I have no disposition to change the provision that each House of the Congress of the United States shall be the sole and exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own membership; but at the same time, when we come to the subordinate tribunals in this great imperial affair we have got here, republics united into a confederation, I think it is a wise thing to have the provision that is inserted in the fifteenth section of this bill. If it goes out, I do not know that it would ever make any difference in Hawaii or that it would in Alabama or in any other State of the Union, but I believe the principle of it is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I move to strike out the fifteenth section of the bill and to insert in lieu of it:

Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

I have listened to the statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but I can not persuade myself that this departure from our theory in this instance, or in any other, as to the government of a Territory is a wise one. Our theory has been that the various departments of the Government should be independent of each other—the executive, the judicial, and the legislative—each, of course, being supreme within its own sphere. I am too old-fashioned to like the proposition that the courts shall become involved in any way in the constitution of the legislative bodies. This is a very small senate provided for here, a senate of thirteen, if I recollect.

Mr. MORGAN. Fifteen.

Mr. SPOONER. Fifteen. Under the provisions of this bill the chief justice and the two associate justices who constitute the supreme court are not to be appointed by the President of the United States. They are to be chosen over there; and they are impeachable. They are not to be removed by the President of the United States, but they are subject to impeachment. They are subject to impeachment before the senate. The senate is the impeaching body or tribunal. The house of representatives, of course, presents the articles of impeachment. I do not myself take kindly to the notion that the judges of the supreme court, who may be tried, one or more of them, should be given power to decide who should be or who should not be, in a contest, members of the senate. Under this it might happen, perhaps it is not probable, but it might happen, that the leading members of the senate at least would owe their seats in that body to a decision of the supreme court. The supreme court are not only to pass upon the validity of the election, but they are also to be the sole judge as to who has been elected.

I believe it is a bad provision. It is utterly out of harmony with our theory. It does not maintain the independence absolutely of the three departments of the government, and no reason has been given, at least none that I have heard, which ought, I think, to commend it to the judgment of the Senate. If that is an intelligent people, as the Senator says it is, if they have not only capacity for self-government, but for a fine government, I can conceive of no reason why each house should not be, as the houses here all are, from the Congress down, the judges of the election, returns, and qualifications of their own members. It seems to me to be rather a vicious departure from our theory that the judges who are to be tried by a senate should have had a voice in seating the members of that body. I am willing to take the judgment of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 9, line 17, to strike out section 15, as follows:

SUPREME COURT JUDGE OF QUALIFICATIONS OF MEMBERS.

SEC. 15. That in case any election to a seat in either house is disputed and legally contested, the supreme court of the Territory of Hawaii shall be the sole judge of whether or not a legal election for such seat has been held; and, if it shall find that a legal election has been held, it shall be the sole judge of who has been elected.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 15. Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I propose, as an amendment, to strike out all of section 56 and insert in lieu thereof:

That the legislature at its first session shall create counties for the Territory of Hawaii and provide for the government thereof.

Mr. HALE. What section?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Section 56.

I will say in explanation of the amendment that a very peculiar condition of affairs exists within the republic of Hawaii. There is there a central government, consisting of a president and his cabinet. There are no municipalities. There are no county organizations. There is no place, as I understand—and if I am wrong I hope I will be corrected—in the island of Hawaii where even a deed, or a mortgage, or a bill of sale, or any other legal instrument can receive registry except at the city of Honolulu.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. There are registrars in all the islands.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Are there registrars in the islands who have the authority to register and keep records?

Mr. MORGAN. I so understand.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not so understand it. If I am mistaken, I should be glad if the Senator will correct me, because that is the sole object of this amendment, so that the people may have access to the records.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you not provide for local punishment by local courts?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There are local courts. There are circuit courts—five of them.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about warrants?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suppose they have means to get those, but what I refer to is the registration of deeds. There should be counties created there, so that within each county there would be a county clerk and register of deeds.

Mr. TILLMAN. And a sheriff.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; whatever form of government they may provide, so that the Senator from South Carolina, for instance, if he lived on the island of Hawaii and wanted to register a deed, would not be compelled to put it off four or five days till he could take a vessel and go over to the city of Honolulu, on the island of Oahu.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, section 56, line 10, after the word "legislature," it is proposed to strike out "may" and insert "shall at its first session;" and after the word "counties," to strike out "and town and city municipalities;" so that if amended the section would read:

SEC. 56. That the legislature shall at its first session create counties within the Territory of Hawaii and provide for the government thereof.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was called out for a moment. Does the Senator from Wyoming by his amendment propose to prevent the legislature from creating municipal governments there?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I suppose they have the right to do that by virtue of their being a legislative power. The only object I had in view was that they should at least create the county governments at their first session.

Mr. SPOONER. As it is now it is only permissive.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As it is now it is only permissive. They might go on as they are at the present time. Every State and every Territory here has county governments.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is probably necessary to confer upon the legislature of Hawaii the power to create counties, because that is a part of the organic government there which would naturally come under the jurisdiction of Congress to grant. Permission is therefore put into the proposed act to enable them to organize counties. I confess I have never heard any complaint made of the operation of the laws of Hawaii, as they are, about the registration of deeds or anything of that kind; but the subject came up before the commission and was discussed there, and my understanding is, although I may be in error about it, for I have not the statutes here and can not refer to them, that a registration system is provided in each county.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There are no counties.

Mr. MORGAN. I mean in each island, and that it is connected with the district court of the respective districts. I will explain in a moment what the system there is.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to ask him a question as he goes along?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Have there ever been counties there?

Mr. MORGAN. No. The entire group of islands is governed by the legislature, of course, from Honolulu, and that has led to some jealousy, particularly on the part of Hawaii, which is the largest island and the richest in the group. The town of Hilo is an aspiring town, and some of these days will be an important place. They have a very good anchorage in front, and there is a great deal around it to give promise of great success as a town.

I have no doubt the legislature will organize counties there and they will probably do it at the first session, but to do that they have to reorganize a great deal of the administrative system of the islands of Hawaii. For instance, they have no magistrates, no justices of the peace, in Hawaii. The district judge has all the jurisdiction and functions that we give to a justice of the peace and certain larger ones. I forget the number of districts. There are some ten or twelve, perhaps fifteen, in the islands. Sometimes two islands are put into one district. Those courts, as I understand, are courts of record and have the power to accept the registration of deeds. In that I may be mistaken, but I think not.

Now, in regard to the sheriff, there is a head sheriff, we call him in the proposed act a high sheriff, who has under his jurisdiction a number of deputy sheriffs, or sheriffs of the different judicial districts in the islands. There is a sheriff for each judicial district, and so there is a clerk for each of these district courts and clerks for the circuit courts and a clerk for the supreme court. The clerk of the supreme court has the clerks of the circuit courts and the district courts under his jurisdiction, not as to appointment, but as to keeping up the functions and dispatching the business of his office. The system in regard to sheriffs was found to be very valuable indeed, because the sheriff has a right under the order of the high sheriff to summon a posse comitatus whenever it is necessary in any part of the islands.

The whole force of the sheriff's office in the islands can be brought to bear at once upon any particular part of those islands, and sometimes it has been found absolutely essential for the safety of property and life that it should be done, especially in the quarrels that are continually fomented and are sometimes exceedingly bitter and fierce between the Japanese and the Chinese and sometimes the Portuguese. That is part of the police establishment. The sheriff's office is a very important one for the preservation of the peace. When this system is all disrupted and counties established, of course there must be a sheriff for each county, and this unity of power, which, up to the present time, has been effective in preserving peace and order in Hawaii will be broken up.

I think we had better go a little slow about this and not force them at the first session of the legislature to take upon themselves the organization of the counties. The first session of the legislature in Hawaii will have a great deal to do. Its time is limited. It will require a very able and very industrious body of men in that first session of the legislature to provide for all the wants of the islands. Here, for instance, is the bubonic plague, which is already upon the islands, and which has cost them an expenditure of some hundreds of thousands of dollars and has resulted in the exhibition for the second time or the third time of the very highest efficiency in the preservation of the health of the islands. No people have had greater danger to contend with, and none have met it with more resolution or more perfect dedication to the public welfare, than the people of Hawaii. I have a letter on my table here now from a lady in Hawaii, who was then with her husband on guard for the purpose of protecting the country against the spread of bubonic plague, which was brought in there on ships from China.

The whole system of administration in Hawaii will be changed whenever counties are established, and there will be a great multiplication of offices and a great addition to the expense of Hawaii. Up to the present time it has been, and according to the estimates of this commission, for all time to come Hawaii will be a self-sustaining community. Although it gives up entirely its revenues on imports, or will do so whenever this bill is passed, it is still a self-sustaining community; and I must say that I think the burdens of taxation in Hawaii seem to rest as lightly upon those people as any country I was ever in. There is no complaint of any taxation in Hawaii. I saw no evil effects of the pressure of government upon those people. On the contrary, they are a happy, decent, well-ordered, cleanly, nice-appearing people.

I do not remember ever to have seen a patch on the garment of a Hawaiian, great or small, and I do not remember to have seen one whose clothes were out of order, except a workman employed about a ditch or furnace, or something of that sort. I do not remember ever to have seen a beggar there. I am satisfied there is not one in the islands. They are all cared for. There are no exhibitions of persons in pauperism or in distress on the streets of the islands, and everybody there seems to be prosperous, and, as far as I could judge, everybody seemed to be happy. The burdens of government, therefore, are not heavy upon those people, and they are perfectly self-sustaining and will be self-sustaining. Those are very fertile islands; there is great prosperity in all industries, and there is a great invitation for new industries to go there, and a great influx of population has gone there. I think there have been thirty or forty thousand people added to the population of Hawaii since the act of annexation.

Under these circumstances I think we ought not, for the purpose of getting deeds registered, if they are not authorized now to be registered, to compel them at the first session to organize into counties and take upon themselves the payment of a very large additional number of officers, with, of course, an increase of taxation. I think we had better be indulgent with those people and let them work their way. I am sure, Mr. President, there is not a State in the American Union whose people have shown a higher degree of patriotism than the people of Hawaii have shown. They have had the entertainment of our soldiers as they passed over to the Philippines, and all stopped there—nearly every soldier who ever went there. I myself have attended feasts laid out by the people of Hawaii, at which a king might be pleased to sit down, where three or four thousand soldiers were assembled at one time and fed entirely by the kindness and hospitality of the people of Hawaii. So I think it is not necessary to crowd them at all. They are a wise, generous, and just people, and their institutions and their success in government show it.

I think we had better leave this matter as it is, so that the legislature shall have the authority and the power to organize counties, but not force it upon them immediately. The necessity is not great enough to undertake such a radical scheme of legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. A county government and county officers mean a pretty large burden of expense.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; very large.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I have the highest regard for the extensive observation that was made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] during his two visits to those islands, but I think perhaps he fails to comprehend some of the conditions there. I myself have spent three months in those islands during the past year, making two visits. Perhaps twenty days of that time were spent in the city of Honolulu. The entire remainder of the time was spent among the people for whom the Senator has such genuine affection. Some of his remarks would lead me to believe that he thought, possibly, I had not the welfare of that people at heart.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no; not by any means.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What I desire to do more than anything else by the passage of this bill is to assist the Hawaiian people to form a government that shall be best adapted for them and shall meet their needs.

The Senator says he heard no complaint of lack of registration facilities. I heard it in hundreds of places where I went, both from those who are selling and those who are buying. The Senator knows very well that the apportionment for the legislature as made by this bill puts the legislature into the hands of those who would want few if any places of registration other than Honolulu. I am fearful that if the simple authority is given in the bill and nothing commanding the legislature to take this action, it will be many, many years before it is taken. I think that Territory should be compelled, as the Territories of the United States and the States of the United States do, to divide the Territory into counties, that shall be as convenient to the inhabitants thereof as may be.

Now, it is true that a large part of the transfers on the islands are made on the island of Oahu, upon which Honolulu is situated, but it will not be many years, as perhaps it is even now, when the transfers on the island of Hawaii equal it. Those people, who are divided by straits, divided by the ocean, 300 miles away, should not be compelled to take a trip to Honolulu or take the time to send the papers to Honolulu. The Senator from Alabama says the burden of taxation there is very light. That is one of the reasons why they can afford to assume this expense. My recollection is that the rate of taxation in the entire islands is about 1 per cent—less, perhaps, than in any county or State or Territory in this Union. They can very well afford, then, with the $2,000,000 which they now have in their treasury to bear this additional expense, if there be any.

I hope this motion will prevail. I do not care about the special language of the amendment. I am willing to insert "at the first regular session of the legislature" or anything else that will make it mandatory on the Territorial government and the legislature to create counties.

Mr. CULLOM. I happened to be out of the Chamber when the amendment was offered, and I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 56, on page 23, in line 10, after the word "legislature," by striking out the word "may" and inserting "shall at its first session," and after the word "counties," by striking out the words "and town and city municipalities;" so as to read:

That the legislature shall at its first session create counties within the Territory of Hawaii and provide for the government thereof.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not suppose the Senator from Wyoming desires to strike out that portion which allows the legislature to create towns and cities?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No, indeed; I want to avoid compelling them to do it.

Mr. CULLOM. You strike it all out, apparently, according to that amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is not what I intended.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I am concerned, I know something about the importance of creating counties with offices for records, especially on the Hawaiian Islands. If the language is to remain as it is, I think the words "at their first regular session" would do exactly what this provision intimates ought to be done. Personally I have no objection to striking out the word "may" and inserting "shall at its first regular session create counties."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will modify the amendment, if the Senator will allow me, so that I think it will meet all his objections. It will then read:

That the legislature at its first regular session shall create counties, and may, from time to time, create town and city municipalities within the Territory of Hawaii and provide for the government thereof.

Mr. CULLOM. I myself have no objection to that. I think it is tolerably important that the people of the island of Hawaii, on which the town of Hilo is located, shall have some records there, so that they will not be required to go to the island of Oahu or to the city of Honolulu, taking a day by water, in order to record deeds or transact such business as the people of every county have to transact. I have no objection to the amendment as the Senator now proposes it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming as proposed to be modified.

The SECRETARY. In section 56, page 23, line 10, after the word "legislature," it is proposed to strike out "may" and insert "at its first regular session shall," and before the word "town," in line 11, to insert "may from time to time;" so that if amended the section will read:

SEC. 56. That the legislature at its first regular session shall create counties, and may, from time to time, create town and city municipalities within the Territory of Hawaii and provide for the government thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask if any amendment was offered or adopted or rejected yesterday to section 75. The matter was up for discussion, but I think it was not determined.

Mr. CULLOM. There has been no amendment to that section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that no amendment was made to that section.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to offer an amendment to section 75.

I regret, Mr. President, that I feel compelled to propose this amendment. I believe it is right. It is with no desire to interfere with the passage of the bill or the object of the committee. I think it will cover two sections. The section provides that an amount shall be appropriated to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the laws of Hawaii relating to public lands, agriculture, and forestry. Now, so far as agriculture and forestry are concerned, I think it quite proper that the Secretary of Agriculture should have that investigation under his charge, but so far as the laws relating to the public lands are concerned, which is going to be the great question in that country, a question which is going to be harder to solve than the labor question, they ought to be investigated by the department of the Government which is especially charged with the administration of the land laws. It seems to me that the only proper way is for the investigation, if any, into the land laws of Hawaii to be made under the Land Department of our Government. This section, perhaps, might be divided, so that two investigations should be had.

What I want is that the lands of Hawaii, which constitute and will constitute the greatest problem over there, will be, if they are to be investigated, should be investigated under the department of Government which should have and will have the administration of those laws afterwards and has in every other Territory.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not quite understand the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming. If the Senator simply proposes for the present that the Secretary of the Interior instead of the Secretary of Agriculture shall make the investigation, and stops there, I have no objection to his amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is all I care for.

Mr. CULLOM. But I do not desire that we shall adopt a land system for those islands until we know more about them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is all I want.

Mr. CULLOM. The fact is that surveys such as we have in this country are not applicable to the conditions over there, as the Senator knows.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is right.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no particular concern as to who makes the examination, but I do object to anything beyond that being done at the present time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no desire to do anything else, but I think the Senator is a little hasty, perhaps, in saying the Secretary of the Interior should make the entire investigation in respect of those lands, because the investigation includes matters relating to agriculture and forestry, which, I think, properly come under the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CULLOM. So do I. What I mean to say is that, so far as concerns the condition of the islands as to the present surveys and the policy to be pursued with reference to surveys hereafter, I should be willing to let the Secretary of the Interior control that question and make the report.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And of course when the Senator speaks of surveys he means the survey and disposition of public lands.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is all that the amendment is intended to cover.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, let us see what the amendment is as offered.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that he should strike out all about agriculture and let the inquiry pertain simply to public lands and forestry. I do not see that there is any objection, inasmuch as the Secretary of the Interior has control over the forest reservations, but he might strike out agriculture and forestry both, if he wants, and let it be simply an inquiry. I do not think we need to institute two inquiries of this character just now.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say further to the Senator, by way of apology, that one reason why I offered the amendment was because I believed that the investigation in regard to the lands should be made immediately, while possibly the other investigation might have remained.

Mr. CULLOM. I think that is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming has not yet offered any amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will offer the amendment to section 75. At the end of lines 17 and 18 I move to strike out the word "Agriculture" and insert the words "the Interior."

Mr. TELLER. I think I would strike out "agriculture, and forestry" wherever it occurs. In line 19 strike out the words "agriculture, and forestry," and in line 20 strike out "forests, agriculture."

Mr. CULLOM. "And public roads," too. I do not see that the Secretary of the Interior has anything to do with that.

Mr. TELLER. Strike out, in line 20, "forests, agriculture, and public roads."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then my amendment will be to strike out, in lines 17 and 18, the word "Agriculture" and insert "the Interior;" and in line 19, to strike out "agriculture, and forestry;" and in lines 20, 21, and 22, to strike out the words "forests, agriculture, and public roads, bearing upon the prosperity of the Territory."

Mr. TILLMAN. Before that amendment is put, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that the information sought here is as to the character of the lands there, both the public domain and all the other, especially that left in charge of the Government. Now, if the Secretary of the Interior is charged with that survey and he undertakes to do it, they will simply give you the area, whether it is woods, or mountains, or valley land; whereas if left in charge of the Agricultural Department it is more than likely we will get some facts as regards the products that are grown on similar lands and we will get some facts as to the agricultural possibilities there.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that he may not be fully familiar with the manner in which the Interior Department conducts its surveys. This does not provide for any survey or anything of that sort, I will say to the Senator. It simply is to be an investigation. When the Secretary of the Interior makes public-land surveys those facts exactly are stated.

Mr. TILLMAN. You do not propose under a $15,000 appropriation to expect a survey of all those islands?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not expect any survey at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. You want a reconnoissance, so to speak.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is simply to gain information.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would the Secretary of the Interior give it to us better than the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly, because under the Secretary of the Interior it has been the special duty of that Department, and is now, to have supervision over all the public lands of the United States and over all the surveys of the United States except the geological and the coast surveys. That is the Department which is especially charged not only with the administration, but with the recommendation of all laws that are passed by Congress relative to the public lands.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course, I understand that, but the question is whether this special work, which seems to be to obtain information in regard to the agricultural possibilities of that country, can be better done through the Department of the Interior than the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CULLOM. That part is to be stricken out.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the provision as you presented it in the original bill provided that this survey or reconnoissance should be under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true.

Mr. TILLMAN. And I can not see any reason why you should change it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Because the Department of Agriculture has no jurisdiction whatever, and never has had, over the public lands of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will read my amendment, or have it read from the desk, he will find that it refers only to the public-land laws of Hawaii and an investigation into them, with certain recommendations to be made as to what laws of ours should be applied there; and it contemplates, not in words but in that report, the formation of some system of laws by which we can deal with those lands. It does not propose surveys.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I gather the meaning of the clause as it was in the bill, it provided for a kind of reconnoissance which would give us some definite information as to what kind of land the public domain there consists of.

Mr. CULLOM. That was the meaning of the provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. And now the Senator from Wyoming is providing for a survey or reconnoissance by the Land Office here for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The amendment provides for one of the purposes, I will state to the Senator, that was provided by the committee bill. It leaves out some of the others, and is for one particular purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems to me that the disposition of these lands in the future might well be left to the Land Office here, and they might, therefore, investigate the land laws of Hawaii and provide some scheme by which those lands should be open for preemption or homesteads or whatever other method of disposition may be determined.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes, sir; and that is exactly what my amendment proposes to do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know, but I want the other information as to what those lands are fit for.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That may neither be the Secretary of Agriculture nor any other person——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, why not draw an amendment which will cover both?

Mr. TILLMAN. Let both do it. Let the Secretary of Agriculture, who deals with agriculture and is supposed to know something about farming, being a farmer himself, send over there and tell us what kind of lands those are and what kind of farm products they produce, and let the land laws governing the disposition of those lands be in charge of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is uncertain as to who has the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know; we all have it, apparently.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I want to say a word about the amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. Allow me to suggest to the Senator, who wants information about agriculture and forestry, that this bill provides for a commissioner of agriculture as one of the officers of Hawaii in the government to be established there, and it seems to me we ought to be able to get from him all the information that it is necessary to have to enable us to know what those lands are worth or what they can be used for.

Mr. TILLMAN. The only trouble I have in this matter is in trusting everything to the Hawaiians. They are a very enlightened and educated people, so the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] tells us; but still they are not thought worthy to manage their own affairs, and we have limitations as to property in voting there and other conditions which point to the creation or maintenance of an existing condition in the happy family over there. They do not want to be disturbed by outside interlopers. I think it is very well for the United States to have some say-so in this business and send somebody over there from here who will report back the facts. But this change does not propose to give us the facts. The Senator from Ohio tells us that this commissioner of agriculture of Hawaii will give us the facts here. Why, some of our people might want to emigrate over there and not have all these good things left in charge of the little coterie of capitalists who have gone over there and preempted and taken everything that is good in sight.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no objection to the Secretary of Agriculture being authorized by the bill to make investigation and report, but I supposed that we should rely upon the commissioner of agriculture to be appointed as a part of this governing affair, to give us all the information that the Senator wanted. I was only suggesting it to save time and avoid further amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I think Senators have entirely mistaken the purport of the seventy-fifth section. No one has referred to what it ought to be or what it really is, except the remark of the Senator from South Carolina, that our people need information upon this question. There is a disposition among small farmers, laboring men, to emigrate to Hawaii, and they could do exceedingly well by going there and cultivating a small farm in coffee and make very large profits. It is quite a beautiful industry and a very convenient one in every respect. It occurred to the commission that the situation in Hawaii was very difficult to be understood by a person who had never seen it and who had never seen an accurate and official report about it. So this provision was put in here for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to do what? "To examine the laws of Hawaii relating to public lands, agriculture, and forestry"—for there are laws relating to all of them—"the proceedings thereunder and all matters relating to public lands, forests, agriculture, and public roads bearing upon the prosperity of the Territory, and to report thereon to the President of the United States, which duties shall be performed with all convenient speed." That is all of it. It is to get a report of a certain situation or state of facts there relating to agriculture, the laws upon the disposal of the public lands, forestry, and public roads.

Public roads is perhaps one of the most important of the elements of investigation that are presented here, for the reason that until you have built a road through one of those forests you can not establish coffee plantations or any other kind of plantations, bananas or anything of that kind, all of which are very profitable, because you can not get your wagons and teams into the vicinity of the land. Hawaii herself has demonstrated the value of this by building the road which I referred to yesterday, from Hilo to the volcano of Kilauea, and various other public roads in Hawaii. As fast as the roads have been built, coffee plantations and other plantations of small area have been established on either side.

Now, why do we select the Secretary of Agriculture? Because agriculture is the only pursuit in Hawaii. Outside of fishing there is no other pursuit in Hawaii but agriculture, and none possible. There are no minerals there. There is not enough wood there to make it an object to run steam machinery, and agriculture is the whole story in regard to the present and future prosperity of Hawaii.

I must confess that so far as I was personally concerned my attention was drawn to this subject and the necessity of having this report made by the Secretary of Agriculture because he is a man for whose ability and enterprise and industry and scientific knowledge I have the greatest possible respect. He would love to undertake a matter of this kind and have it carried through in a proper way; and when he made his report, Congress and the people also would understand exactly what the situation was.

Now, this is merely to get information. Can it make a matter of very great difference as to whether it is done by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Interior, except that the Secretary of Agriculture is to deal with the most important part of it? We are not undertaking to find out what changes ought to be made in the laws of Hawaii as to land, but to understand what they are, what the system is, how a man can go and make an entry, and the methods through which he can get possession.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, can not that investigation be made right here on the spot by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and all the information be obtained that we can obtain in Hawaii? What we want is an investigation by trained farmers and agriculturists—men who are familiar with that business—as to the possibilities of those lands. The laws and the method of the disposition of the lands can be found out right here in Washington. If we just call on the Secretary of the Interior to report to Congress the present laws in regard to public lands in Hawaii and what change, if any, he suggests and the disposition of those lands, we can get it without a dollar being expended.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator had ever been to Hawaii, he would know that nobody could ever suggest a sensible change in those laws unless he had gone there and investigated the matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. So I am confronted with a man who has been on the ground and says he knows something about it. I am willing always to yield to that kind of wisdom.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not know anything about it, and that is the reason why I want the information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I concur in the proposition that it is necessary, in order to have this investigation complete and really reliable, that an investigator should be appointed to go there and examine that country. It is not like any other country that I ever saw, and I do not believe it is like any other country in the world. It may be, but it is very peculiar. To group all the different items together is to constitute the picture that people want to see. They want to know, so far as they can ascertain it, what Hawaii is, from a careful investigation of what the lands are—that is to say, the elevation above the sea, which is an important matter, because you start at the level of the sea there and for 4 or 5 miles or for 6 or 7 miles out you have rice farms and sugar estates. Then, as you ascend on the mountain slopes you come to a coffee country. You can still go higher and you come to a corn and wheat country—a country that in the early settlement of California furnished flour for the Californians, as well as education for their children, when the gold diggers went out to California.

When you get still above that you have got a grazing country. When you get still above that you have got a country that abounds in berries and ground fruits, such as raspberries, strawberries, and huckleberries, and the like of that, and a number of konahberries and various kinds of very delicious fruits that grow spontaneously on the earth. So, as you ascend to a height of 15,000 feet, in some places, you have several latitudes in the different altitudes producing different kinds of crops.

Well, I can say that it would take an expert agriculturist to examine into this subject and present to the people the facts that would induce them to go there and raise sugar, bananas, rice, wheat, corn, melons. Fruits, of course, of various kinds grow all the year through. The ohia apple is wild there and grows on a tree as large as an ordinary oak. It bears a delicious apple and is in great abundance all through the country. There are many other fruits that grow spontaneously in the country, such as oranges, lemons, and limes. It is a country which abounds in fruits.

I think our people would like to know exactly the situation there, and I think Congress would like to know it, because when propositions are brought in here for the disposal of the public lands, when we have to enact laws to dispose of those public lands, we want to know what is the best system on which to proceed; whether the gridiron system of rectangular surveys which obtains here or surveys that accommodate themselves to the particular business in hand. An area of land that is sufficient for a coffee plantation would not be enough, for instance, for a wheat farmer or a corn farmer. But all of these particulars are of such a peculiar character that it occurred to the committee that it was better to have the Agricultural Department take charge of it than the Interior Department, which would deal with nothing, as has been observed here, but the land and perhaps something about its quality and the method of survey and disposal. That is the whole matter.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it seems to me that all this matter touching the land laws ought to be left to the Interior Department. We can not afford to begin to divide up these questions in different Departments. Unless we are disposed to turn over the lands to the Agricultural Department all these things ought to be left to the Secretary of the Interior.

Then, I suggest, if I may be allowed, to the Senator who has just taken his seat, who knows all about this subject, if he will draft a provision that will cover his suggestion, I shall be very glad to vote for it, and let that go to the Secretary of Agriculture and let him do those things which he can do. Let us confine the question of the laws to the proper Department, and it certainly will be proper then to turn over those questions of the character of the lands and the products that the country will raise and all that to the Secretary of Agriculture.

I believe if the Senator will draft by to-morrow morning a provision of that kind, there will be no trouble about adopting it. There is money enough here, because, as the Senator from South Carolina says, the work of the Secretary of the Interior can be practically done here so far as the law is concerned, and then the Secretary of Agriculture can carry out the other idea on the ground.

Mr. CULLOM. I merely want to say in connection with the Senator's remark that it is very important that the Secretary of Agriculture should report on the condition of those islands, the possibilities of the land.

Mr. TELLER. That is exactly what I want him to do; but I do not want him to invade the province of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CULLOM. The Secretary of the Interior ought to look into the question of how the best interests of agriculture can be served by dividing those lands, parceling them out so as to suit the conditions of agriculture. If a man wants to raise coffee or if he wants to raise taro he has got to have an opportunity of selecting coffee or taro land, if you please. I think it would be proper and right for the Secretary of Agriculture to look into the condition of the surveys over there and determine whether they are made in harmony with the necessities of agriculture.

Mr. TELLER. That is exactly what I think the Secretary of Agriculture may properly do. But I think whenever this land is to be surveyed, if we are to survey it, it will have to be surveyed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CULLOM. I myself think so.

Mr. TELLER. And the Interior Department will avail itself of the information. Now, we shall have to survey that country on the rectangular system unless we should find, when the report comes in, that the character of the country is such that we must introduce a different system and cut up the country into smaller lots, 40 acres being the smallest subdivision of the Government surveys. I learn that 20 acres there is a very respectable farm, in some places. In some places you might need a hundred.

Mr. CULLOM. And 2 acres make a respectable patch or farm for a native, for instance, who is raising taro. That would be all he would want and no more.

Mr. TELLER. I am sure if we confine the legal question and those things to the Interior Department and turn the other things over to the other Department we shall get at it in better shape than if we were to have either Department do it alone.

Mr. CULLOM. After this discussion with the Senator from Colorado, it is left to the Senator from Alabama to prepare an amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Some Senators desire an executive session and there are some amendments to be proposed to the bill which will take some time in discussion. The Senator from Alabama is to prepare an amendment on the subject which he has just been discussing. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 8 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 21, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RED RIVER OF THE NORTH AT DRAYTON, N. DAK.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 160, being the same as the bill H. R. 4167.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 160) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North at Drayton, N. Dak.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it carries any appropriation at all?

Mr. SPALDING. It carries no appropriation at all. The bill is drawn in accordance with the regulations of the War Department, and is indorsed by that Department.

Mr. TALBERT. Has it been fully considered by a committee?

Mr. SPALDING. It was reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. TALBERT. Unanimously?

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the bill H. R. 4167, on the same subject, lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made. There was no objection.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that two weeks from to-day may be set apart, immediately after the reading of the Journal, for the consideration of House bill 2538, a bill providing for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that Tuesday, two weeks from to-day, be set apart for the consideration of the Nicaragua Canal bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman, as I have not had time to read the bill, if there is anything in it that deprives the United States of the absolute control of the canal, or do we have to acknowledge that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is still in operation by virtue of anything in this bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. By the terms of this bill, if the canal shall be constructed, the United States will have absolute control over it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. What is the request, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to set apart Tuesday, two weeks from to-day, for the consideration of the bill known as the Nicaragua Canal bill.

Mr. CANNON. In the state of the public business, it seems to me that when two weeks from to-day comes, we can better tell about it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no objection on this side, I will state.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that to be an objection. If the gentleman wants to take the responsibility of objecting to it, let him say so.

Mr. CANNON. For the present. As to two weeks hence, I do not know what I may do two weeks from now; but at this time, forecasting for two weeks, I do not know what we should do.

Mr. HEPBURN. In order to obviate in part the objection, I would ask that a week from to-day be set apart for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that Tuesday, one week from to-day, be set apart for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I am not ready at this moment to agree to either one or two weeks from to-day. There is quite time enough to consult about this in either one or two weeks.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no objection to Tuesday one week on this side.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HEPBURN. By the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; by "the gentleman from Illinois," standing ready to confer with the gentleman touching the matter between this and then.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

TRADE OF PUERTO RICO.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Puerto Rican bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8245.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, as a result of a humanitarian war, inaugurated not for the purpose of conquest, but for the purpose of freeing Cuba from the oppression and cruelty of Spain, the United States finds itself to-day in the qualified possession and control of Cuba, in the unqualified possession and control of Puerto Rico, and in the disputed possession of the Philippine Islands. This possession and control are maintained to-day by the Army of the United States, under the direction of the President as Commander in Chief. With reference to them Congress is now called upon to act, and we must consider three questions. First, what duty prompts; second, what self-interest requires; third, what our constitutional obligation imposes upon us regarding them.

The answer to all these questions largely depends upon the relations which they will bear to us in the future, whether temporary or permanent, and every phase of obligation, duty, and right which can be suggested to us by any conquest or cession of territory is presented in the three classes of acquisitions thus secured.

CUBA.

As to Cuba, there is no contention between the opposing parties as to the policy to be pursued. Our sovereignty, jurisdiction, and control over that island were declared by the war resolutions to have in view only its pacification. That being accomplished, our solemn obligation to Cuba and the world was given to leave the government of the island to its people.

In pacification is necessarily included the erection of a stable government, a government built up from below, not imposed from above; a government capable of establishing order, maintaining peace, and performing its international obligations. Municipal government, provincial government, insular government must be organized in order to create a body politic capable of assuming and maintaining sovereignty. Such a process is necessarily slow. The future peace of that island, the maintenance of good order, and the establishment of peaceful relations with this country, as well as the security of our trade and business relations, all demand that this work should be accomplished not in a rapid, loose, and perfunctory manner, but with deliberation and judgment.

As to whether or not economic considerations will later on compel Cuba to seek the benefit of the commercial union and enlarged markets which incorporation with this country will afford is a question of the future, depending upon the consent of both parties, and only to be accomplished after a full consideration of mutual advantages. Cuba will in the future probably be more anxious about this than the United States, for time will demonstrate to Cuba the great advantages of annexation. Whilst her products will seriously compete with the products of certain sections of our country, yet annexation of Cuba is in line with the traditional policy of our country, which includes expansion over contiguous territory and adjacent islands controlling our defensive line. Annexation of Cuba depends on her initiative and our consent after due deliberation. Meanwhile we will carry out in good faith the guaranty of the war resolutions.

PUERTO RICO.

As to Puerto Rico, no complications exist unless they are created by the maladministration of Congress. Its area is small, its people can be easily absorbed, and we are in the unqualified and undisputed possession of that island with the consent of its people, who are ready, willing, and eager to share with us the benefits and the burdens of our Government. Their industrial competition will not be serious, even though they are taken inside of our tariff wall. Doubtless the disposition of the dominant party is to establish there a Territorial form of Government and to extend our Constitution and our laws to them. Their fear is the establishment of a precedent which will be invoked to control our action regarding the Philippines later on; such action, embracing not simply one island near our coast, easily governed, its people friendly and peaceful, but embracing an archipelago of seventeen hundred islands 7,000 miles distant, of diverse races, speaking different languages, having different customs, and ranging all the way from absolute barbarism to semicivilization.

It is evident, therefore, so far as Puerto Rico is concerned, whatever present objections there may be upon the part of the dominant party to establishing freedom of trade between that island and the Union, such trade will not be long deferred, as apart from the contentions raised by a discriminating tariff, which will doubtless be only temporary, it is evident that both of the political parties of the country are now in substantial agreement that Puerto Rico will become a part of the Union.

The dominant party, however, is losing sight of the possibility that the unrest and dissatisfaction created by inequality of laws may make our problem of government in Puerto Rico much more difficult than it now seems. Whether these newly acquired islands are to be regarded as dependencies or Territories, unless freedom of trade, freedom of migration, and equality of right and burthen are established, each community discriminated against will regard itself as the victim of American prejudice or greed.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Puerto Rico question is thus linked with the Philippine question. The latter presents the only difficulty in the way of the solution of the relations of our newly acquired islands, and it is necessary therefore to ascertain what duty, interest, and constitutional obligation require with reference to the Philippines. In doing so it is unnecessary to engage in crimination or recrimination as to the past. The fact is that the United States has destroyed the Spanish Government and has also destroyed the Filipino government.

The only government which exists there to-day is the military government of the United States. It is as clearly our duty to pacify these islands as it is to pacify Cuba. In this pacification the organization of a stable government is necessarily involved. A slow and tedious process must be entered upon of organizing municipal, provincial, and insular government, and later on, possibly, a confederated government or governments, including either all the islands or groups of islands related to each other by race or interest. This can only be accomplished by the recognition of the sovereignty of the United States for that purpose.

Back of all government lies force, and the only government that exists in these islands to-day is the Government of the United States, and its power must, as a matter of necessity, be recognized and obeyed. Thus far, therefore, both imperialists and anti-imperialists agree that the Philippine Islands must be pacified; that force is essential for that purpose; that the military power of this country must be asserted there in the interest of order and good government; that the people must be for a time in the condition of tutelage, their duty being to obey and ours to control, but with the corresponding obligation upon us to gradually and progressively instruct them in the science of self-government.

The only difference, then, between the imperialists and the anti-imperialists is as to our future purpose. The imperialists contend that we shall hold them for all time as subject dependencies, with such system of autonomy as they are capable of exercising; the anti-imperialists contend that we shall hold the Philippine Islands, not for the United States, but in trust for the people of those islands, with a present positive promise that when a stable government shall be organized, capable in the judgment of the United States of maintaining order and performing international obligations, the independence of the islands shall be assured. We must create a government there to which we can transfer the sovereignty transferred to us by Spain.

ULTIMATE INDEPENDENCE.

I contend that good faith, self-interest, and constitutional obligation compel us to the latter course, which will result in the pacification of the islands, the identification of the insurgents with building up the fabric of the new government, the establishment of order, the security of business interests, and the advancement of trade.

Meanwhile, the friendship of the people being assured, our commercial interests can be rapidly developed there and a commercial hold on the islands will be secured to an extent impossible of realization so long as the people maintain their present hostile attitude. Naval stations and coaling stations can be secured during the process of establishing the new system of government, a process necessarily of long duration, and currents of trade with this country will be created which can not be deflected. This process means the expansion of trade in the Orient without the annexation of oriental territory and oriental peoples, and saves us from the perilous undertaking of changing our theory of government, and abandoning our traditions as well as the contradictions which are involved in asserting an interstate republic and an extra-state despotism.

The Philippine Islands can never occupy to us the same relation as the territory gained from France, Spain, Mexico, and Russia. From this territory the majority of the States of the Union have been created, and the small balance remaining is certain of admission into the Union as States. No such contingency as the admission of the Philippines into the Union as States is possible. The very argument of the imperialists is based upon this impossibility, and the new theory of government now asserted has its foundation in the acquisition of territory thickly populated by people absolutely unfitted for association with us in government.

Their admission into the Union would also mean an industrial readjustment in this country, for if free trade is established between the Philippines and this country, the inclusion of 9,000,000 people possessing a considerable degree of alertness and industrial capacity accustomed to the cheapest wage and the lowest standard of living will make itself felt not only in our agricultural, but also in our manufacturing industries.

What, then, does self-interest require regarding those islands? Does self-interest prompt us to maintain a perpetual war with millions of people, the continuance of which depends not upon our power but upon their volition; for it is generally conceded that this contest, partaking of the nature of guerrilla warfare by millions of people against an invading and possessory force of only 60,000 men, can last as long as the Filipinos wish it to last. Or shall we secure the friendly cooperation of those people and meanwhile secure the great commercial advantages to be obtained by the retention of naval stations and coaling stations and creating currents of trade which can not be changed?

The course of the anti-imperialists entirely frees us from the danger either of the immigration of those people or the free admission of their products into our markets; whilst the policy to be pursued by the imperialists (provided the Constitution extends over those islands) absolutely compels free migration and freedom of trade.

It is unfortunate that we should go into a great Presidential contest over a question involving extra territorial policy. It is the sentiment of the American people that with reference to our foreign relations the entire country should stand united; and that patriotic sentiment might control now were it not that the question involved includes a change in our own Government under the Constitution—at all events a change of our Government as heretofore administered.

I will not enlarge upon the disadvantages from the standpoint of self-interest in holding those islands as a part of the United States. We all agree, imperialists and anti-imperialists, as to these evils. Imperialists propose to protect us against these changes by making those islands not a part of the United States, but territory of the United States—colonies of the United States, under our absolute and unqualified dominion—our government there unrestrained by the great principles involving personal and property rights contained in the Constitution; while anti-imperialists are solicitous to avoid these very evils of free migration and freedom of trade by absolutely preventing those islands from becoming in any way a part of the United States and by advocating the policy of holding them in trust for their own people, self-government to be ultimately established there and independence absolutely secured.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

The question then arises next, apart from the question of self-interest, as to what our constitutional obligations are regarding these islands. The treaty of Paris transfers them to the United States. The sovereignty of Spain has been broken. The sovereignty of the United States has been established. But the treaty provides that the political and civil status of the people of those islands is to be determined by Congress. Thus far we have not made them a part of the United States by any enactment of Congress. They are ceded to us by a treaty of peace; but the very terms of the treaty indicate that the determination of the future of these islands is to be left to the Congress of the United States.

We will soon be called upon to legislate regarding them, and I contend that unless we declare our purpose of holding the Philippines in trust for their own people until a stable government can be erected, the necessary presumption from the cession of the islands to us will be that they are territory belonging to the United States, and the Constitution applies to them, with all its privileges and immunities. No other presumption can be indulged regarding them unless an express declaration is made to the contrary.

The Constitution is the organic law of the United States, absolutely controlling all the branches of the Government in their functions. The United States which governs consists of the States composing the Union, but the United States which is governed under the Constitution consists of the entire domain of the Republic, Territories as well as States, and the "United States" referred to in that provision of the Constitution which declares for uniformity of taxation is the "United States" which is governed, not the United States which governs. The pending tariff as to Puerto Rico, therefore, raises the question as to whether the limitations and prohibitions of the Constitution control the action of Congress as to territories ceded and belonging to the United States. The claim that any part of the territory of the United States can be governed by Congress outside of the Constitution is without solid foundation, either of reason or authority. The Congress of the United States is the creature of the Constitution; all its powers are created by the Constitution, and the limitations upon its power must be applied to all legislation which it originates.

The Congress of the United States can not be a despotism in some parts of the Union and a body of limited constitutional powers in other parts. The Constitution of the United States was the compact of thirteen States, formerly colonies of Great Britain, which had revolted against the mother country. Equality of rights, the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, the right of representation where taxation was involved, were the essential principles to vindicate which the Revolution was inaugurated and free government established.

The framers of the Constitution had in view the acquisition of the Northwest Territory, out of which five States were to be carved. They were framing an organic act which was to apply to the entire domain of the Republic. Jealous of individual rights they granted certain powers to the General Government, reserved certain powers to the people and the States, limited other powers, and prohibited others. They organized a government capable of indefinite expansion. They provided for the admission of new States and for the acquisition of territory out of which States could be made. The Territories were to be regarded as infant States.

It is impossible to believe that they intended that the Congress of the United States should be a limited sovereignty in the States and a despotism in the Territories, and that they proposed that the people of the Territories should not enjoy the personal and property rights for which they had fought and which they protected by the prohibitions and limitations of Congress.

It can not be contended for a moment that they deliberately designed to give Congress the power in the Territories to pass bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, grant titles of nobility, work corruption of blood or forfeiture, convict of treason on the testimony of one witness, or that they designed that the people of the Territories should not be secure in the freedom of speech or of the press, the right to assemble and petition the Government for the redress of grievances, the right to keep and bear arms, the right to be secure in their persons, houses, and effects, or that they should be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or be deprived of private property for public use without just compensation, or should be deprived of the right of trial by jury, or should be subject to cruel or unjust punishment; and yet all these rights were absolutely secured by the Constitution, and Congress was forbidden to invade any of them.

It is clear that if the prohibitions of the Constitution relating to the rights of individuals were to be enforced wherever the jurisdiction of the Republic extended, the limitations of the Constitution relating to the power of taxation must be similarly enforced. The Constitution demands uniformity as the rule of customs duties throughout the United States, which term covers the entire domain of the Republic.

Now, the term "United States" can of course be used in two senses—the political sense, which means the States composing the Union; the geographical sense, which means the entire domain of the Republic. The United States, in a political sense, means the States composing the Union; they are the source of all governmental power. The people of those States elect the President of the United States. The people of those States elect Representatives in Congress. The people of those States elect the State legislatures which elect our Senators. The lawmaking and the law-executing branches of the Government thus elected by the people of the States composing the Union provide for the judiciary, which sits in judgment upon our laws.

The political United States consists of the States composing the Union—the "United States" which governs is the "United States" consisting of the States composing the Union. The United States, however, which is governed is the entire domain of the Republic, Territories as well as States; and with reference to the larger United States, the United States governed, the Constitution is the organic law, defining the powers of the President, of Congress, of the Supreme Court over the entire domain of the Republic, Territories as well as States.

It is impossible to believe that the framers of our Constitution could have had any other view. The States that originally formed this Union were certain colonies which had revolted against the oppression of the mother country—oppression involving, as this tariff does, the question of taxation, the question of taxation without representation, the question of unfair taxes, the question of imposition upon the natural rights and liberties of the colonists.

After many years of protest the men of that time, men of wonderful wisdom and sagacity, framed the Declaration of Independence, which was the assertion of the natural rights of man.

It was in itself the precursor of the Constitution. The very purpose of the Constitution was to establish a limited sovereignty upon this continent.

They were distrustful of absolute and unrestrained power. They had been the victims of the absolute power of Parliament, just such power as it is contended to-day we may exercise, under the Constitution, with reference to these new possessions; and they determined to frame a system of government which would put the representatives of the people and the people themselves in a strait-jacket so far as the exercise of absolute power was concerned. They framed a limited sovereignty, consisting of the United States of America, an indestructible Union of indestructible States, a Union organized for general protection and defense and the common welfare.

And so thirteen colonies of Great Britain, revolting against taxation by the mother country without representation in the taxing body, revolting against invasion of their rights of personal liberty and individual property, declared their independence of Great Britain, and later on formed a Union called the United States of America, the purpose being to leave local government in the hands of the States and to intrust all matters of general welfare, such as matters involving war, foreign relations, and Federal legislation, to the Federal Government, the source of which was to be the people of the States composing the Union.

They provided in their Constitution for expansion by the admission of new States, entitled to the same rights of local self-government, yielding the same allegiance to the Union and receiving the same benefits from it. Connected with this expansion by the admission of new States was necessarily involved the acquisition of territory, ultimately, when population permitted, to be admitted as States. Thus the scheme of government was formed, a union of States, expansion and growth by the admission of new States, expansion and growth by the acquisition of territory for the purpose of forming new States, everywhere maintaining the dual form of government—State sovereignty as to local matters and Federal sovereignty as to matters of general welfare.

Certain powers were granted to Congress. Certain of the powers so granted were limited. The exercise of certain other powers was prohibited. All powers not granted were reserved to the States or to the people of the United States. Combine all of the powers—the powers granted to the Federal Government, the powers reserved to the State government, and the powers reserved to the people—and you have all of the elements of absolute power. The very purpose of the organization of this Government was to combine them nowhere, but to create a government of checks and balances not capable, perhaps, of moving with the energy and efficiency and quickness of absolutism, but a government of limitations, of prohibitions, of checks and balances, so framed as to protect the individual rights, the individual lives, and the individual property of the people against absolute and unrestrained power.

Now, in framing this system of government is it possible to believe that these great liberty-loving, God-fearing, humanity-loving men could be so selfish as to intend to frame a government whose blessings were intended only for the States composing the Union, regardless of the rights and liberties of the people occupying territory belonging to the United States, that as to such people they intended Congress should have and exercise the omnipotent power which Parliament asserted and exercised regarding the Colonies?

EXTENSION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Chairman, the very scheme of government involved in itself not only expansion of territory but expansion of the Constitution, expansion of the protection of the Constitution over all parts of the domain of the Republic. It provided for the admission of new States, and in the same section provided for the government and disposition of territory belonging to the United States.

They then had in view the acquisition of the great Northwest Territory, subsequently ceded to the United States by the States of Virginia and Maryland, out of which not less than three nor more than five States were to be incorporated into the Union.

The entire history of the framing of the Constitution indicates that the purpose of its makers was to organize a union of States; to permit the admission of new States, and to permit the acquisition of territory for the purpose of organizing new States; and that over the entire country, both the States and the infant States, the Constitution was to be the organic law, charter of their liberties, governing and controlling the action of the Federal Government.

As the colonists had fought for the principle that taxation and representation must go together, they contemplated in no contingency the denial of this principle.

The portion of the Constitution providing for a District of Columbia, over which Congress should have exclusive jurisdiction, contemplated the acquisition of a limited area without population, whose population thereafter was to be made up of citizens from the various States, who could maintain their right of representation by maintaining their citizenship in the respective States, and who, by coming to an unoccupied territory, whose government was already vested in a Congress, must be deemed to have consented to that form of government.

As to the Territories, the right of representation was practically admitted by conceding the right to be admitted into the Union when the population sufficed to fit them for the assumption of the burdens of statehood. They were regarded as infant States, to be controlled during infancy by the Federal Government, just as individuals are controlled during infancy. But with reference to the District of Columbia and the Territories all practical guaranties as to life, liberty, and property were secured by the provisions of the Constitution relating to personal liberty, and by the provision securing uniformity as to indirect taxes and apportionment as to direct taxes.

The powers of Congress, then, as created in the Constitution, must be viewed in the light of the Declaration of Independence and the principles for which the war of independence was fought, and it is impossible to believe that any limitations put upon the legislative power, otherwise despotic, in favor of individual rights, individual liberties, and individual lives, and for the purpose of securing equality of rights and uniformity of burdens, were intended to be applied only to that favored portion of the American people residing in the States and to be denied to that portion residing in the Territories.

The character of the Revolutionary fathers, the principles for which they contended, and the history of the times all prove that while their purpose was to make the people of the States the source of government, the Government itself was to be equal and just and to extend over the entire American people, whether living in States or in Territories.

Under such a system of government indefinite expansion over uninhabited territory fitted to the development of our race or over populated territory containing peoples capable of assimilation and of sharing with us the blessings of free government and of maintaining their liberties is possible. The difference between the imperialists and the anti-imperialists on this question is that the imperialists wish to expand our territory and to contract our Constitution. The anti-imperialists are opposed to any expansion of territory which, as a matter of necessity, arising from the ignorance and inferiority of the people occupying it, makes free constitutional government impracticable or undesirable.

PRINCIPLES OF LIBERTY.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] remarked that the guaranties of liberty were the heritage of the Anglo-Saxon race; that we required no written constitution, no parchment upon which the great principles of liberty should be written; that these principles landed at Jamestown and Plymouth Rock with our colonial fathers, and were written upon the hearts of the American people.

What were these principles? The principles of Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights. Now, our forefathers were part of the great English people. The heritage which they had was the heritage of Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights. The principles which were written upon their hearts were the principles of those great instruments. But were those principles written upon the heart of George III, a kinsman, an Englishman? Were they written upon the hearts of the British Parliament, against whose oppressions and exactions our colonial forefathers rebelled? And did not the lesson of that experience imprint itself upon their hearts and compel them, in shaping a government in this country, to write in parchment, in the permanent law of the country, only to be changed after long effort, careful deliberation, and supreme consideration, the great principles regarding individual rights and property for which they had contended?

And is it not possible that history may repeat itself and that our subjects in the Philippine Islands may find that those principles of liberty are not so written upon the hearts of the members of the American Congress as to prevent them from exercising the harsh and oppressive power which the gentlemen must admit is inherent in absolutism, whether exercised or not?

CHECKS AND BALANCES.

Now, I said that we had organized a system of checks and balances, with absolute power nowhere. The framers of the Constitution in creating that instrument expressed a distrust not only of the representatives of the people but their distrust of the people themselves. They put not only the representatives of the people but the people themselves in chains by that organic act. They proposed thereby to protect the people not only from the uncontrolled power in their representatives but from their own violence.

By the creation of a House of Representatives which could negative the action of the Senate, by the creation of a Senate which could negative the action of the House, by the creation of an Executive who could veto the action of both, they put limits everywhere upon inconsiderate action; and then by limiting certain powers, prohibiting others, and reserving to the States and to the people of the United States the remaining powers of sovereignty, they secured a Government intended to guard the rights of a strong people, not to crush the liberties of a weak people. A strong Government because of the individualism and strength of its people, not strong because of its absolutism over a weak people.

THE CANTER CASE.

Now, I wish to review for a few moments the decisions to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] alluded in his argument yesterday. Thus far I have taken only a general view of the Constitution, and have considered it in the light of history, in the light of the experiences of our fathers, in the light of their contention for human liberty everywhere.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania relies mainly upon the case of the American Insurance Company against Canter (1 Peters, 511), upon the Tampico case, and one or two other cases of similar import.

In the Canter case certain bales of cotton contained in a vessel wrecked off the coast of Florida were seized by the salvors under the law of the Territory of Florida, and were sold under the decree of an inferior court organized by the legislature of that Territory. And the question was whether the decree changed the property to the purchaser under that salvage sale. It was contended on the one hand that the judicial power of the United States extended to admiralty cases; that the judicial power of the United States was to be exercised only by certain courts provided for by the Constitution, the tenure of office in which should be during good behavior; and it was contended that jurisdiction in an admiralty case could be given only to a constitutional court.

The Supreme Court met this contention by declaring that these inferior courts were not constitutional courts; that their judges held for a term of years and not for life; that they were inferior courts, organized by the Territory of Florida, acting under the sanction of Congress, which in itself was acting either under the general powers of sovereignty, to be inferred from the right to acquire, or under that provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to make needful rules and regulations regarding the territory of the United States.

It is true that these inferior courts, though organized under the authority of the United States, were not constitutional courts. They were local courts, for in the Territories, of course, the Federal Government has not only the powers of the Federal Government but the powers of a State and municipal government. It can act directly with reference to the Territories, or it can delegate its powers to a legislature to be organized under the laws of the United States in the Territories. There is no question of the power of the United States to organize, in a Territory, inferior courts of local jurisdiction. The only question is whether an admiralty case is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and whether jurisdiction in such a case can be conferred upon or exercised by any but a constitutional court, a court of the United States organized under the Constitution with judges enjoying life tenure.

Now, I admit that case bears against us, if a case of salvage is a case of exclusive Federal jurisdiction. I have not been able to look into the question whether jurisdiction in a case of salvage can be exercised concurrently by the United States courts and by the State courts. If it can be exercised concurrently, then clearly the case does not bear against us.

THE TAMPICO CASE.

The next case was the Tampico case (Fleming vs. Page, 9 How., page 603). There, during the Mexican war, the possession and control of Tampico was secured by our arms.

The Supreme Court in that case, involving the right of a collection port of the United States to exact duties upon goods imported from Tampico, then in the possession of the United States military authorities as conquered territory, declared that the genius and character of our institutions were peaceful; that the power to declare war was not conferred upon Congress for the purpose of aggression or aggrandizement, but to enable the General Government to vindicate by arms its own rights and the rights of its citizens; that a war declared by Congress could not be presumed to be waged for the purpose of conquest; nor could the law declaring the war "imply an authority to the President to enlarge the limits of the United States by subjugating the enemy's territory;" that the boundaries of the United States could not be enlarged by mere military occupation, and so the court held in that case that Tampico was a foreign port even though it was under the control of our military authorities and had been conquered in war; that it could not become a domestic port except through the action of the treaty-making power or the legislative power; that the duty of the President was merely military, and that whilst he might invade a hostile country and subject it to the sovereignty of the United States, his conquest did not enlarge the boundaries of the Union nor extend the operation of our institutions or laws beyond the limits before assigned to them by the legislative power.

The whole reasoning of the case was that the boundaries of the United States could not be enlarged by conquest, but only by the action of the treaty-making power or the legislative power, and confirms our contention that when territory is ceded to the United States by treaty it then becomes domestic, not foreign; that the boundaries of the United States are enlarged so as to include it; that the Constitution of the United States applies to it. It will be observed that the court said that conquests do not enlarge the boundaries of the United States, but that cession through the treaty-making power does. What United States? The political United States, consisting of the States composing the Union; the United States that governs, or the geographical United States, consisting of States and Territories, the United States that is governed? Clearly the latter.

The boundaries of the political United States can only be enlarged by the admission of a new State; the boundaries of the geographical United States can be enlarged by the acquisition of territory as the result of the treaty-making power or the legislative power; and it is in that sense that the term "United States" is used in all portions of the Constitution relating not to the source of government but to the powers of government.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The United States in the aggregate, and not the several States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

So also in other cases the courts have recognized the doctrine that ports in ceded territory are not to be regarded as domestic ports until Congress extends the customs laws to them. Was this doctrine declared because they were not part of the territory of the United States, or was it because the machinery for collecting duties was lacking? Clearly the latter. With reference to newly acquired territory, the municipal law in existence there is maintained until the country to which the cession is made exercises the power of sovereignty. There can be no such thing as collecting revenue in ceded territory unless the machinery of the law is there, and the machinery of the law can only be introduced there by the creation of collection districts by Congress, and until then these ceded ports are not regarded by the administrative department as domestic ports.

CROSS VS. HARRISON.

And yet the Supreme Court in the case of Cross against Harrison (16 Howard, page 164), a later case, takes from the gentleman even the contention which he bases upon the Tampico case, and the administrative action regarding ports in ceded territory, in which the machinery of collection has not been established. The case of Cross against Harrison arose whilst California was under military rule. It was under military rule before the cession as a result of its conquest. It was under military rule after its cession, simply because the United States Congress had not chosen to legislate regarding it.

The collector of that district was an appointee of the military commander, who, under the military law and as an incident of military occupation, could himself construct such a system of revenue and such a system of imposts and duties as to himself seemed fit.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Nevada excuse me for an interruption one moment to call his attention to the fact that in none of those cases did the military power set up a tariff different from that already enacted by the laws of the United States. They merely put into existence the same local laws of the ports of the country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was about to make that remark. The military governor there had, prior to the cession, imposed, if I recollect aright, certain duties upon imports, and after the cession and before the collection district was organized, and before the machinery of the law had been extended to San Francisco by the Federal authorities, he arbitrarily established other duties, the duties then imposed by the laws of the United States upon goods coming to the ports of the United States from foreign countries; and in that case the Supreme Court of the United States declared that immediately upon the cession the Constitution and laws of the United States, so far as they can be enforced, extended to the territory ceded.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman from Nevada allow me an interruption?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will.

Mr. GAINES. Is it not an historical fact that before the Constitution was formed, and while it was being formed, but before it was ratified, territory was ceded by several States to the United States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. Now, I was referring to the case of Cross against Harrison. There the military commander, after the cession, had fixed the duties provided by the laws of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that immediately upon cession, and without the action of Congress at all, the Constitution and the laws applied to the ceded territory, and held that, as the Constitution itself provided that the duties throughout the United States should be uniform, it was the constitutional duty of the President of the United States to enforce the Constitution, and that the collection of the duties by the military collector, under the military commander, was entirely legal. Justice Wayne said:

The right claimed to land foreign goods within the United States at any place out of a collection district, if allowed, would be in violation of that provision in the Constitution which enjoins that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. * * * As to the denial of the authority of the President to prevent the landing of foreign goods in the United States out of a collection district, it is only necessary to say that if he did not do so it would be a neglect of his constitutional obligation to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

California, then a ceded territory, was declared by Mr. Justice Wayne to be "within the United States" and subject to the provision of the Constitution which provides for uniformity in customs duties "throughout the United States." Does it not, therefore, follow that Puerto Rico, a ceded territory, is also within the United States and is protected by the same provision of the Constitution?

TERRITORIES AS INFANT STATES.

Now, let me refer to the authorities which are confirmatory of the position which I have assumed, that the United States was organized with all the elements of expansion in it, that expansion to take the form of admission of new States and of territory regarded as infant States, later on to become sovereign States of the Union when able to sustain the burdens of statehood.

You have already heard both the controlling and dissenting opinions in the case of Scott against Sanford (19 Howard, page 432). I am aware that it is a malodorous case for the reason that it led to our civil war, and yet it has never been overruled; and certainly as not only the judges rendering the decision, but the dissenting judges agree as to our theory of government, it is both controlling and persuasive. In all these opinions, in the utterances of Chief Justice Taney for the majority, in the utterances of Justice McLean and Justice Curtis for the minority, no variance of opinion, but, on the contrary, unanimity of opinion is expressed on this subject.

Chief Justice Taney said:

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States.

* * * * * * *

The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given, and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of a territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

Justice McLean, of the minority, said:

In organizing the government of a Territory, Congress is limited to means appropriate to the attainment of the constitutional object. No powers can be exercised which are prohibited by the Constitution or which are contrary to its spirit, so that, whether the object may be the protection of the persons and property of purchasers of the public lands or of communities who have been annexed to the Union by conquest or purchase, they are initiatory to the establishment of State governments, and no more power can be claimed or exercised than is necessary to the attainment of the end. This is the limitation of all the Federal powers.

Mr. Justice Curtis said:

Since, then, this power was manifestly conferred to enable the United States to dispose of its public lands to settlers, and to admit them into the Union as States, when in the judgment of Congress they should be fitted therefor; since these were the needs provided for; since it is confessed that government is indispensable to provide for those needs, and the power is to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory, I can not doubt that this is a power to govern the inhabitants of the Territory by such laws as Congress deems needful until they obtain admission as States.

Justice Curtis adds—remember this is the opinion of Justice Curtis, of Massachusetts, the leader of the minority in that great case—

If, then, this clause does contain a power to legislate respecting the Territory, what are the limits to that power? To this I answer that in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress it finds limits in the express prohibitions of Congress not to do certain things; that in the exercise of the legislative power Congress can not pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder, and so in respect to each of the other prohibitions contained in the Constitution.

Now, what are these prohibitions? The prohibited powers of Congress are:

No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.
No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States.
The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury.
No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.
No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

These prohibitions, then, apply to the action of Congress wherever it acts, whether with reference to Territories or with reference to area of the States composing the Union.

Now, let us look at a few amendments, to the right secured by the first eight amendments.

The first eight amendments to the Constitution secure freedom of religion, freedom of speech and of the press, freedom of the right of the people to assemble and to petition the Government for redress of grievances, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures.

They also provide for presentment or indictment by a grand jury; that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense; that no person shall be compelled in a criminal action to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor be deprived of private property for public use without just compensation. They secure the right of a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury, and the preservation of the right of trial by jury in suits at common law. They provide that excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel or unjust punishment inflicted.

Mr. Justice Curtis says:

If, then, this clause does contain the power to legislate respecting the territory, what are the limits to that power? To this I answer that, in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress, it finds limits in the express prohibitions of Congress not to do certain things.

Then I ask you, if the prohibitions are operative to control Congress, will not the limitations of power control it? A limitation of power is a prohibition of power, except to the extent to which that power is granted.

What is the limitation with reference to duties? The limitation of uniformity. The Constitution says, "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." No law regarding duties shall be ununiform. Is not this as emphatic a prohibition as "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed?" Are the words "United States" words of contraction or of emphasis? Do they mean the whole or a part only of the national domain? Chief Justice Marshall, in Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, page 317), says in construing this clause of the Constitution, in an opinion which our opponents declare to be dictum:

The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories.

This would be sufficient to condemn the pending bill; but I have preferred to take the larger view of the question, which includes our policy as to all our new possessions, my contention being that our Constitution is one of restricted powers; that it applies to every inch of territory upon which it is intended that our flag shall permanently fly; that it involves the ultimate incorporation in the Union and the participation with us in the exercise of the powers of government of all annexed territories, and that the annexation of inferior peoples of lower capacity and cheaper labor involves not only danger to our institutions but to our whole industrial system, dangers sure to lead to unrest, civil disturbance, and internal war.

OMNIPOTENCE OF CONGRESS.

I contend that there is no basis for this new theory that Congress is omnipotent as to Territories, and have endeavored to show both by consideration of the provisions of the Constitution, as well as by the history antedating and contemporaneous with its formation, that the very purpose was to prevent that omnipotence assured to Parliament by the British constitution. We speak of the British constitution. No such constitution exists. Parliament is unlimited in its powers. It can, if it chooses, pass bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, laws depriving people of their property for public use without just compensation. There is no limitation upon the powers of Parliament save such as the good judgment and wisdom of the members themselves may impose.

The sovereign there would not dare to exercise the power of veto; it would involve a revolution. Our forefathers were escaping from the omnipotence of Parliament, and they determined that in organizing a representative body here they would put in the organic act those prohibitions and limitations which would prevent Congress from becoming omnipotent, as Parliament had been. One of these amendments prohibits Congress from interfering with freedom of religion. In the case of Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 162) the court said:

Congress can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids such legislation.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says: "But with reference to all the territories that have hitherto been acquired by the United States, the custom of Congress has been, by the organic act creating certain territory, to extend to them the Constitution and the laws." And he claims that the Constitution has operated in such territories not by reason of its own strength, but by reason of the acts of Congress extending it. If that be true, then the act of Congress extending the Constitution, being merely statutory law, can be amended or repealed by Congress at any time.

If Congress can extend the Constitution by law, it can withdraw the Constitution by law. But you will observe that in this very case, a case relating to Utah, the court does not base its decision upon the fact that the Constitution had been extended to that Territory by Congress and was therefore operative not as the Constitution, but as a statutory enactment in the form of the organic act of the Territory; but it says that "Congress"—not the Territorial legislature, but Congress itself—"can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment of the Constitution expressly prohibits such legislation."

In the case of Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S., 707), involving the operation of the Constitution in a Territory, the court says:

> In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common-law cases. The act of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule and could not be treated as attempting to do so.

The seventh amendment secured unanimity; and Congress itself in dealing with a Territory—in making an organic law for a Territory—can not impart to the legislative body of that Territory power to change the constitutional rule. If Congress itself regarding a Territory could act regardless of the constitutional rule, could it not impart that power to a legislature created in a Territory by this act for the purpose of local government?

And in Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 346), Justice Harlan said:

> That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

It will thus be seen that the provisions of the Constitution are extended, not as an act of grace on the part of Congress, but as a matter of constitutional right, the Constitution itself being the organic law controlling the entire Territory, limiting the powers of Congress itself in its action upon such Territory.

And in Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S., 15) the court says:

> In the exercise of this sovereign dominion——

"This sovereign dominion"—just as the dominion of a legislature may be called a sovereign dominion over the State; but that does not imply that it is an absolutism. The sovereignty spoken of is the limited sovereignty to which I have referred.

> In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of the Government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied in its terms.

In the case of the American Publishing Company vs. Fisher (166 U. S., 464), Justice Brewer declared that the question as to whether the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, regarding the right of trial by jury, "operates ex proprio vigore to invalidate this statute may be a matter of dispute."

That language was used in 166 United States; and Justice Brewer probably bases this statement upon the loose language used by Mr. Justice Bradley, in which he declared that the limitations in favor of personal rights which are formulated in the Constitution and its amendments—> would exist rather by inference and the general spirit of the Constitution, from which Congress derives all its powers, than by any express and direct application of its provisions.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Why does the gentleman call the language of Justice Brewer "loose language?"

Mr. NEWLANDS. Simply because it is loose language to speak of limitations by inference, restrictions by implication, when the Constitution itself, by its express limitations and prohibitions, restrains the power of Congress, and nothing whatever is left to implication or inference.

Now, then, Justice Brewer says that it "may be a question of dispute;" but recollect that in the case of Springville vs. Thomas, decided by the same court and after this case in which Justice Brewer declared that it might be a matter of dispute as to whether the Constitution operated ex proprio vigore, the court says the act of Congress could not impart to a Territory the power to change the constitutional rule.

A MEMBER. That was in the Utah case?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

EXPANSION UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

Now, in support of my contention that the Constitution contemplated the admission of new States, and as incidental thereto the acquisition of new territory from which new States could be created, I refer again to the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, 317), wherein, speaking of the restrictions of the Constitution, he says:

> The difference between requiring a continent, with an immense population, to submit to be taxed by a government having no common interest with it, separated from it by a vast ocean, restrained by no principle of apportionment, and associated with it by no common feelings, and permitting the representatives of the American people, under the restrictions of our Constitution, to tax a part of the society which is either in a state of infancy advancing to manhood, looking forward to complete equality as soon as that state of manhood shall be attained, as is the case with the Territories, or which has voluntarily relinquished the right of representation and has adopted the whole body of Congress for its legitimate government, as is the case with the District, is too obvious not to present itself to the minds of all.

Chief Justice Marshall was meeting the contention that no Federal tax could be imposed in the District of Columbia because the people of the District were not represented in the taxing body, and insisted that such contention could not be maintained. The District of Columbia was a very limited area of unoccupied territory, ceded by Virginia and Maryland as the seat of the Federal Government, the people of which could, if they wished, secure representation in government by maintaining their citizenship in the adjoining States, and who would be deemed by reason of living here under such conditions to have consented to government by Congress. Chief Justice Marshall draws the distinction between taxation under such conditions and the taxation of a colony by the mother country. Then, referring to the Territories, he finds justification for imposing taxes without representation in the fact that the Territory was in a state of infancy advancing toward manhood, afterwards to be admitted into the Union with the right of representation as a sovereign State.

Then in another case, in Weber against Harbor Commissioners (18 Wallace, 65), Justice Field said:

> Although the title to the soil under tide waters of the bay was acquired by the cession from Mexico equally with the title to the upland, they held it only in trust for the future States.

And in the case of Knight vs. United States Land Association (142 U. S. Reports, page 183) Justice Lamar said:

> Upon the acquisition of the territory from Mexico the United States acquired the title to the tide lands equally with the title to the upland, but with respect to the former they held it only in trust for the future States that might be erected out of such territory.

And in the case of Shively vs. Bowlby (152 U. S. Reports, 48) Justice Gray held the same doctrine.

What did they hold? That upon the cession of territory the United States acquired the title to soil under the tide waters equally with the title to the uplands; but that they held the title to the tide lands in trust. For whom? For the people of the United States? For this absolutism which, it is now contended, exists? For the States composing the Union? By no means. But in trust for the future States to be erected out of such territory, such trust to be sacredly maintained until the manhood of the cestui que trust was attained.

This, then, Mr. Chairman, is what we contend for in reference to these islands: That if they are acquired as a part of the territory of the United States we hold that territory, with its population, as infant States to be hereafter admitted into the United States, and we hold the tide lands in such territory for the future States to be created out of them. And, sir, the only way we can escape bringing this people within our tariff laws, within our body politic—the only way, I repeat, to keep them outside of our political and industrial system—is to declare now that we hold them not as territory of the United States—as infant States hereafter to be admitted as sovereign States—but that we hold these islands in trust for the people of those islands, to be turned over to them with complete independence when a satisfactory government shall be organized there capable of accepting the transfer of Spain's sovereignty, through the United States as intermediary, and capable of maintaining order and fulfilling international obligations.

HAWAII.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If it would not interrupt the gentleman from Nevada, I would like to make a suggestion to him in this connection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand the argument of the gentleman to be that upon the acquisition of territory, as in the case of Puerto Rico or the Philippines, the Constitution at once extends itself and operates by its limitations upon the legislation of Congress?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hold in my hand a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] in the last Congress, which afterwards passed into law, in which I find the following:

> Until legislation shall be enacted extending the United States customs laws and regulations to the Hawaiian Islands the existing customs relations of the Hawaiian Islands with the United States and other countries shall remain unchanged.

Now, if the Constitution, of its own motion, proceeded to Hawaii when the treaty was ratified, the limitation in the matter of customs regulations and the assessment of customs duties at once operated and forbade Congress to make a different rate of duty in the Hawaiian Islands from that which is enforced against other foreign countries. And yet I find that the gentleman, in a very able speech made in the last Congress, defended the very proposition and insisted upon the right of Congress to legislate upon that very question in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman hand me the resolution?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will take great pleasure in doing so.

Mr. GAINES. Did not that resolution provide that the local laws should continue, save those which conflicted with the Federal Constitution?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, will the gentleman from Tennessee let me fight this out myself?

Mr. GAINES. You did not read all the resolution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I read every word that related to that subject.

Mr. GAINES. It was provided that that should be the law unless it interfered with the Constitution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all.

Mr. GAINES. You will find that the law of the treaty.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very familiar with the resolutions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is verbatim in the act as passed. There was not a single amendment to the original resolution—not a single word.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In the first place, I will say to the gentleman that if there is anything in these resolutions inconsistent with the contention which I now make, it is because I was not as well informed when these resolutions were drawn as I am now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a very successful answer.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But I will say, in further explanation of this clause—

That until legislation shall be enacted extending the United States customs laws and regulations to the Hawaiian Islands, the existing customs relations of the Hawaiian Islands with the United States and other countries shall remain unchanged—

That there are two classes of opinions in the decisions of the United States Supreme Court regarding this question, some contending that the ports in ceded territory, until the machinery of the customs laws of the United States is extended to them, must be regarded as foreign ports, and the other, as in the case of Cross against Harrison, contending that the territory, as soon as it is ceded, becomes subject to the Constitution and the laws and that it is the duty of the President of the United States to see that the customs laws of the United States are enforced there. These resolutions were resolutions of annexation, not an act for the government of Hawaii. The object was to maintain all existing laws and revenues until Congress should have an opportunity of acting.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, but the precise question which he is discussing will now arise upon an entry of goods from Puerto Rico into the custom-house at New York and an attempt to levy the same duty upon those goods as would be levied if they came from the port of London?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And you hold what? That there could be no duty levied upon those goods now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. On the goods from Puerto Rico?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You say that they have a right to come in now without the payment of duty?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And, secondly, that Congress has no power to affix any duty at all?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is, if they were the products of Puerto Rico and not foreign goods that had passed through Puerto Rico?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course; and the only exception to that which could be justified would be the exception indicated in some of these opinions, which are evidently based upon the fact that the customs laws can not be enforced simply because the machinery of the law is lacking. Now, with reference to Puerto Rico, as to goods coming from San Juan to New York, there is to-day no collector of customs under the United States customs laws. I understand that as between domestic ports, vessels going from one port to the other, a clearance is made in one port by the collector there and entry is made in the other port by the collector there, and the machinery of the law being lacking the Constitution and the laws can not be enforced.

Now, when I say that the Constitution applies ex proprio vigore to the territory of the United States, I do not mean to say that if is self-executing. I mean to say that it is the organic law controlling the action of the Government there. The Government could neglect its duty; nothing could compel the Congress of the United States to organize the Supreme Court or to organize the interior judicial courts of the United States. It could absolutely neglect its plain constitutional duty, and for this there would be no remedy. Thus the Constitution would be made inoperative; and so in reference to the machinery of the law regarding the collection of customs, Congress might possibly, by a failure to appoint a collector in the ceded Territories——

Mr. GILBERT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS (continuing). By failing to create the machinery make the Constitution inoperative; but in doing so Congress violates its plain constitutional duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will.

Mr. GILBERT. Now, assuming that the argument of the other side is right, that the Constitution of the United States does not act ex propria vigore in the islands and that there are no laws of this Government in force except such as Congress may enact; assuming that their major premise is sound; I want to know what authority there is in this statute to impose any punishment for a violation of this act. This bill of the majority contains this provision—extending the laws relating to the customs, including those relating to the punishment for crime in connection with the enforcement of such law, over the island of Puerto Rico and of adjacent islands.

Now, I wish you, while you have the floor, as your time has been extended unlimitedly, to point out in this bill where there are any punishments provided for a violation of this proposed bill and whether there is any provision in this bill establishing a collector's district, as indicated by the majority report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. GILBERT. Assuming, now, that the majority report contains the correct law, and that the Constitution of the United States does not extend to Puerto Rico, and the Federal statutes do not extend there, and common law is not in force there, where, under this law, can there be any punishment inflicted for a disregard of it, and where, in the provisions of this law, do you find any establishment of a collector's district? Where is there any kind of machinery to put this bill into operation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I submit to the gentleman that it would be much better to present that question to one of the gentlemen who favor the bill. [Laughter.] I am opposed to the bill, and I think that a reply would come with better grace from the other side.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption on account of the question that was propounded to him by the gentleman from Ohio a few moments ago?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield, Mr. Chairman, but I wish to be considerate of the rights of others in this debate, and I would not like to occupy the floor too long.

Mr. GAINES. I read from our treaty, so called, by which the Hawaiian Islands were annexed to the United States:

The existing treaties of the Hawaiian Islands with foreign nations shall forthwith cease and determine, being replaced by such treaties as may exist, or as may be hereafter concluded, between the United States and such foreign nations. The municipal legislation of the Hawaiian Islands, not enacted for the fulfillment of the treaties so extinguished, and not inconsistent with this joint resolution nor contrary to the Constitution of the United States nor to any existing treaty of the United States, shall remain in force until the Congress of the United States shall otherwise determine.

I had this in mind when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] interrupted you. I ask these questions for the opposition to answer, if they will. If the Constitution did not apply or extend to Hawaii, why did Congress insert in this treaty the clause or limitation found in these words, "nor contrary to the Constitution of the United States?" If a municipal or local law of those islands "contrary to the Constitution" was null and void by the very words, as you see, of this treaty, then the Constitution did and does extend to those islands. I now ask this: Can Congress pass a law for these islands, or for Puerto Rico, that is binding, which is "contrary to the Constitution?"

Can Congress say what shall not be "contrary to the Constitution?" Of course not. That task is for the courts. It has been repeatedly held by our highest courts that a law passed by Territorial legislatures "contrary to the Constitution of the United States is void," which goes to prove that Congress is without power to enact laws beyond the limitation of or its powers granted. It will be noticed that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] did not read the language I here quote.

CONTENTION UNNECESSARY.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, in conclusion, that we are engaged, in my judgment, in an unnecessary contention regarding the future of these islands. We agree as to Hawaii. That is an outpost in the Pacific, controlling our defensive line from the Aleutian Islands to San Diego, and in the possession of a hostile power it could be made the base of an attack upon our entire coast, involving pernaps the destruction of our coast marine.

The annexation of Hawaii also involved absolutely the acquisition of the only intermediate port between the Orient and our country. It involved the defense of our coast. It involved economy in the military and naval expenditure of the country. There were no complex problems in regard to the people occupying those islands. Only 100,000 people occupied them. They had been practically assimilated and were in sympathy with our institutions and our whole system of government. Their acquisition involved no industrial derangement in this country, for they had practically, by reason of the reciprocity treaty, been incorporated into our industrial system.

We also agree as to Cuba. We propose to carry out in good faith our plan of pacification and turn over that island to a government of its own people.

We also agree we will consider in the future, when economic conditions compel Cuba to knock at our door for admission into the Union, as to whether it is wise, safe, and advantageous to do so.

With reference to Puerto Rico we all agree that no great danger to the industrial system of this country can come from the acquisition of Puerto Rico. It lies there on a line to the Gulf, on the route to the future Nicaragua Canal, and comes legitimately within our scheme of expansion involving continental territory on the northern hemisphere and adjacent islands. Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Cuba, we all—both imperialists and anti-imperialists—agree, constitute a part of legitimate expansion of both our territory and our Government.

As to these islands in the Philippine group, 7,000 miles away, we all agree, whatever may have been the mistakes of commission or omission in the past, that as the Government of Spain has been destroyed, as the government of the Filipinos themselves has been destroyed, and they present unending complications arising from the diverse nature of the tribes, differences in language, differences in customs, that we must slowly build up the fabric of self-government there, that our army must be maintained there, that the sovereign power of the United States must be sustained there, and we only differ as to the ultimate disposition of those islands, as to whether they shall remain permanently a part of the United States or whether we shall hold them in trust for their own people and ultimately grant them independence. This is the only contention.

Do the advantages, unascertained and unknowable, to be gained by the retention of these islands compensate us for abandoning our theory of government, the traditions of our people, and the constitutional government which we exercise? Do they warrant us in abandoning all the teachings of the past? Do they warrant us in the contention that this Government is a limited sovereignty here and can be absolute despotism elsewhere? Are we warranted by any of these advantages, unknown and unascertainable, that are so indefinitely suggested, in marching into this maze of intricacies and complications?

The lines of action which the anti-imperialists suggest will give us a commercial hold upon the islands; will give us coaling stations and naval stations as part of our naval and commercial machinery; will secure the establishment of currents of trade which can not be deflected. The people of this country do not want territorial expansion in the Orient; they want commercial expansion, and they want commercial expansion which will not endanger the political or industrial system of this country. The labor of this country is now on stilts, away above the labor level of the rest of the world, and however people may differ in theory as to the advantages and benefits of free trade or protection, that man would be a courageous man in this country who would knock the stilts from under labor and throw it to the ground writhing and struggling.

Remember the industrial disturbances created in 1894 by the Pullman strike, the result purely of economic conditions brought about by readjustment in our financial and industrial system. The country was upon the verge of a civil war. Economic changes are the most serious changes that any government can contemplate. However justified they may be in theory, they always result in temporary derangement and disorder to the labor and finances of the country. So far as I am concerned I wish to maintain the present level of wages in this country. I would not do anything that would diminish the price of the product which the American laborer makes, when that price is essential to the maintenance of the wage he receives.

And here to-day, after years of legislation in protecting ourselves against the products of the cheap labor of other countries, in protecting ourselves by immigration laws, intending to exclude the inferior and cheaper classes of labor throughout the world, we deliberately take the step which upon our contention will, and even upon your contention may, include within this Union 9,000,000 people with absolute freedom of access to your capital, with absolute freedom of access to the mother country, with absolute freedom of access to every part of our country, who will be invited here in swarms by speculators in labor, as were the Chinese to this country and as are the Japanese to Hawaii.

What would be thought to-day of the proposition of annexing China and Japan and bringing them within our tariff wall? Why, the thinking men for years have dwelt upon the danger of arousing the productive capacity of the Orient. The Chinese were invited to California under laws which protected their coming, and the people of that State welcomed them. At first the feeling against them was regarded as a low and vulgar race prejudice. The Chinese gradually advanced and captured the different industries on that coast, first the boot and shoe industry, the woolen industry, the cigar industry, and as they advanced upon the vineyards and orchards and into the field, thinking men realized that American civilization was in danger, and we passed laws prohibiting the immigration of these people into our country.

To-day the Japanese are coming into our country, they are rushing into Hawaii, and they will doubtless migrate to this country in large numbers. I heard an intelligent manufacturer from New England, the present minister to Italy, say four years ago that if he were a young man and proposed to establish a manufacturing industry he would go to Japan for its location. The cheapness, intelligence, and efficiency of the labor there would make its competition most potent, if taken within our tariff walls.

FILIPINO COMPETITION.

Now, I have seen in a very thoughtful review of the Philippine Islands, in a statistical abstract presented by the Treasury Department, the statement that the Philippine Islands, with the quickness and adjustability of that race, and with their great resources, will reach out and surpass Japan.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the gentleman please state from what source he derives the statement to which he has just referred?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is in the abstract of the Bureau of Statistics regarding the Philippine Islands. I have it here. I will read a sentence. It states:

The Philippines will also play a part in the industries of the future equal to, if not surpassing, Japan

Such information as we can gather points to the conclusion that the natives of the Philippines possess a high degree of intelligence, alertness, and industrial adaptability. They are quick with their heads and their hands, in this respect resembling the Japanese.

Following the annexation of the Philippines there will be a great influx into these islands of American capital, which will be employed partly in the production of sugar and tobacco, affecting thus our own interests in the raising of these staples and partly also in manufacturing industries. At first such industries will be intended only to supply the local demand in the archipelago, but as the aptitude of the natives for pursuits of this kind is developed and the advantages of cheap labor are realized, the business of manufacturing for export to the United States will begin to grow, assuming that there is free trade. Once started, there will be no doubt that it will advance rapidly, trans-Pacific rates of transportation being so low as to offer little hindrance.

The danger will be, under the conditions suggested, that whilst the sugar and tobacco of the Philippines will compete with ours in our own markets, we shall have no compensating opportunity to sell our products there. Probably, instead of buying our manufactures, the Filipinos will ship theirs to us; and if so, the balance of trade will turn largely against us. From our point of view to-day we can hardly imagine the possible extent of this industrial competition or prescribe its limits.

It is probable that at first the natives of the archipelago, if taken inside of our tariff wall, will turn to the production of cotton goods and possibly silk fabrics, but the quickness of their heads and hands will soon enable them to adapt themselves to almost any kind of manufactures.

They may also become dangerous competitors in the growing of cotton, as the islands are well adapted in respect to soil and climate for the production of that staple. For reasons of her own, Spain made it a part of her policy to discourage cotton growing in the Philippines; otherwise it is probable that this industry would already be flourishing in the archipelago. The expectation of the Southern States that the Philippines will open a market for American cotton may never be realized. It is much more likely that they will become rivals in the business of cotton growing, and besides this, if the Constitution applies, the Filipinos will have access to the United States. It has been urged that being accustomed to a tropical climate they will not want to come here, but it must be considered that a large portion of this country has a climate sufficiently warm for the Filipinos, who would not suffer from a change of residence to California, Arizona, New Mexico, and the Southern States.

American labor has been able to maintain itself at its present elevation by the laws limiting and restraining the importation of the products of cheap foreign labor and preventing the wholesale migration of cheap labor into this country from abroad. It can be easily imagined what will be the effect of putting inside of our governmental and industrial system 9,000,000 people possessing a high degree of industrial aptitude and accustomed to a scale of wages and mode of living appropriate to Asiatics.

Such are the evils of incorporating the Philippines into our governmental and industrial system; but let us assume that there are no constitutional objections to the plans of the imperialists; assume that we can pass discriminating laws restricting the entry of their products and the migration of their peoples to this country, but facilitating the entry of our products and the migration of our people to theirs. Can such a system, founded on injustice, last?

It is contended by no one that there is room for the occupation of these islands by an American population. The climate is unsuited to them, and, besides, the ground is already occupied, not by a barbaric people, such as the Indians, but by semicivilized people owning the land, cultivating the soil, and enjoying the rights of property. Their land can not be occupied by us; it is already occupied by them. All that we can acquire is the right to govern. Do we wish to govern simply for the sake of governing? Our Government, it is clear, can get no advantage, there will be nothing but expense. We can never divert any portion of the revenue of a subject country into our Treasury; that is a system which England herself has long since abandoned. Assuming that the islands will pay their own expenses we will then have the responsibility without profit.

Who, then, will profit? Perhaps the carriers of goods and of immigrants; perhaps those who go there to exploit the cheap labor of the country. How will they exploit it? Simply by raising products in that country with cheap labor that we raise in this country with expensive labor. Their profit will come out of the consumers of this country and at the expense of our domestic producers. If we wish to sell wheat, corn, and agricultural implements, and manufactured goods, is it not better to sell them to sugar producers and tobacco producers upon our own soil rather than pass them by and send such products 7,000 miles away to sugar producers and tobacco growers there?

It should be recollected that we can never buy anything without giving something in return. We lose as much wealth as we acquire. We certainly can not expect to sell more than we buy very long, for if we sell to the Philippines for any great length of time more than we buy, the result would be that the Philippines would be denuded of their money and would be without purchasing power of any kind.

Duty, interest, and constitutional obligation, therefore, all point to the advantage of maintaining the integrity of our governmental and industrial system; of adhering to the humanitarian purpose with which we started out in the war; of pacifying the Philippines as we are pacifying Cuba; of erecting there a stable government under a constitution and laws which will protect the welfare of the Filipinos; of retaining there necessary coaling and naval stations; of cultivating the friendly feeling of the Filipinos, and thus building up an enduring commerce in the Orient upon the solid foundation of justice and peace. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration provides:

That on and after the passage of this act the same tariffs, customs, and duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported into Puerto Rico from ports other than those of the United States which are required by law to be collected upon articles imported into the United States from foreign countries.

It does not provide for free trade between the islands and the United States, but fixes the rate of duty that shall be paid on all imports from Puerto Rico into the United States at 25 per cent of the duties charged on like articles from other foreign ports, and provides also that all articles imported into Puerto Rico from the United States shall only pay 25 per cent of the rate of duty imposed there upon like articles from other foreign countries, with this proviso, that on all articles imported from Puerto Rico into the United States where internal-revenue duty is imposed in this country that the custom duty shall be 25 per cent of the duty imposed on like articles from foreign countries plus the revenue tax levied and collected on the articles produced or manufactured in this country. It will thus be seen that under this bill the question is presented as to whether Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, under the treaty of peace entered into between this Government and Spain, become integral parts of the United States or whether they can be treated as territory, and separate and distinct custom laws and internal-revenue laws imposed there from what are levied, collected, and paid in the United States. The issue presented in this bill, as thus briefly stated, is of paramount importance to the people of this country.

The treaty of peace negotiated between the United States and Spain was a great triumph of American diplomacy and American statesmanship. It fixed the terms of settlement at the conclusion of a war the most brilliant of any in the history of our country. There is a destiny that shapes the affairs of nations as well as of men. The American Republic in all of its splendid career has had the favoring countenance of an allwise and just God. Never in its history, however, has the interposition of Divine Providence been more manifest than in our relations with Spain in the late war.

I have neither the time nor the inclination to review in any detail the circumstances which led to the declaration of war against Spain. This is all familiar history, known to every member on the floor, and a subject with which the great mass of our fellow countrymen are entirely familiar. The war was declared by our Government in obedience to an almost universal demand of the American people. Party lines were obliterated, sectional differences forgotten, factional disturbances were laid aside, and the people, almost with the voice of one man, demanded of the Government of the United States not only a declaration of war but the expulsion of Spanish authority from the Western Hemisphere.

In the accomplishment of this great purpose the fortunes of war took Admiral Dewey, in the early hours of the morning on the 1st day of May, 1898, into the harbor of Manila. The brilliant naval engagement which followed eclipsed in splendor any sea fight of ancient or modern times. Lord Nelson, the great British admiral, in all of his wonderful career on the sea, never achieved so brilliant a victory as the one gained by Dewey over the Spanish fleet in Manila Harbor. That great naval battle not only placed Dewey's name among the immortals, but it fixed duties and responsibilities upon the Government of the United States so momentous, so far-reaching, that the wisest and ablest in our midst are unable to agree as to their proper solution. Four problems faced our commissioners when they assembled in Paris to negotiate the treaty of peace with the Spanish commissioners as to what disposition should be made of the Philippine Islands:

First, our Army and Navy could be withdrawn from the islands and Spain again be given the power and authority she was exercising at the time Admiral Dewey's fleet first sailed into Philippine waters. Second, the islands could be given over to the inhabitants themselves. Third, the islands could be taken and divided among European nations. Fourth, the islands could be held by the United States under the terms and stipulations expressed in the treaty of peace. The reasons that were urged by the people of this country for the expulsion of the Spaniards from Cuba were equally potent against our commissioners allowing Spain to reassert her sovereignty over the Philippine Islands. Our duty to humanity, to our own citizens, and the people of those islands demanded that the strong arm of this Government should be maintained there to provide against anarchy, bloodshed, and riot that would inevitably follow the turning of them over to the people themselves under present conditions. No self-respecting American, no lover of his country, ambitious for its future on land and sea, could for a moment think of that great archipelago, with its future possibilities, being turned over to the grasping ambition and avarice of the European nations, who are to-day attempting to absorb the greater part of the Asiatic and oriental trade from America. There was but one thing left for the American commissioners to do, and that was to provide for the cession of those islands to the United States.

The consensus of opinion in this country to-day, Mr. Chairman, approves the wise action of these able and distinguished commissioners. The people of this country unite in their approval of the President's course in all our relations with Spain; and history, I am sure, will vindicate also the wisdom of his course. When war was declared no one dreamed that the far-off Orient would witness the first scenes of hostilities between the two nations. Our thoughts, our expectations, and our hopes were all centered in the fleet that was to blockade Cuban ports, and in the army that was to invade Cuban soil.

The god of war ordained it otherwise, and placed under our naval and military control the islands which are to-day inhabited by millions of people representing various stages of political development, from savagery to civilization. I approve with my whole heart the cession of these islands to the United States, and I do not join with those who indulge in dark forebodings of the future because of the problems which have arisen on account of their acquisition.

I believe that the American Republic is destined to grow in all the elements that make a great nation more rapidly in the future than in the past and that its influence will be marked and potent among all the nations of the earth. I believe that these great results can be brought about without endangering our domestic institutions or without impairing those great principles of liberty and free government that are the heritage of every American citizen. I thank God that I was born an optimist instead of a pessimist; that I can see something good in men rather than evil; that political organizations are formed for the betterment of the people of our country rather than for corrupt purposes and the spoils of office, and that in our Government we can go on increasing our trade, our commerce, our population and wealth, and in all the elements that go to make up a great sovereignty, without impairing any of those conditions so sacred to the fathers of the Republic and so important a factor in the perpetuation of republican institutions.

I believe that the Constitution of the United States is broad enough and elastic enough to enable us to control the inhabitants of those islands and give them a larger liberty and a higher civilization than they have heretofore enjoyed without impairing in the least the integrity of our domestic institutions or entailing upon our people any additional taxation. I recognize the fact that it would be inopportune to engage in a long and elaborate argument to show what the powers are of our Government and the manner in which they should or can be exercised. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that these questions have been sufficiently discussed to satisfy every fair-minded man that the United States Government has the constitutional power to acquire these islands. If there is any doubting Thomas among us at this late day I would call his attention to the remarks of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of American Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters, 542), in which case, speaking for the court, he said:

> The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently, that Government possesses the powers of acquiring territory, either by conquest or treaty. * * * If it be ceded by the treaty, the acquisition is confirmed, and the ceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed, either on the terms stipulated in the treaty of cession or on such as its new master may impose.

There are many other decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which confirm the doctrine here announced. This is practically only asserting the sovereign power of the United States. When England recognized our independence, and we took a place among the sovereign nations of the earth, we took it with all the power and authority that can be exercised by any other independent sovereignty in all this world. The power of acquiring and of disposing of territory is an incident of sovereignty itself.

It could be exercised by the United States Government if there were nothing in the Constitution relating to the subject, but, as this great and eminent Chief Justice said, under the Constitution which unites the separate States into one grand Republic the article which provides for the declaration of war and the making of treaties carries with it the power to either acquire or dispose of territory at the sovereign will of the United States Government. Therefore the President, in authorizing his commissioners to enter into the articles of the treaty of peace between this Government and Spain, to acquire by cession from the Spanish Government Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, was simply exercising the sovereign rights inherent in our Government.

No man conversant with international law and familiar with the Constitution of the United States will contend for a moment that the acquisition of those islands was unconstitutional or beyond the power of the Government. As to what our relations to those islands shall be under the treaty of peace is, however, quite a different question. I have been greatly interested in the discussion which has been carried on in this House and in the Senate on this subject. Men whom I believe are honest in their convictions differ widely; some contend that by the very acquisition of those islands they become an integral part of the United States and that the inhabitants, varying as they do from savagery to semicivilization and perhaps to civilization, are guaranteed under our Constitution all the rights, privileges, and immunities that form the sacred inheritance of every American citizen. I have given very careful and anxious thought to that subject, and, speaking only for myself, I am entirely clear as to the status that will be held by the people of those islands and the relations that the islands themselves will bear to the Government of the United States under the Constitution.

You will note, Mr. Chairman, that in the treaty of peace itself our commissioners, with a wise forethought and a display of statesmanship that is creditable indeed, have provided in the ninth article of that treaty that "The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territory hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress," thus leaving the whole question open to be determined by the legislation that shall be enacted by this or future Congresses. I have very pronounced convictions on this subject. I believe that territory acquired by the United States as Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands have been acquired, under this treaty of peace between our Government and Spain, becomes the property of the United States Government and not a part of it, and that under the Constitution Congress can make such disposition of the islands as the members of the House and Senators may deem for the best interest of the people of this country and the inhabitants of the islands.

I believe, further, that under the reservation in the treaty by which the civil rights and the political status of the native inhabitants are to be determined by Congress we can make such legislation regarding them as we shall see fit, consistent with the principles of our free Republic. I am aware, sir, that in announcing this position I take issue with the great mass of the gentlemen who are opposed to the present Administration and who are seeking to embarrass the Government. But, sir, in assuming the power of the Government both over these islands and the people as well, I am announcing no new doctrine of constitutional law and am asserting no new principle of legislation. These principles which I maintain have been asserted by abler men and maintained by more cogent reasons than I can express. Chancellor Kent, in speaking on this very subject, said:

> It would seem from these various Congressional regulations of the Territories belonging to the United States (Territorial regulation acts) that Congress has supreme power in the government of them, depending on the exercise of their sound discretion. That discretion has hitherto been exercised in wisdom and good faith and with an anxious regard for the security of the rights and privileges of the inhabitants as defined and declared in the ordinance of July, 1787, and in the Constitution of the United States. "All admit," said Chief Justice Marshall, "the constitutionality of a Territorial government." But neither the District of Columbia nor a Territory is a State within the meaning of the Constitution or entitled to claim the privileges secured to the members of the Union. This has been so adjudged by the Supreme Court. Nor will a writ of error or appeal lie from a Territorial court to the Supreme Court unless there be a special statute provision for that purpose. * * * If, therefore, the Government of the United States should carry into execution the project of colonizing the great valley of the Columbia or Oregon River, to the west of the Rocky Mountains, it would afford a subject of grave consideration what would be the future civil and political destiny of that country. It would be a long time before it would be populous enough to be created into one or more independent States; and in the meantime, upon the doctrine taught by the acts of Congress, and even by the judicial decisions of the Supreme Court, the colonists would be in a state of the most complete subordination and as dependent upon the will of Congress as the people of this country would have been upon the King and Parliament of Great Britain if they could have sustained their claim to bind us in all cases whatsoever.—Commentaries, Vol. I, 385.

Judge Story, one of the ablest judges who ever sat upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, and whose work on the Constitution is a recognized authority in this country and in England, said:

> The power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal; and their legislation is subject to no control, but is absolute and unlimited, unless so far as it is affected by stipulations in the cessions, or by the ordinance of 1787, under which any part of it has been settled.—Commentaries, section 1328.

I think, sir, that a careful analysis of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States will support my contention that the ceded islands become the property of, and not an integral part of, the United States. In support of that position I desire to briefly call the attention of members of the House to what Mr. Justice Bradley said in the case of Mormon Church vs. United States (136 U. S., page 42):

> The power of Congress over the Territories of the United States is general and plenary, arising from and incidental to the right to acquire the territory itself and from the power given by the Constitution to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States. It would be absurd to hold that the United States has power to acquire territory and no power to govern it when acquired. The power to acquire territory * * * is derived from the treaty-making power and the power to declare and carry on war. The incidents of these powers are those of national sovereignty, and belong to all independent governments. The power to make acquisitions of territory, by treaty and by cession, is an incident of national sovereignty. The Territory of Louisiana, when acquired from France, and the Territories west of the Rocky Mountains, when acquired from Mexico, became the absolute property and domain of the United States, subject to such conditions as the Government, in its diplomatic negotiations, has seen fit to accept relating to the rights of the people then inhabiting those Territories. Having rightfully acquired said Territories, the United States Government was the only one which could impose laws upon them, and its sovereignty over them was complete. No State of the Union had any such right of sovereignty over them; no other country or government had any such right. These propositions are so elementary and so necessarily follow from the condition of things arising upon the acquisition of new territory that they need no argument to support them.

Long prior to the date of this decision Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Brenner vs. Porter (9 How., 242), said:

> They (speaking of Territories) are not organized under the Constitution nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government, as the organic law, but are the creations, exclusively, of the legislative department and subject to its supervision and control.

As late as February, 1898, this question was before the circuit court of appeals of the United States for the ninth district, and the doctrine here announced by the Supreme Court in the decisions to which I have referred was reaffirmed by that court. Mr. Justice Morrow, who delivered the opinion of the court, evidently reexamined the whole question and carefully considered all the authorities cited on the subject by the lawyers on both sides of the case and came to the conclusion which I have maintained here to-day, and which has been so tersely and beautifully expressed by Mr. Justice Bradley in the decision to which I have adverted. Mr. Justice Morrow, in speaking for the court, used the following language:

> The answer to these and other like objections urged in the brief of counsel for defendant is found in the now well-established doctrine that the Territories of the United States are entirely subject to the legislative authority of Congress. They are not organized under the Constitution, nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government as the organic law, but are the creation exclusively of the legislative department and subject to its supervision and control. (Benner vs. Porter, 9 How., 235, 242.) The United States, having rightfully acquired the territory, and being the only Government that can impose laws upon them, has the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and State. (Insurance Co. vs. Canter, 1 Pet., 511, 542; Cross vs. Harrison, 16 How., 164; National Bank vs. Yankton Co., 101 U. S., 129, 133; Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S., 15, 44, 5 Sup. Ct., 747; Late Corporation of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints vs. U. S., 181, 11 Sup. Ct., 949; Shively vs. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1, 48, 14, Sup. Ct., 548.) * * * It may legislate in accordance with the special needs of each locality, and vary its regulations to meet the conditions and circumstances of the people. Whether the subject elsewhere would be a matter of local police regulation or within State control under some other power it is immaterial to consider.

In a Territory all the functions of government are within the legislative jurisdiction of Congress, and may be exercised through a local government or directly by such legislation as we have now under consideration. (Endleman vs. United States, 86 Fed. Rep., 456.)

This, I think, is the latest expression on this subject by the courts. Gentlemen will see that it is in line with the spirit of the law as originally announced by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall and later by Mr. Justice Bradley. The members who are interested in the study of this question and who take any pleasure in examining the authorities will find that not only is the opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Morrow correct, but will also find that Mr. Justice Bradley, in the opinion on this subject rendered by him, collects and reviews all the intervening decisions from 1 Peters to the one which was rendered by him and which is published in 136 U. S. Reporter; so that I hazard nothing in saying that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the acquisition of territory where it is held as territory is the property of the United States. The Supreme Court in 18 Wallace, page 320, said:

During the term of their pupilage as Territories they are mere dependencies of the United States. All political authority exercised therein is derived from the General Government.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, my examination of this subject has caused me to express feelings of surprise that men question the constitutional status of these people under the treaty of peace, or question the status of the islands themselves, so far as the power and authority of the Congress of the United States over them is concerned. They may rely, however, upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in the Territories, to citizenship, and the apportionment of taxes, etc.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to inquire of the gentleman if he believes that had that part of the treaty for the purchase of Louisiana with France been omitted, could Congress have passed a law interfering with the religious liberty of the people of the Louisiana purchase?

Mr. HOPKINS. I want to say to the gentleman that if there had been no provision of that kind, the power of Congress would have been as unlimited as England in treating her colonies before the war of the Revolution, in the language of Judge Kent, and one as great as she exercises over her other provinces at the present time.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. One further question.

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not yield further.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It will be very brief.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Missouri I was attempting to show that under this constitutional provision the treaty of cession became the supreme law of the land, and enabled a person living within the limits of the Territory to invoke the powers of the Constitution in his behalf precisely as he would if he had lived within the limits of a State.

When we come to understand this, we can readily see that the Supreme Court of the United States in passing upon the question as to the right of trial by jury would use language that may be found in those decisions; that when they came to pass upon any of the questions relating to police powers they would use such language as they do without ever assuming the grave proposition that has been announced by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber in this debate.

I am well aware that expressions can be found in a number of cases decided by that great tribunal which give color to the position assumed by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, who contend that the Constitution ex proprio vigore extends to the Philippine Islands and Puerto Rico. I have carefully studied each of these decisions, and I think when they are properly considered they are in harmony with the position I assume and in harmony with the decisions of the courts which I have cited above in support of the doctrine that these newly acquired possessions are the property of the United States and subject to such legislation as Congress may see fit to enact respecting them. To properly understand those decisions it may be necessary to call the attention of the members of the House to the different treaties negotiated by this country with foreign countries in the acquisition of territory.

The first territory we acquired by treaty was during the year 1803, and is known as the Louisiana purchase. Article III of the treaty negotiated between this country and France reads as follows:

The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

When it is remembered that by Article VI of the Constitution "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land," it becomes apparent at once that when the treaty from which I have just quoted was approved by the President and the Senate it became the supreme law of the United States and extended to the citizens living within the limits of the Louisiana purchase the rights and privileges of citizens of the States. It is also apparent that this vast territory was acquired by the Government of the United States for the purpose of being incorporated into the Union and giving the inhabitants thereof all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the people of the thirteen original States.

Florida was ceded to the United States by Spain in 1819 under a treaty containing a similar provision to the one just quoted relating to the Louisiana territory. And the treaty by which New Mexico, California, Utah, and the other territory acquired from Mexico was ceded by that country to the United States contained a provision similar to that contained in the treaties concerning Florida and the province of Louisiana. You thus see that by the treaty, which under the Constitution becomes the supreme law of the land, certain rights under the Federal Constitution were conferred upon the inhabitants of the ceded territory. In none of these cases has the court said, independent of any treaty arrangement or act of Congress, that the Constitution ex proprio vigore extends to newly acquired possessions. When we acquired the Alaskan territory, a somewhat different agreement was entered into with Russia with reference to the territory itself and to the people living therein. That treaty, among other things, provided as follows:

But if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of the uncivilized tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The uncivilized tribes shall be subject to such regulations as the United States may from time to time adopt in regard to the aboriginal tribes of that country.

From this it is apparent that, aside from the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands, all of the territory which we acquired prior to the cession of the Philippine Islands and Puerto Rico was under the treaty stipulations which extended to the inhabitants certain of the rights, under the Constitution, of American citizens.

Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, 317) is the leading case relied upon by those who argue that the Constitution ex proprio vigore extends to all of our newly acquired possessions. That case was decided in 1820. The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall. It arose out of substantially the following facts: January 9, 1815, Congress passed an act laying an annual direct tax of $6,000,000 upon the several States that formed the United States Republic, naming the States, eighteen in all. The amount was apportioned among them as provided by the Constitution. February, 27, 1815, Congress passed another act which in effect extended the first act to the District of Columbia. A resident of the District of Columbia resisted payment on the ground that the act extending the original act to the District of Columbia was unconstitutional. His property was seized and he brought trespass against the officer making the seizure.

The judgment of the court can be sustained fully on the grant of full legislative power found in Article I, section 8, subsection 17, of the Constitution. In delivering the opinion of the court, however, Chief Justice Marshall used language which implies that the "United States" means the States and Territories. This part of the opinion is conceded by all lawyers to be dictum, and that it is so regarded by the Supreme Court of the United States is apparent from the language of Mr. Justice Gray in the case of Gibbons vs. The District of Columbia (116 U. S. Rep., 407). In speaking of the case of Loughborough vs. Blake he said:

The point there decided was that an act of Congress laying a direct tax throughout the United States in proportion to the census directed to be taken by the Constitution might comprehend the District of Columbia; and the power of Congress, legislating as a local legislature for the District, to levy taxes for District purposes only, in like manner as the State legislature of a State may tax the people of a State for State purposes, was expressly admitted and has never since been doubted.

Chief Justice Marshall, in his opinion, did not make the distinction which clearly exists that the term "United States" has a dual meaning. One, international, which means the empire of the United States, including the States that exist under the Constitution and all the territory as well. This term is conventional. It is a term that is used the same as we speak of the German Empire, and has no relation to the Constitution itself, which unites the forty-five States into one Federal Republic. In its constitutional meaning the term "United States" relates entirely to the States forming the Federal Republic, and it is in that sense in which it is used in the different provisions in the Constitution itself. As I have already shown, it was unnecessary for the Chief Justice to have used the language he did in upholding the constitutionality of the act in question, and it is apparent also that he did not give the significance to that language which has been given to it by our Democratic friends, from the fact that he was the judge who wrote the opinion in the Canter case, reported in 1 Peters. The Canter case, while it does not in express terms overrule the dictum of Chief Justice Marshall in Loughborough vs. Blake, uses language which is entirely inconsistent with the idea that a Territory, as such, is comprehended within the limits of the Constitution of the United States.

Indeed, Chief Justice Marshall himself, in the case of Hepburn vs. Ellzey (2 Cranch, 445), fully determined that a Territory is not a State and not comprehended within the limits of the Constitution. In that case a resident of the District of Columbia brought suit in the United States court for the district of Virginia against a citizen of Virginia. The defendant contended that as a citizen of the District of Columbia he had no authority under the Constitution to bring such a suit. In determining that question Chief Justice Marshall said:

> On the part of the plaintiffs it has been urged that Columbia is a distinct political society and is therefore a State according to the definitions of writers on general law. That is true. But as the act of Congress obviously uses the word "State" in reference to that term as used in the Constitution, it becomes necessary to inquire whether Columbia is a State in the sense of that instrument. The result of that examination is a conviction that the members of the American Confederacy only are the States contemplated in the Constitution.

Again, in the case of New Orleans vs. Winter (1 Wheaton, 92), Chief Justice Marshall uses this language:

> It has been attempted to distinguish a Territory from the District of Columbia; but the court is of opinion that this distinction can not be maintained. They may differ in many respects, but neither of them is a State in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution.

Scott vs. Sanford (19 Howard) is another case which is much relied upon by those who hold that our newly acquired possessions must be controlled, if at all, under the provisions of the Constitution. A mere statement of the issue involved in that case, as it seems to me, will determine the fact that it can not be urged as an authority to guide us in the determination of our action in legislating for Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands. Scott was a slave, and his master took him from Missouri, where he was then a resident, into the State of Illinois and resided there for two years, and then into the Territory of Minnesota and resided there for two years. He then went back into the State of Missouri with his slave, and after he had become again domiciled in the State of Missouri Scott sued in the State courts for his freedom.

The supreme court of Missouri held that it did not possess jurisdiction beyond the territorial limits of the State and that it could not invoke the laws of Illinois or of the Territory of Minnesota to establish his freedom. The case was then taken into the Federal courts, and the only issue presented there and the only issue decided by the Supreme Court of the United States was as to whether that court had jurisdiction of the case. The decision of the court was that it did not possess jurisdiction. Whatever was said outside of that one issue was the dictum of the judge and not the decision of the court. We all know under what political excitement the opinions of the Chief Justice and his associates were delivered. They were simply the expression of political opinions and are not entitled to any weight as judicial expressions. That I am correct in this is apparent from the fact that it has never been relied upon by the courts and rarely has it been referred to in judicial opinions.

American Publishing Company vs. Fisher (166 U. S., 464), the Slaughter House Cases, Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S., 707), Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 343), and many other cases that I might speak of have been referred to in this debate as supporting the doctrine that our newly acquired possessions have become an integral part of the United States and that the inhabitants thereon are entitled to the protection guaranteed to citizens under our Constitution. Those cases when properly analyzed do not support that contention. That issue was not before the court in any of these cases. The language that has been relied upon is simply the dictum of the justice who prepared the decision for the court. Every person familiar with the decisions of our courts can readily understand that even the judge himself preparing the opinion would not wish to be bound to the exact and literal interpretation of every expression used in the way of illustrating the issue that is determined in the opinion.

All of these cases arose under such different conditions from those that now confront us that it is preposterous to hold that all or any of them are authorities to guide us in legislating for Puerto Rico or the Philippine Islands. I venture the assertion that none of these decisions would have any weight with the Supreme Court, or at the most very little weight, when called upon to decide the constitutionality of the bill which we are now considering. We are confronted in this legislation with the acquisition of territory under different terms from any previous acquisition in the history of the Republic. The location of the islands, climatic conditions, the inhabitants themselves and their known incapacity at the present time for self-government will all have a powerful influence with the court in determining the constitutionality of our action.

> It is a maxim not to be disregarded that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case they must be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care and considered in its fullest extent. Other principles which may serve to illustrate it are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated.

This is the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Cohens vs. Virginia (6 Wheaton, 264).

In re Ross (140 U. S. Rep., 453) the Supreme Court of the United States upheld a consular court established by Congress in Japan, consisting of a consul and four associates. A person charged with murder on an American vessel in Japanese waters was tried before this consular court without a jury and without any of the safeguards provided by the Constitution. He was found guilty and sentenced to be executed. The sentence, however, was commuted by the President to life imprisonment, and he was sent to the penitentiary at Albany, N. Y., to serve out his life sentence. While he was serving out his life sentence he sued out a writ of habeas corpus and raised the question as to the constitutionality of the court which had tried him, claiming that under the Constitution of the United States he had a right to trial by jury. The court held him to have been properly convicted, and upheld the act of Congress creating the court. This case is in harmony with those which I have already cited in support of the doctrine that Congress is supreme in the territories we have just acquired, and that the civil rights and the political status of the people of those islands can be fixed by Congress independent of any of the provisions or limitations in the Constitution.

In the first case to which I have referred in my remarks here to-day—the Canter case, reported in 1 Peters—Daniel Webster was of counsel in the case. It was a case that arose out of the sale of cotton by order of a Territorial court in the Territory of Florida. Mr. Webster, in his argument, went into a full exposition of the relations of the Territories to the Government of the United States. This, mark you, was in 1828, more than seventy years ago, and only a few years, comparatively speaking, after our Government had been organized under the Constitution. None of the decisions to which I have here referred had been rendered, but Mr. Webster, with that marvelous analytical ability which he possessed, with that knowledge of the Constitution and its proper construction which he always displayed when discussing these questions, contended that the Constitution did not extend over acquired territory; that territory itself was the property of the United States, and that Congress was the supreme power in legislating for such territory.

The treaty of cession by which the United States became possessed of the Territory of Florida was so worded that the Supreme Court was not required to specifically and in exact language determine the proposition as Mr. Webster presented it to the court, but the spirit of that decision was along the line of the argument presented by Mr. Webster. Later decisions, as I have clearly shown here to-day, are all in harmony with the position that that great constitutional lawyer maintained. How comes it, then, that in the closing days of the nineteenth century, and after more than a hundred years of constitutional government, we find men apparently learned in the law who take the opposite position, and who insist that the acquisition of the Philippine Islands under the treaty of peace with Spain makes them an integral part of the United States and gives to the inhabitants there all of the rights, privileges, and immunities of American citizens?

I think I can explain it, Mr. Chairman. These men are resurrecting a doctrine that ought to have gone down forever in the smoke and battle of the civil war. This principle, which has been resurrected for the purpose of creating trouble for this Administration and the Republican party, is simply a doctrine, clothed in a new garb, that was invented by John C. Calhoun, a brilliant intellect, but perverted by disappointed ambition into the narrowest of a State-rights advocate, and the inventor of the nullification doctrine of 1832—the principle upon which the people of the South in 1861 sought to establish a Confederate government. It is one of the old cries for the extension of slavery, resurrected in this arena and at this time to frighten the people of this country in the great emergency which confronts us.

In speaking as I do, Mr. Chairman, of Mr. Calhoun being the father of this doctrine, and that it was a dogma invented in support of slavery, I am following the beaten path that was prepared for all who came after by the most distinguished Senator Missouri ever had in the Senate of the United States, namely, Thomas H. Benton. I crave the indulgence of the House while I read to my Democratic friends what he said. I read from the second volume of Mr. Benton's work, page 712, entitled "Thirty Years' View:"

> The resolutions of 1847 went no further than to attempt to deny the power of Congress to prohibit slavery in a Territory, and that was enough while Congress alone was the power to be guarded against, but it became insufficient, and even a stumbling block, when New Mexico and California were acquired, and where no Congressional prohibition was necessary, because their soil was already free. Here the dogma of 1847 became an impediment to the territorial extension of slavery, for in denying power to legislate upon the subject the denial worked both ways, both against the admission and exclusion.

It was on seeing this consequence as resulting from the dogmas of 1847 that Mr. Benton congratulated the country upon the approaching cessation of the slavery agitation; that the Wilmot proviso being rejected as unnecessary, the question was at an end, as the friends of slavery extension could not ask Congress to pass a law to carry it into a Territory. The agitation seemed to be at an end and peace about to dawn upon the land. Delusive calculation! A new dogma was invented to fit the case, that of the transmigration of the Constitution (the slavery part of it) into the Territories, overriding and overruling all the anti-slavery laws which it found there, and planting the institution there under its own wing, and maintaining it beyond the power of eradication either by Congress or the people of the Territory. Before this dogma was proclaimed efforts were made to get the Constitution extended to these Territories by act of Congress. Failing in these attempts, the difficulty was leaped over by boldly assuming that the Constitution went of itself—that is to say, the slavery part of it.

In this exigency Mr. Calhoun came out with his new and supreme dogma of the transmigratory function of the Constitution in the ipso facto and the instantaneous transportation of itself in its slavery attributes into all acquired Territories. This dogma was broached by its author in his speech upon the Oregon Territorial bill. History can not class higher than as a vagary of a diseased imagination this imputed self-acting and self-extension of the Constitution. The Constitution does nothing of itself, not even in the States for which it was made. Every part of it requires a law to put it into operation. No part of it can reach a Territory unless imparted to it by act of Congress. Slavery, as a local institution, can only be established by local legislative authority. It can not transmigrate, can not carry along with it the law which protects it; and if it could, what law would it carry? The code of the State from which the emigrant went? Then there would be as many slavery codes in the Territory as States furnishing emigrants, and these codes varying more or less, and some of them in the essential nature of the property—the slave in many States being only a chattel interest, governed by laws applicable to chattels; in others, as in Louisiana and Kentucky, a real estate interest, governed by the laws which apply to landed property. In a word, this dogma of the self-extension of the slavery part of the Constitution to a Territory is impractical and preposterous, and as novel as unfounded.

I desire to emphasize the fact that in the whole history of our legislative government no man before Mr. Calhoun, in either branch of Congress, had ever asserted that doctrine. You will mark this, that prior to this time we had acquired the Louisiana territory, Florida, New Mexico, and California; in fact, we had extended our territory from the circumscribed limits of the thirteen original States until we had reached from ocean to ocean; we had acquired an empire in territorial extent, and yet none of the leaders in either of the great political parties ever dreamed for a moment that the Constitution extended itself over it ex proprio vigore as is contended by our Democratic friends to-day. Fortunately for us in the elucidation of this question and the proper construction of the Constitution, Daniel Webster, the great expounder of that instrument, was living and a member of the Senate of the United States when Mr. Calhoun gave utterance to that doctrine which has been so strongly condemned by Mr. Benton.

This was more than twenty years after Mr. Webster had presented his views to the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters). It was after his life had been enriched by his experience in the courts of his country, in the Senate, and as Secretary of State. Mr. Webster refuted Mr. Calhoun's position in language to which I desire to call the attention of my fellow-members. His exposition is so lucid and so profound that, in my judgment, it does not leave anything to be said by others.

Let me say that in this general sense there is no such thing as extending the Constitution. The Constitution is extended over the United States and over nothing else. It can not be extended over anything except over the old States and the new States that shall come hereafter, when they do come in. There is a want of accuracy of ideas in this respect that is quite remarkable among eminent gentlemen, and especially professional and judicial gentlemen. It seems to be taken for granted that the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, and every principle designed to protect personal liberty is extended by force of the Constitution itself over every new Territory. That proposition can not be maintained at all. How do you arrive at it by any reasoning or deduction? It can only be arrived at by the loosest of all possible construction. It is said that this must be so, else the right of habeas corpus would be lost. Undoubtedly these rights must be conferred by law before they can be enjoyed in a Territory.

Sir, if the hopes of some gentlemen were realized, and Cuba were to become a possession of the United States by cession, does any body suppose that the habeas corpus and the trial by jury would be established in it by the mere act of cession? Why more than election laws and the political franchises or popular franchise? Sir, the whole authority of Congress on this subject is embraced in that very short provision that Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territories of the United States. The word is territories, for it is quite evident that the compromises of the Constitution looked to no new acquisitions to form new territories. But as they have been acquired from time to time, new territories have been regarded as coming under that general provision for making rules for territories. We have never had a territory governed as the United States is governed. The legislature and the judiciary of Territories have always been established by a law of Congress. I do not say that while we sit here to make laws for these territories we are not bound by every one of those great principles which are intended as securities for public liberty.

But they do not exist in Territories till introduced by the authority of Congress. These principles do not proprio vigore apply to one of the Territories of the United States, because that territory, while a territory, does not become a part and is no part of the United States. * * * One idea further upon this branch of the subject—the Constitution of the United States extending over the Territories and no other law existing there. Why, I beg to know how any government could proceed without any other authority existing there than such as is created by the Constitution of the United States? Does the Constitution of the United States settle titles to land? Does it regulate the rights of property? Does it fix the relations of parent and child, guardian and ward? The Constitution of the United States establishes what the gentleman calls a confederation for certain great purposes, leaving all the great mass of laws which is to govern society to derive their existence from State enactments. That is the just view of the state of things under the Constitution. And a State or Territory that has no law but such as it derives from the Constitution of the United States must be entirely without any State or Territorial government. * * * How did we govern Louisiana before it was a State? Did the writ of habeas corpus exist in Louisiana during its territorial existence? Or the right to trial by jury? * * *

Well, I suppose the revenue laws are made in pursuance of its provisions; but, according to the gentleman's reasoning, the Constitution extends over the Territories as the supreme law, and no legislation on that subject is necessary. This would be tantamount to saying that the moment territory is attached to the United States all the laws of the United States as well as the Constitution of the United States become the governing will of men's conduct and the rights of property, because they are declared to be the law of the land, the laws of Congress being the supreme law as well as the Constitution of the United States. Sir, this is a course of reasoning that can not be maintained. The Crown of England often makes conquests of territory. Whoever heard it contended that the Constitution of England, or the supreme power of Parliament, because it is the law of the land, extended over the territory thus acquired until made to do so by a special act of Parliament? The whole history of colonial conquest shows entirely the reverse. Until provision is made by act of Parliament for a civil government the territory is held as a military acquisition. It is subject to the control of Parliament, and Parliament may make all laws that they may deem proper and necessary to be made for its government; but until such provision is made the territory is not under the dominion of English law. And it is exactly upon the same principle that territories coming to belong to the United States by acquisition or cession, as we have no jus coloniae, remain to be made subject to the operation of our supreme law by an enactment of Congress.

I have referred to the manner in which this doctrine was first suggested in this country, and I have not only shown to you the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States bearing on this subject, but the views of the most distinguished expounder of our Constitution since the formation of the Federal Republic. Let me now call your attention to an able article on this subject from a historical standpoint written by historian McMaster. It is in the December number of the Forum, 1898. The article is well worthy the perusal of every student of American institutions and especially of every man desiring to obtain light on the subject now under consideration. It is written with all the facility of expression and profound research of that able historian. The conclusion he reaches is as follows:

A review of the history of suffrage in the Territories thus makes it clear that foreign soil acquired by Congress is the property of and not part of the United States; that the Territories formed from it are without, and not under, the Constitution, and that in providing them with governments Congress is at liberty to establish just such kind as it pleases with little or no regard for the principles of self-government; that in the past it has set up whatever sort was, in its opinion, best suited to meet the needs of the people, never stopping to ask how far the government so created derived its just powers from the consent of the governed, and that it is under no obligation to grant even a restricted suffrage to the inhabitants of any new soil we may acquire unless they are fit to use it properly.

If my contention be true, Mr. Chairman, that these islands are only the property of the United States and that the inhabitants only acquire such rights as we may give them by legislation, it follows that we can have separate customs and internal-revenue laws for the islands, and navigation laws applicable to that country and distinct from our own, and, in fact, any legislation that will be for the well-being of the people of those islands and of the people of the States. I dissent in toto from the doctrine contended for by some, that our tariff laws and internal-revenue laws must be the same in these islands as they are in the United States. In addition to what I have already said on this subject, I desire to call the attention of the House to the case of Fleming vs. Page. (9 Howard, page 603.) Mr. Webster, who was of counsel in that case, in his argument said:

That there was a difference between the Territories and the other parts of the United States. Judges were there appointed for terms of years, which the Constitution forbade as to other parts of the country. Hence the part of the Constitution which directs that duties must be equal in all the ports of the United States does not apply to Territories.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion for the court in that case, said:

This construction of the revenue laws has been uniformly given by the administrative department of the Government in every case that has come before it. And it has, indeed, been given in cases where there appears to have been stronger ground for regarding the place of shipment as a domestic port. For after Florida had been ceded to the United States and the forces of the United States had taken possession of Pensacola, it was decided by the Treasury Department that goods imported from Pensacola before an act of Congress was passed erecting it into a collection district and authorizing the appointment of a collector were liable to duty. That is, although Florida had, by cession, actually become a part of the United States, and was in our possession, yet under our revenue laws its ports must be regarded as foreign until they were established as domestic by act of Congress; and it appears that this decision was sanctioned by the Attorney-General of the United States, the law officer of the Government.

And although not so directly applicable to the case before us, yet the decisions of the Treasury Department in relation to Amelia Island and certain ports of Louisiana, after that province had been ceded to the United States, were both made upon the same grounds. And in the latter case, after a custom-house had been established by law at New Orleans, the collector at that place was instructed to regard as foreign ports Baton Rouge and other settlements still in the possession of Spain, whether on the Mississippi, Iberville, or the seacoast. The Department in no instance that we are aware of since the establishment of the Government has ever recognized a place in a newly acquired country as a domestic port from which the coasting trade might be carried on unless it had been previously made so by act of Congress.

The principle thus adopted and acted upon by the executive department of the Government has been sanctioned by the decisions in this court and the circuit courts whenever the question came before them. We do not propose to comment upon the different cases cited in the argument. It is sufficient to say that there is no discrepancy between them. And all of them, so far as they apply, maintain that under our revenue laws every port is regarded as a foreign one unless the custom-house from which the vessel clears is within a collection district established by act of Congress and the officers granting the clearance exercise their functions under the authority and control of the laws of the United States.

The enemies of national expansion have created in their imagination a bogy man and with him are trying to frighten the laboring people of this country; they are assuming that the people of that distant and tropical climate will come to the cold regions of the North and drive out our laboring men with their cheap labor. A more groundless argument was never urged. It is almost fantastical when you consider it in its true light. There is not a Malay in this country to-day, and there will not be one an hundred years from now. Why? Because the climatic conditions are such that they will prefer to stay in their own country; they will secure a larger liberty under the administration we shall give them in their own islands than they have heretofore enjoyed, and will remain there instead of coming here to compete with American labor.

But, as I have stated, the treaty of peace under which we have acquired this territory leaves it with the Congress of the United States to provide against any of the contingencies that have been conjured up by the ingenuity of these Democratic speakers who are seeking to throw a stumbling-block in the way of this Administration in the discharge of the responsibilities which it has had thrust upon it by the fortunes of war. We can provide a system of government that will be adapted not only to the conditions of the islands from a climatic standpoint, but adapted to the state of political development of the people. What is important for us now is to demonstrate to them and to the world that America is united in her efforts to maintain peace and order in this territory. They in time will come to understand, as will all the world, that the form of government that we establish in these islands will start the people on an era of progress which has been unknown in their history.

While this is being done it will be necessary for us, in the interest of humanity and the people themselves, to have a stable form of government there and an army sufficiently large to police the islands and drive out freebooters, whether under the leadership of Aguinaldo or any other military or political adventurer. I have grown tired, Mr. Chairman, in listening to the arguments of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber when they talk about "imperialism," and that an increased Regular Army will stifle the liberty of our countrymen. But when I reflect on the history of my country and note the arguments of ill omen that have ever been addressed to the people when new territory has been acquired, I content myself in the belief that the notes of alarm sounded by the Democrats will fall on deaf ears, as they did on the deaf ears of the fathers of our country, who believed that the acquiring of new and additional territory, instead of weakening, would strengthen the Republic and aid it in its manifest destiny in the elevation of mankind. While these arguments of the pessimists have ever found ready expression with a certain class of public men from the time of the acquisition of the Louisiana territory to that of the Hawaiian Islands, it certainly sounds strange coming from the lips of Democrats.

The patron saint of the Democratic party is Thomas Jefferson, and yet, Mr. Chairman, he was the greatest territorial "expansionist" this Government has ever known. When the opportunity was presented to him by the first Bonaparte to acquire that magnificent empire known as the Louisiana Province, out of which have been carved some of the richest and most populous of our States, did he hesitate? Not a moment! He believed then, as we know now, that the acquisition of that territory would raise the American Republic from the condition of a fourth-rate power to that of a first-class power among the great nations of the world. In our youth and weakness, with an impoverished Treasury, with small means for raising revenue, he authorized his commissioners to pay the French Government the sum of $15,000,000 for this territory. Is there a man within the sound of my voice to-day who believes that Mr. Jefferson made a mistake in the acquisition of that territory? Is there a man to-day, in the light of our history, who believes that the principles of free government were weakened by the acquisition of this new territory, containing as it did a population who were strangers to our constitutional Government and enemies to our free institutions? And yet, Mr. Chairman, some of the best minds of that day believed as fully as our Democratic friends profess to believe to-day that the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory would work the destruction of the American Republic.

Let me read to you a few sentences from Fisher Ames, one of the most distinguished Federalists of New England, one of the most accomplished men of his time, and one of the most brilliant and fascinating orators that ever addressed an audience:

> Now, by adding an unmeasured area beyond that [the Mississippi] river we rush like a comet into infinite space. In our wild career, we may jostle some other world out of its orbit, but we shall, in every event, quench the light of our own. * * * Having bought an empire, who is to be emperor? The sovereign people, and what people? All, or only the people of the dominant States, and the dominant demagogues in those States, who call themselves the people? As in old Rome, Marius, or Sylla, or Cæsar, Pompey, Antony, or Lepidus will vote themselves provinces and triumphs. * * * But surely it exceeds all my credulity and candor on that head to suppose even they can contemplate a republican form as practicable, honest, or free, if applied when so manifestly inapplicable to the Government of one-third of God's earth.

Mr. Josiah Quincy, of New England, at one time president of Harvard University, and at another time one of the most distinguished men of this body, had this to say in opposition to the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory:

> Under the sanction of this rule of conduct, I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion that if this bill passes the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the States which compose it are free from their moral obligations, and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare definitely for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must. * * * Do you suppose the people of the Northern and Atlantic States will or ought to look upon with patience and see Representatives and Senators from the Red River and Missouri pouring themselves upon this and the other floor, managing the concerns of a seaboard 1,500 miles at least from their residence, and having a preponderancy in councils into which constitutionally they could never have been admitted? I have no hesitation on this point. They neither will see it nor ought to see it with content. * * * Grasp not too eagerly at your purpose. In your speed after uncontrolled sway, trample not down this Constitution. * * * I have no concealment of my opinion. The bill, if it passes, is a deathblow to the Constitution. It may afterwards linger, but, lingering, its fate will at no very distant period be consummated.

This language of Fisher Ames and Josiah Quincy is as doleful in character as the prophecies which have been expressed by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber in relation to the Philippine Islands. Mr. Chairman, it is my deliberate opinion that their statements and their prophecies are as ill-timed and their forebodings as little likely to prove true as were those of the opponents of the acquisition of the territory of Louisiana at the period of which I have just spoken. I believe that the United States Government is entering upon a new era of greatness, of expansion, and of glory. The Constitution possesses the elasticity of the fabled tent of the Arab. It was framed and adopted for the government of the thirteen original States, yet it has expanded over a continent. The 75,000,000 people who now live within its borders have the same liberty, the same sacred rights, and the treasured inheritance of free government that were guaranteed by the framers of the Constitution to the people of the thirteen original States.

Under the interpretation that has been given to it by the great legislators of our country and the Supreme Court, the Constitution will enable us to acquire this territory in the Orient, and if we are as wise as those who have preceded us, will enable us to give those people rights of free citizens without infringing in the least upon the privileges and immunities of our own people. I maintain, as I have already stated, that a government can be formed in the Philippine Islands that will be self-supporting through the customs laws that we shall give them and the internal-revenue laws that will follow; and instead of having a standing army of American soldiers there, we can follow the wise example of Diaz in Mexico, who has taken the brigands from the mountains and made them soldier citizens, and has thereby secured the best police officers in the world. We can take native inhabitants for whatever soldiers may be needed and officer them with men trained in our Regular Army and thus insure peace and tranquillity in the islands. By this method, Mr. Chairman, the United States Government will place no new burdens upon our people. Our acquisition of those islands and our government of them will open a wider avenue for our trade. The surplus products of our farms and factories will find a market there and in the far east which would otherwise remain closed to us were the reactionary doctrine advocated by Democratic members of this House and the Senate to be adopted and followed.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States has stood forth through all of the great crises of the war and the problems that have followed it as one of the greatest statesmen of his time. He has shown qualities that have not only aroused the admiration of his political enemies, but that have even surprised his personal and political friends. From the first notes of war to this blessed hour every step that he has taken has been so well timed as not only to represent the prevailing sentiment of the Republic, but has been so wisely taken that history will vindicate his every action. [Applause on the Republican side.] Men may stand on this floor and denounce him, but when the grave of oblivion shall have closed over them his name will be recorded in the brightest pages in the history of our Republic. It falls to the lot of those who hold exalted positions to have detractors. He is only experiencing what was meted out to the sainted Lincoln during his Administration from the venomous lips of the political enemies of his party and policy.

History almost repeats itself in many of the expressions that have been indulged in by gentlemen on this floor in their discussion of the questions now under consideration. For the benefit of those men who to-day are denouncing President McKinley and insisting that his attitude is indefensible, I wish to call their attention to some of the expressions that their Democratic predecessors used during the dark and stormy period of the civil war. Senator

Polk, on the 10th of July, 1861, in the Senate of the United States, said, in discussing war measures:

That war has been brought on by the President of the United States of his own motion and of his own wrong; and under what circumstances?

Mr. Vallandigham, on the same day, in the House, said:

I will not now venture to assert what may yet some day be made to appear, that the subsequent acts of the Administration and its enormous and persistent infractions of the Constitution, its high-handed usurpations of power, formed any part of a deliberate conspiracy to overthrow the present form of Federal republican government and to establish a strong centralized government in its stead.

Senator Breckinridge, in the Senate, said:

Then, Mr. President, the Executive of the United States has assumed egislative powers. The Executive of the United States has assumed judicial powers. The executive power belongs to him by the Constitution. He has, therefore, concentrated in his own hands executive, legislative, and judicial powers, which in every age of the world has been the very definition of despotism, and exercises them to-day.

Mr. Burnett, in the House, on July 16, 1861, said:

I say the Republican party will be held responsible for the unhappy condition of our country to-day. I say, in my place here now, that the only disunionists per se this country has ever been cursed with are the leaders of the Republican party.

Again, on July 24, 1861, he said:

You are writing, by indorsing and ratifying the illegal acts of this Administration, one of the saddest, blackest pages in the history of this country.

Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, on February 20, 1862, said:

A stupendous fraud has been practiced on the nation, and the Army of the United States has been obtained by fraud.

On May 21, 1862, Mr. Voorhees said:

Is this the age of republican simplicity, or are we transported to the days of fraudulent usurpers, to the unhallowed scenes of the Roman Cæsars?

Senator Davis, on February 16, 1864, said:

But in our free and limited government of a written constitution, President Lincoln and his party, in utter disregard of its limitations and restrictions, are making for him the same boundless and despotic powers * * * which the Plantagenets and Tudors and first Stuarts contended for in England.

I read these extracts from speeches made by Democrats of a former generation to show to the Republicans of this House that in pursuing the policy that has been outlined by our party and in sustaining the Administration we are subjecting ourselves to no fiercer criticisms than those hurled against the first President the Republican party gave to this country. We have nothing to fear from these base and groundless charges. Our duty, in my judgment, is clear, and that is, to fearlessly and conscientiously provide for the great emergency that has been placed upon us by this war with Spain. [Applause on the Republican side.] Let us discharge our duty with a firmness and intrepidity that characterized the action of our fathers when the dark cloud of civil war overhung our national horizon, and the people of to-day will as surely approve our conduct as did the people of a generation ago approve the conduct of President Lincoln and his advisers when they were exercising every power of the Constitution for the maintenance of the Union and the integrity of our Federal Republic. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, the President, in his annual message to Congress, told us that it was "our plain duty to abolish all customs tariff between the United States and Puerto Rico, and to give to her products free access to our markets." He forcibly pointed out the reasons that made this duty imperative.

Following this, Mr. PAYNE, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the leader of the Republican majority of this House, introduced a bill carrying out the recommendations of the President. At that time there was practical unanimity in both the Democratic and the Republican party that the reciprocal benefits of free trade should exist between Puerto Rico and this country. But in the last few weeks the entire policy of the Republican party in dealing with this matter has been reversed. The "plain duty" so pointedly presented by the President has ceased to exist, and a different idea of justice, of right, and of wisdom seems now to possess him and his party.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. POWERS. I understand the gentleman to intimate that the President had changed his attitude.

Mr. SWANSON. I simply say that those in authority have made the statement that he has changed it. I hope he has not.

Mr. POWERS. Has any authorized statement come from him?

Mr. SWANSON. I have seen none emanating from him.

There has been no change in the conditions of Puerto Rico or of this country to produce this change in the President's mind or in that of his party. The unfortunate people of that island are still immersed in poverty and in wretchedness and still have denied to them the markets of the world for the sale of their products. Every reason assigned in the President's message for free trade with Puerto Rico exists with redoubled force to-day. If at that time it was "our plain duty" to extend them free trade, it is doubly so to-day.

Why, then, sirs, this sudden change of policy in dealing with Puerto Rico? Why is our acknowledged "plain duty" now abandoned and this oppressive bill sought to be forced upon a helpless people? Is it a patriotic or is it a political condition that has wrought this wonderful change?

There is not an intelligent or a candid mind in this country that does not know that this change has been induced by the political necessities of the coming Presidential election.

We are told by the inspired and the well informed that this measure is not intended to be permanent and that in the not far distant future free trade with Puerto Rico will be established.

We are told that this bill is intended as a precedent to establish the doctrine that Congress has the power to create different custom duties in our new possessions from those existing in this country.

We were told by those representing the sugar and the tobacco interests, when they appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, that they insisted upon the custom duties on the products of Puerto Rico not because any serious evils could accrue to this country through any importations from there, but because they are afraid that unless duties are imposed upon Puerto Rican products, it will be used as a precedent for granting free trade with the Philippine Islands, which they greatly fear.

We are told by Republican politicians and newspapers that unless these custom duties are imposed upon Puerto Rico, it will be argued during the Presidential campaign with force and effect that the same policy will be pursued with the Philippine Islands, and that this might result in the loss of a great many votes to the Republican party.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, it is evident that this bill has its inspiration not in justice, not in right, but in selfishness and in petty partisan politics.

A "plain duty" is to be abandoned for a supposed party advantage. One million of unfortunate people whom the fate of war has placed completely at our mercy are to be sacrificed and denied justice and right because it is thought by some that the exigencies of the Republican party require it.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill passes it will be the first chapter in the legislative history of our new possessions, and be it said to the disgrace of the Republican party that that chapter was written in wrong and in injustice for the purpose of carrying a Presidential election.

If we are to extend our possessions and inaugurate a colonial system, wisdom dictates that it should begin in justice, liberality, and equality. But if our colonial policy must be dominated by partisan party politics, as this bill indicates, it can but commence in disgrace and terminate in disaster.

And we are told, again, that the bill must be passed to establish a certain principle.

What is that principle so dear that this bill must pass to vindicate? Is it proposed to establish the doctrine that Congress has unlimited power of legislation for the new possessions, unrestrained by any of the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and that it can entirely disregard the provision of the Constitution requiring uniformity of custom duties throughout the United States, and that it can establish any rate of duty it sees fit between the States and the territories or possessions?

In short, the doctrine claimed is that the inhabitants of Puerto Rico and of the Philippine Islands are slaves of the imperial will of Congress, and in life, in liberty, and in property are entirely subject to its decrees.

This is the pernicious doctrine proposed and sought to be established by the Republican party.

Mr. Chairman, this is no new doctrine in American history. This Republic owes its birth to the effort on the part of the British Parliament to establish precisely the same principle.

The principles here maintained by the opposition are in every respect similar to those contended for at the time of the American Revolution by George III. The issues are the same. The reasons given are the same.

At that time it was claimed that the British Parliament was absolute sovereign in America; that Parliament had a right to impose any tax it wished in America; that it could regulate the conditions upon which American goods should enter the British markets, and also the conditions upon which British goods should enter the American markets.

It was contended that the British constitution, with its safeguards and its inestimable privileges, did not extend to America; that the Americans were but absolute subjects of the British Parliament.

To carry into effect these pernicious principles, the British Parliament passed the infamous stamp act. The speeches in Parliament in advocacy of that measure bear a striking resemblance to those delivered by the opposition in behalf of this bill.

Lord Grenville, in that debate, said that the purpose of the stamp act was "to establish the undoubted authority of the British legislation in all cases whatsoever."

The advocates of this bill claim that its purpose is to establish in our possessions the undoubted authority of the American Congress in all cases whatsoever.

But the similarity does not cease here. To make the iniquitous stamp act tolerable to the Americans, it provided that the revenue derived from it should not be remitted to England, but should be retained and expended in America.

So this bill provides that the sum collected under it shall be expended in Puerto Rico. Hence the Puerto Ricans are told, as were our forefathers, that this makes the bill eminently just and wise.

The person who drew this bill must have had before him the infamous stamp act and must have used it as a prototype for this iniquitous measure.

The able gentlemen who have argued in favor of this measure and of the power of Congress must have had their minds illumined and their views strengthened by reading the speeches of Lord Grenville, of Lord North, and of Charles Townshend in speaking in advocacy of the stamp act and of the power of the British Parliament.

Mr. Chairman, in contradistinction to these pernicious British contentions, our forefathers maintained that taxation and representation went hand in hand; that all government derived its just powers from the consent of the governed, and that they were British subjects, entitled to all the benefits of the British constitution.

The two great leaders in this contention were George III on the one side and George Washington on the other.

It was thought that at least in America the fight was forever and finally settled in favor of George Washington and of his inestimable principles, but it seems that those who believe in the principles of George III are to-day in authority and in power in the United States. His iniquitous doctrines, his pernicious principles of parliamentary despotism, reappear in the American Congress to-day in this bill, which is sanctioned and supported by the Republican party. When the roll is called upon this bill every Representative must answer whether he is a follower of George III or of George Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the injustice of this bill is equal to that sought to be inflicted by the British upon the Americans at the time of the Revolution. This bill fixes the terms upon which the goods and products of Puerto Rico can be offered for sale in the markets of this country and also the terms upon which the people of Puerto Rico must purchase our goods. Thus we claim the power of controlling their sales to us and also their purchases from us. This is a dangerous power which no nation should possess over another and one which will always be abused for the enrichment of the nation possessed of the power. This bill itself furnishes a striking instance of how such power will invariably be used.

Now, tobacco is one of the chief products of Puerto Rico. While Puerto Rico was a Spanish possession the markets of Cuba and of Spain were open to her and consumed the entire product of Puerto Rican tobacco. Since her annexation to this country the markets of Cuba and of Spain have been closed to her products, and now Puerto Rico can look to this country alone for a market for her 4,000,000 pounds of tobacco. This tobacco is used entirely in the making of a good grade of cigars. By this bill a duty of 8½ cents will be imposed upon each pound of her tobacco that is brought here in a raw or unmanufactured state. Under this bill, if this same tobacco is manufactured into cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes in Puerto Rico and imported into this country, it will be compelled to pay in customs duties and internal-revenue taxes $3.13 per pound. Thus by this bill thirty-five times more is charged in customs duties and taxes on cigars than on the raw leaf. Thus the bill, if it gives any protection, gives scarcely any to the farmers and producers of tobacco in this country, but extends it all to the cigar manufacturers.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Is not that simply the internal-revenue tax?

Mr. SWANSON. No; I will explain that to you.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to have the gentleman explain it.

Mr. SWANSON. They charge 25 per cent under the Dingley bill as a customs duty, and the bill provides in addition to that that they shall pay the internal-revenue tax as a customs duty, and then it has to pay the internal-revenue tax as an internal-revenue tax when it comes into this country, making $3.13 per pound.

Mr. LACEY. I do not understand it in that way.

Mr. SWANSON. The purpose of this is plain and evident. The clear intention of the bill is to force all of the leaf tobacco raised in Puerto Rico to be imported into this country and to be here manufactured into cigars. Its purpose is to close every cigar, cheroot, and cigarette factory in Puerto Rico and to transfer them to this country. The sinister motive behind this bill is to discourage and to destroy any manufacturing developments in that island. It intends to confine the 1,000,000 people in that unhappy island to raising raw materials to be imported here for the purposes of manufacturing.

Mr. Chairman, this is an outrage. It is precisely the same iniquitous policy that Britain sought to inflict upon the American colonies when we rebelled and refused to submit.

In Puerto Rico there are about 300 people to every square mile, and the island will be powerless to support its vast population unless permitted to embark in manufacturing enterprises. The clear purpose of this bill and of the Republican party is to prohibit this.

While this bill will require the payment of $3.13 for every pound of their cigars seeking our markets, yet it opens their markets to our cigar makers on the payment of only $1.13 per pound. This is such an inequality that it should shock every person's sense of justice and right. The shame becomes deeper when we reflect that the act is directed against a helpless people who can only protest, but must submit.

We are told by the eloquent advocates of the new imperialistic policy that we hold "a trusteeship under God" to care for, develop, and direct the destiny of these people. What a splendid illustration is here given of the discharge of this high trust. At the very first opportunity the so-called "divinely appointed trustees" despoil the dependent wards. [Applause.]

Sir, this Government interfered in Cuba and in Puerto Rico because Spanish injustice and despotism had become intolerable. So, if I mistake not, the American people consented to shed the precious blood of their sons and to spend vast treasures to relieve an oppressed people, and not to become heirs of the vicious Spanish system.

What has been the conduct of our Government toward the inhabitants of Puerto Rico? We found there a peaceful community and comparatively a prosperous people. They possessed in Cuba and in Spain ample markets at which to sell, at a remunerative price, their three chief products—coffee, sugar, and tobacco. They enjoyed a large share of local self-government and had representatives in the Spanish Cortes.

To-day all the markets of the world are closed to them and they are deprived of all the opportunities by treaty or otherwise of securing them. Their products can find no sale. To-day discontent and depression everywhere pervades the island. Debts aggregating more than $50,000,000 burden these people. All industries are destroyed; all business paralyzed. Thousands of people are in the depths of starvation, and all are on the verge of bankruptcy. For nearly two years we have deprived this people of all civil government and held them by the stern iron hand of military rule alone.

Amid all these privations there was one hope that illumined the darkness and gave these people patience. They felt that they were a part and parcel of this great Republic and that they would soon receive its blessings and benefits. They relied implicitly upon being treated with justice and liberality. With the passage of this bill must come disappointment, bitter and deep. By this bill, in their trade and commerce, they are treated as foreign territory and not as a part of the Union. By it they are made not citizens of a republic but creatures of a Congressional despotism. By it they perceive that, being deprived of uniformity in taxation and customs duties with the rest of the Union, all of their earnings and products will be subject to the depredations of any selfish interest that may have political pull sufficient to influence Congress.

Behold what a contrast is presented between the proposed treatment of Hawaii and that of Puerto Rico. There is scarcely any objection from any source to extending free trade to Hawaii. In other words, the 300,000 tons of sugar produced in Hawaii by Spreckles, the sugar king, with his contract laborers or slaves, shall have free and open sale in our markets yet the 60,000 tons of sugar produced in Puerto Rico by thousands of small farmers and laborers can be sold in our markets only by the payment of heavy duties.

What causes this great difference? Certainly it can not be inspired by any principle of protection, for there is greater danger to the sugar interests of this country from the 300,000 tons of Hawaii than from the 60,000 tons of Puerto Rico.

No, Mr. Chairman, be it said to the shame of the Republican party, the difference arises from the fact that the sugar interest of Hawaii is owned by a few millionaires, whose voice is potential in the councils of the Republican party, while that of Puerto Rico is owned by thousands of poor, dependent persons without political influence. [Applause.] This favoritism must produce great dissatisfaction and discontent in Puerto Rico, and justly so. But, say the opposition, the inhabitants of Puerto Rico should acquiesce. Why, say they, are we not their imperial masters? Have we not, in exercise of our despotic power, the right to give to some and to withhold from others? As divine sovereigns, say they, have we not the right to select favorites and to shower them with all the favor and benefits and at the same time make others feel the crushing hand of our power?

This is imperialism. This is the new mission and the aspiration of the Republican party. Sirs, those who are behind this bill and who imagine that they can induce the American people to adopt this policy by the opportunities afforded to despoil the people of our new possessions, do not read aright the American character and are forgetful of the glorious traditions of our history.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this great Republic are a broad-minded, generous-hearted people, with an acute sense of justice and of right. They will visit with severe condemnation any party or set of men who wantonly oppress a helpless people.

They embarked in the Spanish war to become the liberators of an oppressed people and not the despoilers of a dependent people. They cling with filial affection to their Federal Constitution, which with its broad justice insures to all parts of this great Republic uniformity and equality of burdens, uniformity and equality of benefits. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it is said that this bill is intended more to establish a precedent to control us in our future dealings with the Philippine Islands than anything else.

This being true, it is eminently wise that this bill should be promulgated there among the insurgents as a measure of pacification. I have no doubt that the sweet justice of this bill would make a profound impression upon Aguinaldo and his followers, and that it would give them a higher conception of the noble purposes of the American people toward them. No doubt all resistance there would cease when they are told that they are chattels of the American Congress, subject in life, in liberty, and in property to its imperial will; that they are possessed with none of the safeguards of the Constitution with which all other citizens are endowed. No doubt the few friends we now have in the Philippine Islands will have their affections further cemented when they are informed that the American Congress will fix the terms upon which their products are sold here, and also the terms upon which they must purchase ours. I have no doubt that there will be an immense acclaim in those islands for America when it is understood that the justice and equality administered under this bill to Puerto Rico is mild in comparison with what they may expect for themselves.

Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness, to at this time push a bill of this kind and character is the supreme of folly.

We are endeavoring to overthrow an insurrection in the Philippine Islands. We are seeking to make friends there to our cause by profuse promises of justice and of fair dealing. With these promises on our lips, we deal with our strong arm a grievous wrong to a helpless and an unoffending people in Puerto Rico, a people who during the late Spanish war received us with open arms and to whom we promised all the benefits and blessings of our institutions.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, will do more to fire anew the smouldering flames of insurrection in the Philippine Islands than anything else that has happened since we first put foot upon her soil.

How can we expect a people to yield when they are told that they will be possessed of none of the privileges of our Constitution, none of the guaranties of our Bill of Rights, none of the benefits of our institutions, but that they are slaves of our imperial will and must bear such burdens as our selfishness or caprices may impose?

Mr. Chairman, the Republican party has been responsible for many political heresies; it has promulgated many pernicious principles; but nothing in its past history can transcend in dangerous import its new doctrine of "government without the Constitution."

The Republican party is tired of the Federal Constitution, and desires to exploit our new possessions without its restraints. Hence this party stands to-day committed to the doctrine that the Federal Constitution applies only to the States of the Union, and not to its Territories or other possessions.

It contends that section 3, Article IV of the Constitution, providing that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States," gives Congress unrestricted power of legislation for the Territories. But this contention can not be maintained. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that while the power of Congress to legislate for the Territories is full and plenary, it must be subject to the guaranties, restraints, and provisions of the Federal Constitution.

Chief Justice Taney, in the Dred Scott case, says:

> The Territory being a part of the United States, the Government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the Constitution with their respective rights defined and marked out; and the Federal Government can exercise no power over his person or property beyond what that instrument confers nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved.

Chief Justice Waite, in National Bank vs. Yankton (101 U. S., 132), in discussing the power of Congress over territory, says:

> But Congress is supreme, and for the purpose of this department of its governmental authority has all the power of the people of the United States, except such as has been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 162) the court said:

> Congress can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids such legislation.

In Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S., 707), a case from the Territory of Utah, the court said:

> In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common-law cases. The act of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule and could not be treated as attempting to do so.

In Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 346) Justice Harlan says:

> That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

In Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S., 15) the court says:

> The people of the United States as sovereign owners of the National Territories have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied in its terms.

If there were further doubt that the Constitution of the United States extends to all territory subject to the authority of the United States, it would be removed by the case of Callan vs. Wilson. (127 U. S., 550.) Congress had passed an act permitting justices in the District of Columbia to inflict punishment in certain cases without providing for jury trial, as guaranteed in the Federal Constitution. It was insisted by Callan that the act was void, being repugnant to the Federal Constitution. It was insisted by the Attorney-General that Congress had unlimited power over the District, and that the provisions of the Federal Constitution could not restrain it, since section 8, Article I of the Constitution, in enumerating the powers of Congress, provided—

> To exercise exclusive legislation over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States.

Yet the court held that Congress did not have power to legislate for the District, unrestrained by the Federal Constitution, but that the Constitution extended over the District, and that the act of Congress in permitting the infliction of punishment without jury trial was contrary to the sixth amendment, hence void.

The doctrine that the Constitution extends to the Territories is further settled by decisions upon section 8, Article I of the Constitution, which provides:

> But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The meaning of this provision and the extent of its application have been fully determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. Chief Justice Marshall, in Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheat., 317), in rendering the opinion of the court upon the question, says:

> The eighth section of the first article gives Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for the purposes thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words, which modify the grant. These words are, "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."
> It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend. The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised, throughout the United States. Does the term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania, and it is not less necessary on the principles of our Constitution that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other.

The case of Cross, etc., vs. Harrison (16 Howard, 164) is equally as decisive in determining that in our new possessions the imposts, duties, and excises collected there must be uniform with those in the States. The facts in that case are as follows: The treaty of peace was made between the United States and Mexico on the 3d of February, 1848. By that treaty California was ceded to the United States. As soon as this was done the Government authorities at Washington directed their subordinates in California to at once collect the customs duties there on goods from foreign countries, as provided by the laws of the United States.

Congress did not pass the act extending the custom laws of the United States to California and designating therein a port of entry until the 3d of March, 1849. Between the 3d of February, 1848, and the 3d of March, 1849, Cross brought to the port at San Francisco goods upon which Harrison, the Government subordinate, demanded payment of duties under the laws of the United States. Cross paid under protest and afterwards brought suit to recover the amount paid. His contention was that the custom laws of the United States did not extend to California until the act of Congress extending them was passed; hence the amount was illegally collected, having been paid before the act was passed. The courts held that the custom laws extended to California as soon as it was ceded, and therefore the amount was properly collected.

In delivering the opinion in this case Justice Wayne says:

To permit these goods to be landed in the port at San Francisco would be a violation of that provision of the Constitution which enjoins that all duties, imports, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. Indeed, it must be clear that no such right exists, and that there was nothing in the condition of California to exempt importers of foreign goods into it from the payment of the same duties which were chargeable in the other parts of the United States. * * * That the ratification of the treaty made California a part of the United States, and that as soon as it became so the territory became subject to the acts which were in force to regulate foreign commerce with the United States after those had ceased which had been instituted for its regulation as a belligerent right.

Mr. Chairman, the overwhelming weight of authorities and of decisions of our Supreme Court maintain the proposition that all territory belonging to the United States is held under and subject to the Constitution; that Congress has not despotic power in legislating there, but that it must be controlled by the constitutional limitations and restraints.

Besides being the legal interpretation, it is decidedly the wisest interpretation. If the doctrine of the opposition prevails, there can be no enlargement of our territory except by force of arms. No nation will willingly consent to unite her destiny with ours when they clearly understand that they are possessed of none of the privileges and immunities of our Constitution, but are mere chattels, subject to the despotic will of Congress. Hence, if this doctrine prevails, there can be no expansion of this country except by conquest. All additions to it will consist of unwilling subjects, held by military power, which will be a source of loss and of weakness, and not of profit or strength.

If our contentions prevail, it will be understood that wherever the American flag waves, wherever American power or jurisdiction prevails, there goes with it the Federal Constitution, with its justice, equality, and protection of life, liberty, and property. Then many nations will be anxious and willing to unite their destiny with ours. Thus our doctrine will mean expansion like that of Texas, like that of Louisiana and of others, where brave and high-spirited people would be glad to share with us the blessings of our institutions.

Besides, I for one am unwilling to make a part and parcel of this country of any people to whom the Federal Constitution would be a curse instead of a blessing. I am unwilling to clothe the executive power of this country with all the vast powers with which it would have to be vested in order to govern our new possessions without having that power restrained by the just restrictions of the Federal Constitution. That Constitution can work no evil anywhere to those whose intentions are good and whose purposes are right.

Whether in Puerto Rico or in the Philippine Islands, with that Constitution overshadowing and protecting the people, we have assurances that there will be no abuse of power and that the inhabitants of these islands will have guaranteed to them the blessings of free and liberal institutions.

The Constitution is a hindrance only to those who seek to despoil their people and who would make slaves of them for their selfish purposes.

Mr. Chairman, no empire can endure long which is composed of subdivisions of which some are rulers and the others ruled. In such an empire there is ceaseless discontent, ceaseless turmoil, ceaseless jealousies, which in the couse of time produce civil war, insurrection, and finally disintegration. This condition has been the chief cause of the downfall of all of the great empires of the world.

If we are a wise people we will have no expansion except that which is solid and natural, that which is composed of a homogeneous people, or at least of a people who can ultimately be made so.

If we will take the broad and sensible ground that our Constitution covers all the territory belonging to us and that Congress in legislating for our territory has full and plenary powers, but that these powers must be exercised under the Constitution, then we will adopt a system which in the long run will and must produce a united, solid, and homogeneous nation without bickering, without jealousy, and without discontent.

I view with profound apprehension this new doctrine which proposes to make a vast distinction in the rights, in the privileges, and in the immunities between the citizens of the States and of the Territories.

It makes the States that constitute the Republic the head of an empire, which empire is subject entirely to the despotic will of the States. Special interests in these States will be desirous of enriching themselves at the expense of the empire, and political parties will bid for the support of these special interests in the States by offering greater opportunities to despoil the people of the Territories.

The very bill before us shows how the cigar-manufacturing interest of this country has been sufficiently potential with the Republican party to induce it to force this iniquitous bill upon Puerto Rico.

In the course of time there will happen in this country the same that happened to Rome, where the votes of citizens were obtained by allowing depredations upon the unhappy people of the outlying provinces.

When we adopt this system—this new proposed system—we are simply returning to the old colonial system of Rome, of Spain, of Portugal, and of other nations, that has been discarded and proved to be fertile in disaster only.

I am opposed to any permanent retention of the Philippine Islands. I believe that our wisest policy is to leave them as quickly as we can with honor and with safety. But if we are to remain there permanently, I believe the wisest course to pursue is to let the people of those islands understand that they are American citizens, and as such are entitled to all of our privileges, immunities, and blessings. Let them understand that they have in the Federal Constitution a safe guaranty of justice, of equality, and of protection of life, liberty, and property, which no power of Congress and no power of the Executive can alienate or destroy.

It is only by such a course and by a liberal, just, and equitable government that we can ever expect them to be reconciled or to transform them into friends instead of our enemies.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind this is one of the most dangerous bills that have ever been offered in Congress since the formation of our Government.

It will end the history of the Republic and open the history of the empire.

It dethrones the Goddess of Liberty and elevates the demon of power.

It destroys constitutional government and creates a Congressional despotism.

It is but the forerunner of countless other bills to follow in order to inaugurate the new imperialistic régime.

It is antagonistic to all the traditions of our country, to all the principles of our Government, and will, I believe, be the commencement of much disgrace and of much disaster. [Applause.]

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5493. An act for the relief of claimants having suits against the United States pending in the circuit and district courts of the United States affected by the act of June 27, 1898, amending the act of March 3, 1887.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. LACEY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mahala A. Dahliman, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. PEARCE of Missouri, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John Dinsbeer, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PARKER, for one day, on account of necessary absence from the city.

To Mr. BALL, for three days, on account of illness.

To Mr. FORDNEY, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. ATWATER, for three days, on account of sickness.

CONSIDERATION OF NICARAGUA CANAL BILL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the 6th day of next month be set apart for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2538.

Mr. BROSIUS. What is that bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] asks unanimous consent that March 6 be set apart for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2538, being the Nicaragua Canal bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object to that, but I want to make this suggestion. I am for the Nicaragua bill, but my colleagues seem to have some views on that, and owing to the absence of many members from the House I wish to suggest that it seems to me the request ought to be submitted when there is a full attendance. I make that not in the way of an objection, but an appeal to my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, unless there is an understanding between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in regard to this bill, I shall have to object to it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Take your own responsibility.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We should like to hear what gentlemen are saying. It is impossible to hear over here.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. PAYNE. I do.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution submitting a request for transfer of an appropriation for certain expenses for the year 1899—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for construction of barracks at proving ground, Sandy Hook—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7725) to establish mining experiment stations to aid in the development of the mineral resources of the United States, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 381); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANSDELL, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6767) to grant an American register to the steamer Windward, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 382); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. NORTON of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4795) granting an increase of pension to John O'Connor, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 377); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. ROBB, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1284) for the relief of W. H. L. Pepperell, of Concordia, Kans., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 378); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2824) to pay certain judgments against John C. Bates and Jonathan A. Yeckley, captain and first lieutenant in the United States Army, for acts done by them under orders of their superior officers, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 379); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. UNDERHILL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6749) for the relief of Mary A. Swift, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 380); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2232) for the relief of Louis Weber, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 383); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. SEWELL, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 55) authorizing the President to appoint one woman commissioner to represent the United States and the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution at the unveiling of the statue of Lafayette at the exposition in Paris, France, in 1900.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 5493) for the relief of claimants having suits against the United States pending in the circuit and district courts of the United States affected by the act of June 27, 1898, amending the act of March 3, 1887; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By authority of joint resolution relating to the Memorial Association of the District of Columbia, approved June 14, 1892, I appoint as members of said association, each for the full term of three years, Hon. John Hay and Judge Walter S. Cox; Gen. Nelson A. Miles, vice J. C. Bancroft Davis, resigned, for the unexpired term of two years.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of sundry druggists of Burlington County, N. J., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax upon proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Daughters of the Society of the Revolution of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation fixing the pay of letter carriers in all cities; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a memorial of Local Union No. 246, Cigarmakers' International Union, of Salamanca, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation admitting cigars free of duty from Puerto Rico or the Philippine Islands; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of the Commission Merchants and Game Dealers' Association of Missouri, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to regulate the shipment of wild game from one State to another; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Industrial Council of Kansas City, Mo., praying that all the remaining public lands be held for the benefit of the whole people, and that no grants of title to any of the lands be made to any but actual settlers and home builders on the lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., and a petition of the Manufacturers' Association of St. Louis, Mo., praying that an appropriation be made to continue the work of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DANIEL presented the memorials of John B. Bowers, of Catletts, Va.; of Craig & Doyle, of Craigville, Va., and of J. T. Oliver, of Ivy Depot, Va., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to provide for the regulation of shipments of game from one State to another; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Business Men's Association of Manchester, Va., praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. I present resolutions of the legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, relative to an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of Boston Harbor. I ask that the resolutions may be read in full and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year 1900.

Resolutions relative to an appropriation by the Congress of the United States for the improvement of Boston Harbor.

Whereas large sums of money have been expended by the Commonwealth in the development of a system of docks in Boston Harbor; and

Whereas to obtain the full benefit of the said system it is necessary that the channel of Boston Harbor shall be widened and deepened; and

Whereas this improvement would be of advantage not only to Boston and Massachusetts, but also to all New England: Be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is hereby requested to appropriate a sum sufficient for this purpose; and that the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State are requested to use all reasonable endeavors toward this end.

Resolved, That properly attested copies of these resolutions be sent to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 6, 1900.

Adopted: Sent up for concurrence.

JAMES W. KIMBALL, Clerk.

SENATE, February 9, 1900.

Adopted in concurrence.

HENRY D. COOLIDGE, Clerk.

A true copy.
Attest:

JAMES W. KIMBALL,
Clerk of House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of William S. Flint and 99 other druggists of Worcester, Mass., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax upon proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Ramsey County Medical Society of Minnesota, praying for the establishment of homes or colonies where lepers can be segregated; which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also presented a memorial of Stone Masons' Union No. 4, of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the cession of public lands to the States and Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a protest from about 30 farmers in Cheshire County, N. H., most of whom, I think, if not all, are producers of tobacco. Their protest is against the free importation of tobacco and agricultural products from any part of the world. I ask that the memorial go to the Committee on Finance. The Puerto Rican bill having been reported, the memorial would ordinarily lie on the table, but I should like to have it go to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Los Angeles, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made to continue the work of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KYLE presented a memorial of the Commercial Club of Sturgis, S. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the leasing of public lands to individuals; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the memorial of John P. Tenold and 21 other citizens of Flandreau, S. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to provide for the consolidation of third and fourth class mail matter and for the establishment of a parcels-post system; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Sturgis, S. Dak., praying that all the remaining public lands be held for actual settlers, that grazing lands should be leased only to actual settlers on adjoining lands, and that reservoirs be built for flood waters and irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FOSTER. I present resolutions adopted by the Trades Council of Tacoma, Wash., relative to the so-called ship-subsidy bill, and also to the proposed abolishment of the Money-Order Department of the postal service. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TACOMA, WASH., February 16, 1900.

Be it resolved by the Tacoma Trades Council, of the city of Tacoma, That it is the sense of this council—

First. That the benefits that would accrue to the public through the enactment and operation of the Hanna-Payne ship-subsidy bill now before Congress would be insignificant in comparison with the expenditure involved, and that the direct result of such legislation would be the diversion of a large amount of public money into the hands of a few private corporations or individuals without any adequate return therefor.

Second. That the Money-Order Department is the most useful and important adjunct to the postal service, affording a cheap, convenient, expeditious, and safe method of transferring money; that the interests of the public at large are vastly superior to the interest of the banking class, and that the abolishment of the Money-Order Department, as recommended by the Auditor, upon the ground that this department is encroaching upon the business of the banks, or upon any other similar ground, would be a gross violation of the rights of the people and an intolerable discrimination against the many in favor of the few.

Third. That the establishment of a system of savings banks in connection with the postal service would be of incalculable benefit to the wage-earners of the country by affording them a convenient and absolutely safe repository for their surplus earnings; that the experience of other nations has proved the practicability of the postal savings banks, and that the interest of a vast majority of the citizens demands the establishment of postal savings banks in the United States.

Resolved, therefore, That the sentiment is hereby declared to be opposed to the enactment of the Hanna-Payne ship-subsidy bill and to the suggested abolishment of the Money-Order Department of the postal service, and in favor of the establishment of a system of postal savings banks.

Resolved further, That the Senators and Representatives from the State of Washington are hereby urged to wield their influence and cast their votes in Congress in accordance with these resolutions, and that a copy of the same be sent to each of said Senators and Representatives.

TACOMA TRADES COUNCIL,
[SEAL.] By GEORGE V. HILL, Secretary.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Charles Marseilles, John Templeton, J. T. Perry, and 102 other citizens of Exeter, N. H., praying for the establishment of an Army veterinary corps; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Tebbetts & Soule, Z. T. Campbell, A. S. Prescott, The William Eames Drug Company, and 28 other druggists of Manchester, N. H., praying for the repeal of the stamp tax upon proprietary medicines, perfumeries, and cosmetics; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of George G. Towle and sundry other railway mail clerks of Dover, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the classification of clerks in first and second class post-offices; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of Local Union No 652, Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Elwood, Ind., and a petition of the Trades Council of Muncie, Ind., praying that the remaining public lands be held for the benefit of the whole people for actual settlement, and that no title be granted to any of these lands except to actual settlers and home builders; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.
